THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 12. No. 1. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY.} New York, Saturday, January 3, 1885. {33 CLINTON PLACE.} $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE building fund of the African Methodist church at Grand Rapids, Mich., was lost at faro by two of the trustees.

A YOUNG woman has been expelled from a church in New York for saying that her pastor had kissed her four times when she had only been kissed three times. New Yorkers can't stand wilful exaggeration.

A BROOKLYN young man is quite "gone" on "Hamlet." Reading it to the girl of his heart last week, he came to the passage, "Or if thou wilt needs marry, marry a fool." "Is that a proposal, dear?" she asked. "Yes, darling," he replied. And they settled it there and then.

DR. WOODROW having been removed from the faculty of the Presbyterian Theological Seminary at Columbia, S. C., for teaching that the Bible can be reconciled with the theory of evolution, retorts upon the trustees that they may take their places with those Wesleyans who, only a century ago, declared that anybody disbelieving in witchcraft discredited the scriptures.

A PIOUS San Francisco man entered a saloon not long ago, and to his infinit surprise and unspeakable mortification discovered his only son seated at a card table indulging in the wicked game of eucher. He ejected the youth unceremoniously; then looking at the vacant chair at the table he noted that his heir had left a very promising hand, and so he sat down and finished it and raked in the pot. Thus is virtue rewarded.

THE Prince of Montenegro has closed the Roman Catholic church at Cetigne. He has also forbidden priests of that faith to leave their residences without a written permit and prohibited the administration of the sacraments, so that the Roman Catholic residents of Cetigne are obliged to go to Cattaro, in Dalmatia, for baptism and marriage. The prince is doing all this to ingratiate himself with the czar, who would be pleased to see the Greek faith established in Montenegro.

IN northern Siberia, if a young nativ desires to marry, he goes to the father of the girl of his choice, and a price is agreed upon, one-half of which is then paid down. The prospectiv son-in-law at once takes up his residence with the family of his lady love, and resides with them a year. If at the end of a year he still desires to marry the girl, he can pay the other half, and they are married on the next visit of the priest. If he does not want to marry, he need not, and simply loses the half he paid at the start.

AMONG the attractions of a church fair in a Montana town recently was a raffle for a fawn. At the conclusion of the fair the holder of the winning ticket in the raffle asked one of the lady managers for his fawn. She replied that she had no fawn for him, but that there were plenty out on the hills and he could hav all he could catch. The man got wrathy, declaring that the whole thing was "a durned swindle." For using this language he was promptly suspended by the church, and the local paper declared that he was no gentleman for talking in that way to the "fair" managers.

"THE American clergymen," remarks the Toronto Mail, "are evolving some novel theories nowadays. A Minneapolis pastor has devoted his time and talents to proving that humor is one of the characteristics of the Bible. The Rev. Brooke Hereford says people hav been paying too much attention to the salvation of the soul, to the neglect of the body, which is more sadly in need of salvation. The Rev. Heber Newton discusses the word 'repentance,' and holds that the command to repent was merely an instruction to reform, to adopt better sanitary arrangements, and so on. If taking care of one's body and improving the conditions of life are really religion, then religion will come easy to many men who hav not experienced it yet." Ministers are obliging persons. If the public will not take what they preach, they are willing to compromise and preach what the public will take.

THE public baths of Vienna are said to be the finest in the world. The building is situated in the heart of the city, and incloses a basin 570 feet in length by 156 feet in width, and varying in depth to twelve feet. The enormous quantity of water contained in this basin is renewed three times a day. The whole establishment has accommodation for 1,500 persons, and is open from May 1st to Oct. 31st, and from five in the morning until dusk. There is also a bath restricted to ladies, open from 9 in the morning until 1; and the Vienna ladies are especially good swimmers.

"I HAV a piece of good news for you," said one of the deacons of the church to the minister. "Yes?" queried the good man. "And what is it?" "We think of tendering you a donation, and advancing your salary two hundred dollars a year." The minister appeared very uneasy for a moment, and then remarked: "I—I wish, deacon, that if the matter hasn't gone too far you would stop it if possible. To tell the truth, deacon, the last donation about ruined me, and as all my spare time is given up to collecting my present salary, I am afraid that the extra labor which would be entailed by the additional two hundred dollars might break me down."

THE Washington Monument will not long enjoy its pre-eminence as the highest structure in the world. An iron tower of the astonishing hight of 1,000 feet is to be erected in the grounds of the French Exhibition in 1889. An elevator, the safety of which is guaranteed, will communicate with the summit, and visitors to the exhibition will be taken to the top for a small fee. Those who hav the courage to make the ascent will enjoy an almost uninterrupted view for nearly a hundred miles all round. The tower will also be utilized for astronomical and meteorological observations, for experiments in optic signaling, for the investigation of certain problems in experimental physics, and for various other scientific purposes.

UPON the land and Indian question in the West, Frank Wilkeson writes to the Sun: "When the Western people talk of the desirableness of opening the Indian territory to settlement, the rights of the case do not enter into the question. They frankly admit that to deprive the Indians of the land secured to them by solemn treaty in 1866 would be rank injustice; but they are equally frank in their outspoken declarations that the question is not one of justice, but of expediency. In the past we hav never hesitated to wage a war of extermination against any Indian tribe whose lands we coveted, provided we could not cheat them out of them. And, as we hav done in the past, so it is probable we will do in the future. The fact that the Western people want land for their children almost decides the fate of the Indians who liv on the agricultural lands of the Indian territory. The Western men are hungry for land. They firmly believe that all good Indians are dead Indians, and that bad Indians hav no rights. They will say, in reply to the arguments of Eastern philanthropists: 'Our sons want farms, just as your great-grandfathers did. You excessivly proper and conscientious descendants of the Puritans in Congress and home prayer-meetings assembled, your ancestors wanted farms out of the lands owned by Indians under an unbroken title as old as the continent itself. You shot the Indians off the ground, and took possession of what you wanted. You did that in what are now the states of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Maine, and New Hampshire. The Christians of the colonies of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, North and South Carolina, and Georgia drove the original owners of the soil from all the land they wanted to cultivate, from the Connecticut River way down to Florida. All over the immense region between the Atlantic and the Mississippi the history of the Indian title has been almost wholly of forcible infraction by the whites, and the development of the country has been based on the expulsion of a less civilized by a more civilized race. And it was all right. The white man's conquest was legalized by God's law of the strongest, which is his law for the development of civilization. The recession of the Indians was under a divine law, established and operativ through all nature, by which the strong supersede the weak, and the final prevalence of strength and excellence is provided for in human society. So, O pious and exemplary folk, don't snivel or cant; you and your ancestors hav done precisely what we are going to do. We will do it, and we giv you public notice that we will do it.'"

IN an interview with a Herald reporter last week Joseph Greenhut, city inspector of tenement houses for Chicago, makes some interesting statements on the labor question. Being asked what were the chief causes tending to keep people out of employment, he said: "To begin with, there is always a large floating population which comes here to secure work. This is demonstrated by the fact that there are 25,000 more males than females in this city. Especially during the winter, after the close of navigation and the stopping of work on the large farms and on the railroads, tens of thousands flock to Chicago, where they can liv as cheaply as anywhere else and enjoy the pleasures of a large city. A large number of persons of both sexes and of different ages hav for years been accustomed to be out of employment for weeks and months because the productivness of labor, aided by machinery and steam power and foreign competition, fill the markets periodically to such a degree that a stoppage of further production of considerable intervals is necessary now and then. Vast numbers of immigrants persist in habit of cheap living, and thereby withhold employment from skilled and intellectual labor. Many varieties of handicraft and commercial employment are underpaid, and in consequence of the inability of those engaged in them to consume the articles of trade and commerce, the markets become glutted, and factories reduced in working forces and hours of labor." In answer to the question, "What are the causes which reduce the price of labor?" he replied: "The unit of wages is the actual cost of human living, but the standard of living varies according to the race and nationality. The Anglo-American rises to the highest, and the Italian falls to the lowest. Colored people hav in many cases a less costly style of living than whites, and, therefore, work for less wages than whites. They hav taken the places of Anglo-American waiters in hotels and restaurants, and on steamboats. Italians, Poles, Bohemians, Slavs, and Hungarians hav displaced Anglo-Americans in outdoor hard work, because they are ready to submit to greater exertions for much less pay. Anglo-Americans would starve and die out if compelled to accept the low rate of wages on which poor immigrants thrive and perpetuate their race. A trade affording employment all the year, and requiring no particular skill or experience, will fetch in the local labor market on an average $1.20 a day. But large employers of labor often attempt to displace high-priced help by cheap immigrant labor, and often succeed in permanently reducing wages by ousting nativ labor, and replacing it by Canadian and European immigrants. As a matter of fact, the bulk of unskilled labor and a large proportion of skilled manual labor in Chicago is un-American, while the Americans are overcrowding the commercial and intellectual occupations. Manual training schools are one of the most pressing demands as an extension of the system of free schools, in order to teach the rudiments of mechanical labor to the whole people, and enable persons to change their avocations." Mr. Greenhut holds that public policy should require high wages and low profits, because the vast mass of the people will always remain wage-workers, or small self-employed shopkeepers, or farmers. The rich employers and corporations are comparativly few, and are abundantly able to take care of themselvs. But the proletarians, who liv from hand to mouth, comprise a large proportion of the whole population, and if their purchasing and consuming ability is reduced by low wages, they cannot buy manufactured goods and other products in very large quantities.

News of the Week.

THERE hav been disastrous earthquakes in Spain, attended with frightful loss of life.

A STRIKE of horsecar drivers at New Orleans last Sunday caused a meager attendance at the exposition.

JUDGE STECKLER, of this city, gave turkeys on Christmas day to all the poor people he could find in his judicial district. Mr. Steckler is a Jew.

THE material of the Kansas Prohibitionist, St. John's Kansas organ, run by Martin Van Buren Bennett, was sold by the sheriff on Tuesday last week.

JUDGE BROWN, of the Supreme Court of New York, has rendered a decision that a wife may be the legal business partner of a person other than her husband.

THE Rev. J. R. Thompson, of Brooklyn, reported missing last week, has returned to his home, but givs no account of himself. He is addicted to the use of chloral.

IN the municipal elections in Paris last week, Victor Hugo and M. Schoelcher received the largest number of votes, while MM. Rochefort and Guyot were near the bottom of the list.

SPIES were engaged last Sunday in this city buying small articles from the different shopkeepers whose stores were open. The arrest of the shopkeepers for breaking the Sunday law will follow.

CHRISTMAS day was observed by the blowing of horns in the streets and tho blowing of ministers in the pulpit, to which was added the ringing of bells in the steeples. Otherwise the day passed quietly.

FRANCIS MOULTON, recently deceased, had in his possession numerous letters relating to the Beecher-Tilton scandal. It is reported that Moulton's executor will hold these letters as assets and sell them for what they will bring. Any honorable man would return them to the writers.

THE Rev. Alexander B. Crawford, of an Episcopal chapel in Philadelphia, has resigned. On a recent Sunday he appeared in the pulpit in an intoxicated condition. He read the prayers and pronounced the benediction, but omitted his sermon. He gave no explanation of how he came so.

DEACON TERRY, of Riverhead, L. I., who ran away with Pastor Downs's wife some time ago, has returned home and been forgiven by his wife. Mrs. Downs does not fare so well. Her reverend husband refuses to see her, or to hav his children visit her, and has begun proceedings for absolute divorce.

PREVIOUS to the election Beecher said that were every man who had broken the seventh commandment once, twice, or thrice to voto for Cleveland, he would hav 200,000 majority in this state. Last Sunday Mr. Beecher apologized for making such a remark, and affirmed that he in no wise undervalued the sanctity and chastity of the household life. There is a serious disruption in Mr. Beecher's church.

IT is proposed to erect at Rome a statue of Giordano Bruno, the Italian philosopher and the father of Pantheism, who was burnt as a heretic in 1600. The pope is horrified at the proposition, and has expressed his rage in a speech of unusual vehemence. His holiness should confine himself to writing encyclical letters. Bruno's name will be famous when Pope Leo XIII. has been dead a thousand years.

SOMEBODY sent an alleged infernal machine to the office or the American Tract Society, 150 Nassau street, last Saturday. It did not explode when opened. Anthony Comstock, whose office is in the same building, was called in, and the messenger who brought the box was arrested, but as no one appeared in court against him the next day, he was discharged. The officers of the court express the belief that the whole thing is a fraud got up by Comstock to advertise his society, whose annual meeting is soon to be held, and which is reported as on its last legs unless immediate support is extended.

Anti-Prohibition.

We advocate and practice temperance, but are opposed to prohibition, as we regard it as an impracticable and pernicious measure. Some of the more enthusiastic and fanatical prohibitionists most perversely persist in misunderstanding and misrepresenting our purposes and principles. They insist that we anti-prohibitionists are the allies and tools of the rum-seller, that we are apologists for intemperance. In too many cases the prohibitionist uses the tactics of the church, which, when it opposes Infidelity, resorts to abuse rather than to argument and fact. We do not care to pay back in the same coin, but prefer to exercise reason and common sense, and thereby possibly persuade our cold-water friends to rely a little more hereafter than they hav heretofore on the same means.

We hav not one word to say in defense of intemperance, and it is chiefly because the temperance people are so intemperate themselvs in their spirit and methods that I feel called upon to oppose and expose prohibition.

Intemperance is a widespread evil. It is a vice practiced in all nations, by all classes of people. It is nothing new, for it is as old as the history of man. When confronted with a fact of such universal and long-standing character, the student of history beholds a problem whose solution is not readily obtained. He perceives an evil which is the outgrowth of many causes, and he recognizes the necessity of many causes uniting to reduce it to a minimum. For he regards the prevention of all intemperance as an utter impossibility. He perceives that such long-existing and universal evils can only be modified, not exterminated. On the other hand, the enthusiastic prohibitionist thinks that by passing a law against the evil it can be wholly destroyed. Evils which spring out of man's nature and conditions cannot be legislated out of existence. Legislating and preaching are looked upon as the guides and saviors of the race, but we soon learn better after once beginning to use our reason. The evolution of manhood, the elevation of the race, depend upon a totally different class of means and methods from those employed by popes and politicians. Science is the schoolmaster of this age, and literature—chiefly the newspaper—is the principal assistant. I mean by science, knowledge—a knowledge not merely of books, but also of men and things. It is by this practical knowledge of self and the world that man rises to higher conditions. An objector starts up, declaring that "it is not so much knowledge as it is better food, and more of it, better homes, greater comfort, and fewer hours of toil, that the poor people need; man's welfare depends upon his physical wellbeing, and not upon his knowledge of science." Let us admit the necessity of good physical conditions, as good homes, less toil, etc., as necessary conditions to more rapid progress in civilization; but inasmuch as the millions of the laboring classes do not hav good homes, nor do they get just pay for their toil, nor leisure for study and recreation; inasmuch as the people suffer from oppression and superstition, what is it they need most of all? I answer that they need to know more about the wrongs they suffer. They know almost nothing of the nature and influence of superstition, and are equally blind in regard to the oppression whose lash they feel but do not know how to escape. It is knowledge—and knowledge is science—that the poor oppressed and deluded masses need to raise themselvs from the dust to which they are crushed. The lower classes of society do not owe their moral and intellectual enfranchisment to the wealthy and regnant classes above them; but it is always in spite of them that they acquire their rights, one by one. The wage-class has two hard lessons to learn—namely, (1) what their rights are, and (2) how to secure them. They themselvs must wrench their rights from the grip of the monopolist and tyrant. But these two lessons of human rights, and how to secure them, hav been the lesson of man for centuries. He learns his lessons slowly. This old world is never revolutionized; it moves slowly, but not always directly, onward. The highest civilization ever appears where the people are wise enough to know their rights, and brave enough to fight for them, and manly enough to preserve them. Salvation by atonement is a failure, after an experiment of eighteen centuries; and salvation by legislation will prove a failure, no matter how many centuries it may be tried. Prohibition is nothing less than an attempt to govern man in his moral conduct. It is an effort to manufacture morality by law. The day is not distant when the people will see that government is the nightmare of human existence. All governments are barbarous and brutal that do not inspire and aid self-government in the individual. Society can be reformed only by the reform of its individual members, and these individual members can be reformed only by each reforming himself. That is to say, the moral development of humanity can be accomplished only by moral influences. Force is not a moral educator, any more than a policeman's club. The power of government is not esthetic, but always repressiv, and oppressiv.

Passing prohibitory laws does not prevent the sale and use of intoxicating drinks; for no sooner are such laws enacted than means are used to evade their execution. The history of prohibition in a dozen states proves this. Prohibition has been a failure in every state where it has become law. And why is it not a success? Because the people at large do not desire such a law. The Republican party has, on off elections, put the prohibition plank in its platform to catch votes, but it by no means follows that the Republicans are all temperance men, and that only Democrats are rum-sellers and rum-drinkers. The Republican party has claimed to be the party of reform. It has undertaken no reform, however, which is so greatly needed as the reform of itself. On great occasions, as the election of a president, this reform party cannot trust the interests of the "dear people" to a platform containing a prohibition plank. No one with less piety than a St. John can go before the people and solicit their votes on the merits of cold water.

We see, then, that prohibition must of necessity be a failure as long as the people do not desire it. Hence, if by political manipulations one party can catch votes enough to win the election and pass a prohibitory law, which the people will not sustain, it immediately becomes a dead letter upon the statute book. For this very reason, nearly every state that has tried prohibition has repealed its law. This is certainly evidence enough of the impracticability of such methods.

Let us glance at the working of this law. Whenever and wherever prohibitory laws are enacted means are extemporized to evade them. In Maine and in Massachusetts, during the time that most earnest efforts were made to execute the prohibitory law, clubs were formed where any of its members could go at any time during the day or night and get what they wanted to drink. The officers of the law could not touch either the members of the club who drank the liquors, or the janitor who served them up, as no liquors were ostensibly bought or sold. These clubs, however, did not become very common, as the enforcement of the law was seldom strict enough to make them necessary. Enough, however, was seen of the clubs to know that they were greater evils than the open saloon. Young men who joined them were sure to be tempted into gambling and other habits still worse.

The law is defeated also by smuggling and illicit distilling. Ways and means hav always been found to carry spirituous liquors into any state where prohibition is the law, from adjoining states. Under the cover of darkness men could carry wagon-loads of it from all sides of the state. It was a profitable business, and not very dangerous. The diminished market increased the price of stimulants, hence it was lucrativ to distill illicitly, and as it was exceedingly profitable, there were not wanting men ready to go into the business. But if the club entailed one evil, smuggling and illicit distilling begat two, namely, the use of poisonous spirituous liquors, and the prohibition of beer, as the latter is too bulky to manufacture or sell on the sly. And the fact that all kinds of stimulants were prohibited gave a ready sale for the most inferior kinds of alcoholic drinks, villainous compounds which inebriate and make crazy the drinker after imbibing one or two drinks.

If our temperance reformers must hav restrictiv regulations of the liquor trade, let them put the plaster on the sore by placing restrictions or taxes first upon the sale of spirituous liquors, and secondly, by affixing heavy penalties upon the manufacture and sale of adulterated drinks. No man can complain that his liberties are invaded when he is prevented from selling poisonous decoctions for pure spirituous liquors. It would be easy enough to hav a standard for the quality of beer. In fact, it would hardly be necessary, as we see now that competition effects this result. If we must hav legislation upon this question, it seems that the best way to promote temperance would be to discriminate in favor of beer and against the vile stuffs called whiskies and rums. For wherever we find beer the common drink of a people, we see intemperance and crime less than they are in those countries where alcoholic drinks are common. I quote in support of this statement the language of Dr. Bowdich, from the "Real and Imaginary Effects of Intemperance," by G. Thomann: "The extraordinary difference between the per centages of crime perpetrated by Germans and Irish is a peculiar fact, to be interpreted partly by the differences in the temperaments of the people, but still more, I am inclined to believe, by the difference in the liquors used by the two. I cannot but think that if the Germans were to drink rum and whisky as the Irish do, a much larger proportion of crime would be found among them than now, for whisky does not, as far as I know, affect a German body differently from an Irishman's body. I would like to suggest the following proposition: Take away the whisky from the Irishman, and persuade him to use lager beer or Bavarian ale, and perhaps you will take from him a good deal of his pugnacity, and he will be less frequently drunk."

We put in as additional evidence the testimony of Professor A. Bouchardat, formerly of the "medical faculty of Paris," though vigneron de naissance et de cœur (wine-grower by birth and choice), as he styles himself, who went still a step further. In discussing the dangers of excessiv use of distilled spirits, he writes enviously of the quantities of beer consumed in Germany and England, and givs utterance to the hope that the use of beer may yet become more general in France. "Good beer," he says, "is the most wholesome of fermented beverages. Its continued use from the remotest ages to our day bears sufficient testimony to its excellent qualities." What a world of significance in these words, coming, as they do, from a savant whose country's wealth is in no small measure represented by its vine-clad hills! Since they were written, the excellent qualities of beer hav conquered French prejudices against a beverage so thoroughly German. It is not difficult to find ample evidence of the superior character of beer over all kinds of alcoholic drinks. Smollett, whom some regard as the precursor of the temperance advocates of our day, and whose writings we find frequently cited in the Rev. Wm. Reid's "Temperance Cyclopedia," was of the opinion that "the best way of preventing the excess of spirituous liquors would be to lower the excise on beer and ale, so as to enable the poorer class of laborers to refresh themselvs with a comfortable liquor." The exceedingly high malt-tax had driven the English people to the use of gin, and with what effect may be seen from Smollett's graphic chapter on high licenses, wherein he says, "Distilled spirits were, consequently, exceedingly cheap, compared with the cost of beer, and the people were forcibly driven to the use of gin." The "gin epidemic" was the result of this rapacious system of taxation. In London there was in 1725 one spirit-shop to every seven houses. In 1728, "high licenses were resorted to as a measure supposed to diminish intemperance, but the change was not productiv of any practical good; and besides, this law was soon revoked. It was at this point that the state of things assumed that aspect which Smollett so graphically describes in the work referred to. This was the time when, as that author says, signboards proclaimed, "Here you may get drunk for a penny, dead drunk for twopence, and clean straw for nothing."

In face of these facts it is not true to say that beer drinking produces just as much drunkenness and crime as rum-drinking. Nor is it true that beer-drinking leads to whisky-drinking, as the habits of the Germans prove to the contrary. Nor is it true that drunkenness is on the increase in the United States, for the consumption of distilled spirits has steadily decreased since 1820 to 1880. By comparing the quantity sold in 1820 with that of 1880 we find that in the former year the amount of distilled liquors used was eleven quarts per capita, and, in the latter four and one-fifth quarts (v. Thomann's Statistical Sketch, p. 14). Nor is it true that intemperance is the principal cause of crime. The men who are in prison for long terms are forgers, burglars, highwaymen, and murderers. But the crimes these classes commit are not the result of intoxication. The forger, burglar, and highwayman need cool heads and steady nerves to accomplish this work.

Mr. Green, warden of the Penitentiary of Kings County, a gentleman of excellent judgment, said, when interrogated on this point, "It is not a matter of mere supposition when I say that not even five per cent of the criminals can be said to hav committed their offense in consequence and by reason of intoxication.

Dr. Arnold, of Baltimore, writes that, "after a careful and painstaking examination of court and prison records, it was reported that less than three per cent of such crimes could be traced to the use of intoxicating liquors."

Bishop Ireland, in his temperance address in Buffalo, March 10, 1884, quoted Hon. Wm. E. Gladstone as saying: "Intemperance inflicts more injury upon the world than war, pestilence, and famin combined."

We do not wish to make it appear that the evil is not a great one. But the Hon. Gladstone and Bishop Ireland both fail to point out the causes of intemperance and crime. It is no part of their business to uncover the great criminals of society. They are interested in talking about this great evil, but they dare not compromise themselvs by exposing the primary causes; and it is certain that no radical reform can begin until the root of this upas-tree is laid bare.

And just here I would say that the crimes committed by intoxicated persons are usually such as are punished by small fines, or a few months' imprisonment, and the greater offenses committed against the peace and security of society are perpetrated by those who are not intoxicated. It is absolutely necessary, in the study of criminal classes, to bear in mind the saying of Thomas Paine, substantially, that the rich and influential almost always escape punishment.

The history of our bank defalcations tells a shameful story on this point. Why are not these public robbers brought to the bar of justice? Why are not the pirates upon commerce, the gamblers in stocks and breadstuffs, placed behind the bars? Who are the great criminals of a country? Its rulers. Its lawmakers. Those who make laws to enrich themselvs who are already rich, and to still further impoverish the already poor. Those who make one law for the rich and another for the poor. Those who make one kind of money for the soldier and another kind for the banker. Our legislatures hav become the rookeries of rascality. Birds of prey build their nests of plunderings in state houses. Monopoly of land, the exploitation of labor, and systematic taxation of the necessaries of life.

But what has this to do with intemperance? It has everything to do with it. Poverty is the principal cause of habitual inebriety. It is putting the cart before the horse to say that intemperance is the cause of poverty. There is no doubt that it often contributes to this end, but at worst it is only one out of many causes; while the root of the evil lies in the misery consequent upon poverty. It is an exception to the rule when the well-fed man becomes a whisky or rum drinker. The over-worked and under-fed body craves stimulant. Hence we find intoxication most common among the hardest working classes. Being poorly fed, having ill-ventilated rooms to sleep in, with insufficient clothing, and being poorly protected from the cold, it is natural that they, more than other classes, should seek stimulants to cheer the mind and comfort the body.

Lars Olsen Smith, once the brandy king of Sweden, is now devoting his energies toward the temperance reform of his people, and he recognizes the fact that poorly cooked and insufficient food are the chief causes in producing "physical degeneracy, and a craving for stimulants." This reformer has traveled through Europe to learn the prime causes of intemperance, and is, therefore, some authority on this point. He is now devoting his energies to providing better and more food for the wage classes, as the first step toward temperance reform.

Dr. Evarts, superintendent of the Cincinnati Sanitarium, in his "What Shall We Do for the Drunkard?" says: "It is probable, also, from the clinical history of drunkenness, that any cause of exhaustion of a special character, especially such as affects the brain and cord primarily; or a deprivation of nutricious and palatable food, on account of insufficiency or bad cooking; or an inability to digest and assimilate food of a sufficiently stimulating character, becomes a predisposing cause of drunkenness" (Thomann's Statistical Sketch, p. 4).

Poverty is the parent curse. The amelioration of the race is secured in proportion as this blight is destroyed. And poverty can be eradicated by guaranteeing the poor equal rights. The poor man is now reputed to hav equal rights, but his rights are recognized only in political platforms and paper constitutions. He does not find equal rights in the courts, or in legislatures. Capital and superstition are the upper and nether millstones between which he is crushed. There is no crime so great and so prevalent as the robbing of the laborer of the fruits of his toil, and as he has no friends at court the plundering goes on. Here is where the greatest of all reforms must begin. But it can begin only when the laborer takes the work into his own hands. It is allotted him and all others, each to work out his own salvation. The many complaints against capital, and the universal discussion of the rights of man, are sure to be followed by the mights of man. But I am opposed to prohibition on other grounds. It is a Christian effort based upon sectarian interests. It is kindred to the God-in-the-Constitution movement, the Comstock laws against Infidelity, the laws enjoining or permitting Bible reading in the public schools, and the Sunday laws. Let me cite a straw to show which way the wind blows:

"NATIONAL PROHIBITION PARTY PLATFORM.

"The Prohibition party in national convention assembled, acknowledge Almighty God as the rightful sovereign of all men, from whom the just powers of government are derived, and to whose laws human enactments should conform as an absolute condition of peace, prosperity, and happiness."

Dr. McDonald, the leader of the Prohibition Home Protection party of California, givs still further insight into the purposes of the Prohibition party. He says:

"If 'Prohibitionist' is well informed about his party's plans he will know that we will make a stand, not only for prohibition, but also for the enactment and enforcement of an intelligent national Sunday law—believing that Sunday is an institution so beneficially connected with our social, business, and moral life that we cannot dispense with it without sacrificing the very best interest of the community, and the highest welfare of the whole people."

In accepting the Prohibition nomination for governor of Michigan, David Preston, of Detroit, said:

"The political party that will acknowledge God in all its platforms and in all its ways as the author and giver of every good and perfect gift, that party shall be my party, and its God shall be my God."

There is no uncertain sound about that declaration. It is in the very nature of Christianity to perpetuate itself by despotism. The Church has lost its control of thoughtful people. The fires of hell hav burnt to ashes, and the ashes hav ceased even to smoke. And as wrongs remain to be redressed, the church comes forward and offers its services, if it can hav the power of law in its hand as a policeman's club. What a sight it would be in a Sunday-school to see the classes of little children taught, by policemen, the beauties of the golden rule. And yet such a sight would, in reality, be no more incongruous than the attempt to enforce moral duties by law. But this delusion has possessed the minds of the wise and unwise men in all ages. It has always been supposed that if a man committed moral wrongs something ought to be done to prevent such conduct. Hence despotisms hav grown up only to crush the people under the guise of making laws which would compel men to be moral.

The people are beginning to think upon their rights, and are demanding of synods and senates that they produce their credentials. They are asking of their preachers and lawmakers the question, "Where do you get your authority for your law and your gospel?"

Is it not derived from the people? Did not men write the gospels, and did not our fathers write the Constitution? And who made you priests and legislators but we, the people? And who sustains you but we, the people? It will appear from this foundation that there can be no consensus of the competent. The people may select teachers and executiv officers to act for them, but after all the power of government is with the people, and rests in the individual. He can, however, never delegate his moral conduct to another any more than he could delegate his moral nature. It is not only impossible for him to divest himself of moral responsibility, but his moral nature will not permit another to do so. Wherever there is a high sense of morality, the individual will fight for his rights—his right even to do wrong. It is one of the oldest fights on record. It began in the Garden of Eden, when the first prohibitory law was enacted against eating apples and scientific study. Mrs. Eve was too intensely human to submit to prohibitions which were at war with her better nature. Having a mind, she must know good and evil, and having an imperfect nature, and imperfect surroundings, she must also do good and evil. In fact, it is in the very nature of morality that conduct should be moral and immoral. And should I say that you hav a right to be immoral, you may question my dictum. But this brings us to further definitions. There are two kinds of evil acts; the one we call crimes, and the other, vices. And there are two kinds of rights, namely, legal rights and moral rights. It is because these distinctions are not observed that prohibitory laws become possible. There is no meaning in the word liberty if we make no distinction between crime and vice. A crime is a violation of the law of the land, and a vice is usually an inordinate indulgence of the natural appetites which are in themselvs innocent. Webster says, "Thus intemperance, unchastity, depravity, are vices." Vices are, therefore, actions such as the individual must decide upon for himself. To be a glutton is to be intemperate in the use of food, but no one is insane enough to think it possible to make laws respecting the kind and quantity of food one shall eat. The gormand must in the very nature of things be allowed to eat all he wants to. As a moral being, it is his legal right to be immoral. Liberty implies the legal right to be moral or immoral. Lying is a vice, but a lie which does no harm to the person or property of another is not actionable—is not a crime. I must decide for myself on all questions of this kind. I can in fact be moral only as I assume to decide what is right and wrong for myself. Suppose you use profane language; it is no crime, because it injures no one in person or property. You must not observe Sunday as a sacred day on which to fear and tremble, but that is your own affair. Liberty grants you equal rights on Sunday. Perhaps you hav no religion whatever; the paper Constitution which protects us, guarantees us equal rights on questions of religion. If your neighbor wants a religion, he has a right to hav it; and if you want none, you hav an equal right to dispense with all religions. But here we see how insidious the foe of liberty is. We hav a God-in-the-Constitution party which seeks to overthrow the ancient charter of liberties. For when God goes in the Constitution, liberty goes out. In fact, wherever he goes, liberty departs. One beautiful consolation is left us, namely, that Jehovah has from the first been a decided failure.

The God-in-the-Constitution movement, the Sunday enforcement party, and the prohibition crusade are a religious trinity, having one spirit and one method, namely, the enforcement of laws upon moral questions. They mean war upon the liberties of the people. It is an attempt to force man to the discharge of his duties; an effort to manufacture moral conduct by the policeman's club; an effort to make man act temperately while he has an intemperate nature.

It is, therefore, nothing less than blindness and folly to attempt to reform society on any moral question except by moral means. It is nothing less than the dry-rot of degeneracy that can suggest the improvement of humanity by destroying individual liberty. I maintain that the saving power of society rests in individualism. "What! do you mean a go-as-you-please morality?" Yes, it is a go-as-you-please morality, for that is the only gait morality can go in. When one goes as somebody else pleases, he does not go as a free man, but as a slave; and it is immaterial what kind of a lash it is which swings over one's head, whether it is the slave-owner's, the czar's, or simply the laws of the United States. Whatever authority compels man to act so and thus, because it is moral to so act, has robbed him of his liberty. Without this moral liberty, all other rights of the citizen turn to ashes and dust. It is the leaven which leavens all human rights.

I hope the distinction between legal rights and moral rights will be kept constantly in view. I hav a legal right to eat too much, but I hav no moral right to do so. And it would be impossible to make any law regulating the kind and quality of food that each one should eat. I hav a legal right to smoke ten cigars before breakfast if I wish to, but I hav no moral right to injure my health or to become offensiv to other members of the household. But laws cannot be enacted limiting the number of cigars or the age of the meerschaum one shall smoke.

I hav the legal right to be the father of twenty children by one mother, if she is fruitful enough to bear them, but I hav no moral right to such parentage.

The folly of prohibition is apparent when we make a distinction between crime and vice, and observe also the consequent discrimination between legal rights and moral rights.

The necessity and righteousness of prohibition is usually based upon the enormity of the evil of intemperance. But the greatness of an evil does not neceesarily make it a question which can be affected by legislation.

No one can estimate the evils growing out of matrimony. Who could measure the unhappiness and misery consequent upon ill-assorted marriages? In fact, the harmonious and happy marriages are the exceptions, and the unhappy ones the rule.

Then again, in these mismated marriages there are ill-begotten children who survive to curse the world. What shall we say of the imbecils, lunatics, and idiots, or of those born inheriting disease? Ought this world to run as it is now doing, peopling the earth with diseased and mentally blighted offspring? If not, what can we do about it? Can we pass laws against idiots and those inheriting disease? If not, shall we pass laws against improper marriages? Where shall we begin?

The truth is, we cannot touch these evils which follow in the wake of marriage. If one lunatic (outside of the asylum) wishes to marry another, and it is mutually agreeable, there is no law to prevent it—there can be none. If one consumptiv chooses to marry another inheriting the same disease, there is, and can be, no law based on justice to prevent it.

Laws against the vices of mankind can never be executed, for the simple reason that they are unjust and impracticable; and they are unjust and impracticable because they subvert individual liberty; they attempt to govern and reform society, to manufacture morality, by the policeman's club. W. S. BELL.

PROHIBITION.

I hav been amused and amazed with the persistent special pleading and sophistry of W. S. Bell on the subject of prohibition. I take your review of his late address on "Anti-Prohibition" as a fair compend of his position and defense.

His three postulates, accepted without qualification, are anarchical, false, and immoral, if not criminal. He virtually assumes contradictory positions in his reasonings to decoy people into his vagaries. In attempting to make a distinction between crime and vice, he tacitly acknowledges the right of government to legislate to prohibit a crime, which was not a crime, but simply a vice, before the legislation. There was a time when a written law was not known; then there was no crime, according to his theory. What a happy period in human experience! For centuries what are now esteemed virtues were by law condemned as crimes, and punished with the severest penalties.

Most, if not all, of what we now call crimes were at one time only vices, and would hav ever remained so if W. S. Bell could hav been about to enforce his theory. He would never hav prohibited vices till they became crimes; and he could never permit a vice to be legislated into a crime. Because there is such clear distinction between vice and crime that no wise man like him would ever think of confounding them by legislating one into the other. Oh, no, he is too shrewd and sagacious to involve himself in such an absurdity. He will do what he can to expose the blindness and inconsistency of the past in thus legislating, and prevent, if possible, any repetition of it in the future. Let the ghastly and horrid ruins of intoxication remain nothing but vices; it will be a much milder, more genteel, and refined way of thinking, speaking, of indulging, and enjoying them as such, than if we were to hav them legislated into crimes, and then hav to believe they were such.

The Salamanca Convention.—Why Not a Success.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In your notice of the Salamanca Convention I find the following:

"There was really no demand, local or otherwise, for the meeting at this time. Brother H. L. Green's serious sickness incapacitated him for that vigorous and energetic work by which he has sometimes secured success in the past, and possibly clouded his judgment, making 'the wish the father to the thought' in regard to people attending."

I think that statement calls for a word of explanation. A year ago we held a convention at Salamanca that everybody admitted was a wonderful success, and at that convention it was voted to hold another a year from that time, or, at least, the next winter. The first convention I called between Christmas and New Year's, thinking that, as everybody would be at leisure, it would be a good time to hold it. But at that convention many said it was a very poor time, and that the next convention should be called earlier. Another reason is that the Opera House is a cold building, and many said it would be better to hav it before the very cold weather came on. Then at Cassadaga the matter was talked over, and it was suggested by some one that it be held the week before or the week after the Toronto convention, and so I placed it before. And to guard against any financial trouble, the speakers agreed to attend for the receipts over and above the actual local expenses. So the convention was called in accordance to this arrangement. And in all my experience in calling together conventions, I never advertised one better. Circulars were printed and sent to every Freethinker within two or three hundred miles, and notices sent to all the Liberal papers of the country and to all the Secular papers in the vicinity.

Our local arrangements were complete. Our Salamanca ladies did splendidly. Then why did not more attend? These were the reasons:

1. Last year our audience was largely made up of our Spiritual friends, who did not attend in any great numbers this year, owing to some attacks that were made on them at Salamanca last year, and I think the Chainey and Watts discussion at Cassadaga had a tendency to sour some of them. In Salamanca, very few Spiritualists attended or purchased tickets.

2. The Liberals in this vicinity very generally attended at Cassadaga, and the expense there was all they felt willing to bear.

3. The Convention was held at the close of a very hotly contested presidential election, and many were tired of attending meetings and listening to speeches.

4. And above all other reasons, the hard times kept people at home. The few persons who came from neighboring towns would say to me, "There were many in our neighborhood who intended to be here, but they could not afford the money; they could not get the money to come with, the times are so hard."

So that we see after all it was not my "clouded judgment" on account of ill-health.

But I hav learned this lesson by the Cassadaga and the late Salamanca conventions. Hereafter I shall never take the responsibility upon myself that I heretofore hav done in getting up conventions. This Salamanca Convention cost me much labor, and has left a small debt on my hands that it will be hard for me to pay. But I do not complain of that. The convention was, after all, a success in some directions, and I know has done good here. At least some of us hav learned things that will be of value in the future.

P.S.—Since writing the above I notice a number of other errors that should be corrected in justice to Salamanca people. And first, as to Salamanca. It is a new town, only some ten years old, and now has about three thousand inhabitants, and is fast growing, and will, no doubt, soon be the county seat. There are a very few church people here, and few avowed Freethinkers; most of the people are independent of religious or non-religious sects or parties, but I know them to be a generous people. With the aid of the few who came here they gave over one hundred dollars to support this convention. Mrs. Fitts, Mrs. Vreeland, and Mrs. Colgrave, raised money to get Mr. Wakeman to attend the convention.

And there were other errors in the report that need correcting. We read, "Beautiful pictures adorned the walls; some of the choicest gems were from the pencil of Mrs. Seymour." Now, the truth is, not one of Mrs. Seymour's pictures was in the hall; they were all contributed by the other good citizens of Salamanca, and the ladies who arranged the stage were Mrs. Fitts and Mrs. Colgrave. And the writer forgot to mention that Mrs. Seymour gave a dinner on Sunday to all the speakers, which was one of the most enjoyable occasions of the convention. Justice should be done to all and each.

I just had a conversation with a leading Spiritualist of this section, and he informed me that there was a general understanding among the Spiritualists in this vicinity that they would not attend the convention this year on account of the way Dr. T. L. Brown treated them last year. Last year at least one meeting was two-thirds Spiritualists. That made a great difference. Truly yours, H. L. Green.

The Liberal Club.

It was ladies' night at the Liberal Club last Friday evening. The women had the floor. Mrs. E. M. King, secretary of the Rational Dress Association of London, read a paper on "Rational Dress Realized." Mrs. King was clad in a polka-dot silk dress, with a sort of cutaway jacket, lace-trimmed, and buttoning only at the throat. Her skirts were short enough to disclose below about six inches of trousers of the same material as the dress. Her hair, which parted at the side, was cut short and arranged in an attractiv manner. She said that women now dressed as though they were formed below the waist like an upturned goblet, when such was not the case. Then their hats were not fitted to their heads, and were supported by bunches of false hair and hairpins, skewers and little daggers; besides being ornamented with many varieties of bird and beast, and fruit and flower. A rational dress would conform to the outline of the wearer, whether male or female. Women saw no harm in a man's clothes fitting his person; if men could see any harm in women dressing the same way, let the men protect their eyes from the dangerous display by wearing blinkers. The reason women objected to displaying their limbs clothed in trousers, Mrs. King averred, was that they were so badly deformed, the result of abuse in dress. The speaker did not regard the matter of female suffrage as of great moment. When women realized of how little use the suffrage was to men, they would cease to ask for it, and it would soon thereafter be offered them. The question that overshadowed all others, Mrs. King believed, was that of dress reform. She called attention to the fact that it was now becoming the correct thing among the dudes to wear corsets, pads, and abdominal supports. If things went on in this way, we might reasonably expect to see these effeminate men wearing skirts to conceal their misshapen extremities. The Nemesis of outraged nature would then hav completed her revenge. Mrs. King believed that the human female must adopt the close-fitting bifurcated garment, or become an extinct species.

Mrs. Dr. Herrick was asked to contribute something to the subject under discussion. In response the doctor said she was about to deliver an address before the Science of Life Club, in which she would demonstrate scientifically the natural superiority of the female sex.

Mrs. Leonard held that the most becoming dress for the human male was the Scotch kilt. She liked colors in men's clothes, and deprecated the adoption of trousers by women. Short skirts might be worn, but there was no reason why the great works of nature should be concealed. As a support for the figure, the corset was a useful article, and worthy of preservation. She did not believe in the complete suppression of dudes. They were cleanly persons, and sometimes developed into creditable human beings.

Mrs. Burnz said that she had at one time worn the bloomer dress and found it an acceptable costume. It did not attract an undesirable amount of attention. If any one desired to wear a corset, they should first inflate their lungs to the utmost, take the measure of the waist while the lungs were so expanded, and then procure a corset an inch larger than this measurement called for. They would thus obtain a corset that was comparativly innocuous.

Mr. Huhn next presented himself upon the platform with his head surmounted by a woman's bonnet, to illustrate, as he said, how a man would look in female attire. He requested the audience to imagin him in short sleeves and a low-necked dress. With these additions to his costume he believed he would be nothing less than a daisy.

Lawyer Chamberlain was inclined to favor the Spanish cloak, which consisted of a square piece of cloth with a slit cut from the edge to the center, where a hole was made large enough to admit the head. This garment could be worn in various graceful ways. He recommended that the ladies who wore trousers should hav them make with a slight spring at the instep.

Dr. Abbott, of Brooklyn, said that nothing had proceeded from the pulpit or the platform or the press that was equal in importance to what Mrs. King had told us. He announced that medicin was a humbug, and that three-fourths of all the physicians lived on the folly of the rest of the world. His first instructions to his female patients was to take off their corsets, which had been followed with gratifying results The corset compressed and hampered every one of the organs upon which life depended except the brain. The result is that the average woman is made up chiefly of a backache and a headache, and these are what a man marries. Parents who are rearing daughters under the pressure of stays will one day be obliged to answer to deformed and debilitated young women the question why they were not properly instructed in their early youth.

Mr. King was called upon to say something about reform in dress, but only replied briefly that he was glad enough to get any clothes at all.

Mrs. Whitehead could not criticise either Dr. Abbott or Mrs. King. She therefore had to differ with Mrs. Leonard. She would ask that lady what she knew experimentally about wearing trousers. As for herself, she preferred pants to skirts, and long skirts to short ones. Both, however, should be discarded in favor of the dual garment. The Liberal Club, the speaker thought, should agitate the repeal of the laws which prevented women from dressing in men's clothes.

There had been various interruptions during the evening by boisterous persons in the audience, who had been several times called to order by the chairman without avail. Dr. Lambert therefore related an appropriate anecdote, the moral of which was that a silk purse could not be constructed from the ear of a pig. He then proceeded to discuss the relation of dress to health. A voice shouted out an interruption. The chairman was about to rap for order, but the doctor stopped him. "You can't," said he, "make a silk purse out of a pig's ear, and you can't make these fellows behave like gentlemen." 2d voice: "Say that again!" Dr. Lambert: "That's another case." 1st voice: "You can't tell a silk purse when you see it." Dr. Lambert: "But I can tell a pig's ear." This ended the dialog, to the great relief of the listeners. The doctor continued by saying that expansion of the chest should be encouraged, because thereby more oxygen was admitted to the lungs, and oxygen was health. When that fact was understood, the question would not be, "How is your health?" but "How do you oxydate?"

Mrs. King, in her closing remarks, said she had not been seriously disturbed by the interruptions of the gentlemen present, and she was much gratified by the courtesy displayed. The question of corsets was subsidiary; that of trousers was paramount; because, when women's legs were emancipated from the thraldom of skirts, they would take such exercise as would make the freeing of their lungs a matter of necessity.

At the next meeting Mr. John E. Remsburg will speak on "The Sabbath."

Canadian Notes.

Yesterday afternoon Charles Watts lectured in Albert Hall on "Bible Saints." It is remarkable, the persistency of type which the Jews present, physically and mentally. The modern Jewish dealers in second-hand clothes and receivers of stolen goods bear a very close resemblance to their forefathers, the saints, the patriarchs and first founders of the race. In the evening Mr. Watts's theme was the "Christian God," the "God of the Bible," in contradistinction to every other kind of god whatsoever. The Christian God is copied from the Jewish God, the Jewish God was copied from the gods of preceding theologies of the ancient world. The Christian God is a survival of the gods of savage men when in a very low state of intelligence, their social and mental condition being but little above that of the beasts of the field. Mrs. Watts recited a poem by a Freethought author. The bewitching declaimer made a magnificient display of the elocutionary art, and held her audience spell-bound to the finale, when she was greeted with an overwhelming burst of applaus.e

Mrs. Watts made her first essay in Toronto in a piece demanding an exhibition of tragic power on Sunday last. In that fine poem by Lara, entitled, "The God Horror," there are passages of great force and intensity. These were declaimed by the charming elocutionist with a vehemence that carried the audience away with its storm of passion. The music of her voice was shown to good advantage in the rhythm, the gentle rise and fall of tone, the sweet cadences required at some points of the poem. The erect and elastic poise of the form, the threatening crest and flashing eye of her outbu rsts of passion, raised a perfect furor and whirlwind of applause.

Prometheus is the same god as the Christian deity which we see emblazoned as an eye surrounded with rays of glory, and casting its beams of light upon the affairs of our world. Indeed, under this designation of Providence, he continues to this day a more fashionable deity than the Christ or Logos of St. John. We find acknowledgments of dependence upon divine "Providence," and the blessing of Providence or Prometheus by the sovereigns and parliaments and governments all over Christendom, where the introduction of the name of Jesus Christ in the place of Prometheus or Providence would not sound right or proper. Prometheus was a god who united the divine and human nature in one person, and was confessedly both god and man—perfect god and perfect man—of a reasonable soul and human flesh subsisting—equal to the father as touching his godhead, but inferior to the father as touching his manhood, who, although he was god and man, yet was he not two, but one Prometheus—one not by conversion of the godhead into flesh, but by taking the manhood into god—one altogether not by confusion of substance, but by unity of person, for as the reasonable soul and flesh is one man, so god and man is one Prometheus, who for us men and for our salvation came down from heaven, and was incarnate, and was made man, and was crucified also for us; under force and strength he suffered and descended into hell, rose again from the dead; he ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of the father, God Almighty. Thus we see the Christian creed is a literal copy of the pagan creed of Prometheus, and it is more than a striking coincidence that the name Prometheus is exactly synonymous with the Logos or "Word," an epithet applied to St. John, the god-man-deity of the Christians.

Situated near the head waters of the river Credit, in the region of the hight of land that divides the streams of Ontario which run north from those that run south, surrounded by romantic scenery, is Alton. To this favored spot, on Wednesday last, wended their way from the surrounding districts and the most distant parts of Canada the pilgrims of Freethought. The mission of this "Pilgrim's Progress" was to celebrate the opening of a "Secular Hall," built and owned by the Freethinkers of Alton. A prominent object to strangers and visitors will be the Hall of the Freethinkers, over the door of which is the inscription, "Hall of Science." The Algie family (who are owners of various mill properties in the neighborhood, and employ a number of Freethought families in their mills) erected the hall to a large extent out of their own private pockets. There were speechifying, and music, and play-acting during the day, winding up with a luxurious ball at night. It was a grand triumphal day for Freethought in Canada; may it be an earnest of good things to come, when Freethought halls and Freethought ideas shall cover the land as the waters cover the sea.

News and Notes from the Field.

Sunday, Dec. 21st, I had the pleasure of spending with one of Canada's stanch Freethinkers, Mr. Thomas Littlehales, of Hamilton, Ont. He is superintendent of the city gas works, and is a man of prominence both in business and social circles, but he is fearless in the expression of his views and convictions, and allies himself openly with the Secular movement. In one thing he is quite fortunate and shows that Freethinking and science are by no means opposed to art and beauty. He has the gift of music, and all his children, from four to fourteen years of age, hav the same endowment. He himself is an excellent player upon the violoncello; his eldest daughter, Miss Edith, touches the violin with exquisit skill, and two of his boys also play the violin, so he has a fine quartet in his own family circle, and the material for a grand concert every Sunday afternoon, to one of which I had the pleasure of listening, and it was a treat indeed. Hamilton is quite gifted in the way of music. One of its young ladies is already a scholar at Leipsic, and is ranked as one of the best players at that famous center of art. I listened to a young genius only fourteen years old, George Fox, and his touch and rendering were truly marvelous. Mr. Littlehales has a musical festival at his house every Friday evening, and among his guests are a dozen or more young ladies who can play the violin. So music will not die out with Freethought, but will be more beautiful and more welcome then ever.

Come to look over Hamilton, it is a fine-looking and progressiv city. It has more manufactures than any other place in Canada. It has 40,000 inhabitants, English, Scotch, and Irish, being about equal in numbers. It is constantly growing, although, just now, it is suffering from the hard times; about four hundred workmen having been discharged recently from the shops, which, of course, affects the growth of our own cause, for it is among the workingmen that we find our best supporters.

Back of Hamilton, a mile, perhaps, from the sparkling lake, is a huge bluff, which, at first, looks like a mountain, but is really a table-land, on a level with the bosom of lake Erie, and so as we look upon this towering hight we hav some vivid conception of the vastness of those tumbling waters as they roll down from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario.

In an elegant part of the city, fronting this cliff, is a splendid building, a Boys' Home, the gift of a munificent Freethinker, Mr. Bigelow, a noble contradiction of the atrocious lie of Christians that Freethought never did anything for the welfare of the world.

There is a good Secular society here, of which Mr. Littlehales is president, and Mr. George Maddox, an enthusiastic worker, is secretary. It has fine material, and will no doubt be a successful enterprise. I had the pleasure of speaking to it on Sunday evening on "The New American or Secular Church." The evening was stormy, but there was a fair attendance and appreciativ listeners.

Mr. Watts has done a good work here in laying the foundation for a Secular movement which, with the assistance of Messrs. Littlehales, Maddox, and others, is destined to be a success. Mr. Watts will lecture here on the 4th of January, and Mrs. Watts will giv one of her admirable recitations.

Watts lectured in Toronto on Sunday, the 21st, afternoon and evening. In the afternoon his subject was "Bible Saints," and those who hav heard our friend can imagin what kind of a lecture he would giv on those uncertain fellows, who might hav had some good qualities, but which were mixed also with those which were by no means of any benefit to the world.

In the evening Mr. Watts lectured on "The Christian Deity." His lecture was preceded by a brilliant recitation by Mrs. Watts, "The God Horror," which was received with tremendous applause, and was such a poetical and artistic demolition of the "tyrant of the skies" that there seemed but very little for Mr. Watts's glowing arguments and telling illustrations to accomplish. However, between this man and woman of modern times, the monarch—or rather anarch—of ancient night was obliged to beat a precipitate retreat, and the glory of Freethought flashed forth the heaven that will spring from our living humanity, and not from the blank spaces.

Mr. Watts will lecture at Toronto next Sunday afternoon and evening. Afternoon subject, "More Bible Saints," evening subject, "Orthodox Fictions. The Fall and the Atonement." Our Canadian friends are pushing things with vigor. I myself go next Sunday to Alton to enjoy the glorious privilege of speaking in the first Freethought hall of Canada, a description of which has already appeared in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Mr. Watts and myself will be at the great celebration and Paine jubilee at Linesville, which is known throughout the Liberal public as being one of the livest places for Freethought in all the world. It is not a large place, but it sheds its beams over the country, and its influence is wide as humanity.

Fraternally, SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Liberals to the Rescue!

TO THE TENT! TO THE TENT! ENLIST FOR THE SUMMER CAMPAIGN—VOLUNTEERS WANTED.

We are in receipt of a very large number of letters from different parts of the field, that repeat the same pitiful refrain:

"Orthodox strong, and in full possession. Quite a large Liberal element here, but most of them lack back-bone. Fear to take a stand; dare not take part in Liberal organization; afraid of loss of business or employment. Influential people, those controling business interests, bend the servil knee to Mother Church. Nothing can be done. No hall obtainable for Liberal lectures."

Shall we passivly submit to this condition of things, and make no effort?

Too long hav Liberals allowed themselvs to be misrepresented, maligned, and ostracized. We owe it to ourselvs, our children, our friends and neighbors, to make the Truth manifest and let the people realize how grossly they hav been deceived by their religious teachers.

Let us carry the war into Africa. They will not let us into their halls in winter. We will pitch our tents in their midst in summer, and popularize Liberalism, make known to the people its teachings and principles, and the justice and need of securing the Nine Demands and the secularization of our government.

A tent campaign is the best possible means to accomplish this. We need a sixty-foot diameter tent, with forty-foot center-piece, so we can use it as circular tent (sixty feet), or pavilion, 60x100; flags, banners, mottoes, etc.; comfortably seated, cool and cheerful, brilliantly illuminated at night; large, excellent, volunteer choir to giv brilliant concert of humorous and sentimental songs; lectures (every afternoon and evening, and Sunday mornings) that shall stir the people, create interest, work up a force of excitement, set people thinking and reading. Lectures that shall make plain the teachings and principles of Liberalism, convince all of the justice of the Nine Demands, and that the Secularization of our government will promote the best interests and welfare of all the people.

Advertise with flaming bills on every barn and available place within five miles of the tent. Bill the town and vicinity thoroughly as a circus does. Hav a tent company, independent of the choir, of from ten to twenty volunteers, discreet, intelligent ladies and gentlemen, well versed in the truth. Let the lecturer divide the country within a radius of five miles into districts, and assign each volunteer a district. Let them visit every house, and leave a program of the tent meetings. Hav a supply of leaflets on each of the Nine Demands. Where an interview can be had, present a leaflet on the subject of that evening's lecture (leaflets written so as to awake thought, but not arouse prejudice). Wherever kindly received enter in your memorandum book name, residence, etc., and subject especially interested in. Call again and loan publication on that subject. Next time leave copy of Liberal papers. Next, solicit subscriptions, etc. When change of district is made, post each other on peculiarities of the people, etc. Endeavor to sell Liberal books, etc. You must be always kind, cheerful, and patient listeners, sympathetic, genial, polite, but persistent. At tent meetings, on the alert to greet and welcome those visited. Seek to make acquaintance with those in attendance who appear most interested.

The lecturer should, on every hand-bill and program, as well as at every meeting, from the rostrum invite any minister of repute, of good standing in his own denomination, to discuss the question of Secularism, or, if they prefer, offer free use of the tent and sole occupancy of the rostrum, to present the evidence of Christianity; either half, or all of any afternoon, or from eight to nine o'clock, the first hour, and best half of the evening.

Think how all this would, by its very novelty, draw immense crowds, and impart courage to the weaklings; how it would popularize Liberalism; make the people familiar with our principles; the aims and objects of the National Liberal League; and thus break the power of priestcraft and negativ the falsehood and abuse hurled upon us from the pulpit; how it would insure the careful reading of an immense amount of the very best Liberal literature, and increase the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, and our other best Liberal periodicals; how the novelty and excitement would insure long, full reports in all the newspapers, so that the good accomplished at the places where the tent was pitched would be only half the real benefit obtained.

Now, the experience gained by all who enlist in the tent company will render them most efficient workers and able counselors in propagandism in their own neighborhood. Who will help in this great, grand, noble work? We should be armed and equipped, ready to take the field by the first day of May. Let all who favor a real, earnest effort to thus popularize Liberalism, and remedy the lamentable condition of things referred to at the commencement of this article, send contributions at once to Courtlandt Palmer, treasurer of the National Liberal League, 855 Broadway, New York. State distinctly for Tent Fund. Send at once. The tent has to be made to order, and we want to contract for it at once. We must purchase for cash, so as to get rock-bottom price. Do not delay. Decide at once how much you will giv to secure the secularization of the government, and deliver from the purgatory of fear, and restore to freedom, hope, and happiness those now shackled by superstition, slaves to the domineering power of priestcraft.

"I hav just read Mr. Remsburg's pamphlet on 'Bible Morals.' It is a valuable addition to Freethought literature. It is cheap and should be bought and read by every Secularist in America, and circulated among any of the orthodox who are likely to be convinced by fair evidence.

"December, 1884. W. MCDONNELL."

"'Bible Morals' is one more guide-post toward Liberalism, and a most plain and pointed one, too. I do not see how any one can read a page of this little brochure and not feel that in it the holy volume has found a foe that will strike it to the heart. It points out passage, verse, and line as a license for every crime in the calendar, not stopping at any, from red-handed murder to robbing a bird of its young. It condones every sort of vice, crime, lust, rapine, and cruelty the brain of man can conceive, or his hand perpetrate; and shows that all is done in the name of the most high. I hope every woman in the land will send and get this little book, and read and study it. Every mother's heart should quake and shudder at the 'cruelty to children' that this horrible book advises and orders. 'Beat him with a rod;' 'stone him, that he die;' 'they shall be dashed to pieces;' bears tare forty and two of them; 'I will send wild beasts among you which shall rob you of your children;' 'they may become vagabonds and beggars,' 'perish by famin,' etc., etc. All these things are done to helpless little ones, and generally as punishment to the parents. The injustice to woman herself is so terrible that I wonder how any modest and refined wife, mother, or maid can read it, and not blush for shame to think a tender and loving father could thus doom his daughters to such a destiny. It is too bad and vile to bear quoting, and were it put into common language THE TRUTH SEEKER would not dare publish it. Just read pages 25 to 28, and see what this old book of condensed godliness condemns woman to, and then decide if you will longer call it moral, chaste, pure, or holy. It teaches intemperance, obscenity, cruelty to animals, theft, robbery, murder, and all that is mean and degrading to humanity, and 'Bible Morals' classifies each list of crimes, and givs chapters and verses where each kind is indorsed and approved of by God and his chosen people. It is a handy book for our folks when wishing to show the superstitious ones what their God-book contains, indorses, and teaches. I hope and believe it will hav an immense sale and do a great and good work.

"ELMINA D. SLENKER."

He says "government has no moral function;" that is, it has no right nor authority to restrain immorality. It cannot properly protect the good citizen from the vices, crimes, and outrages of the scoundrel. He means the government has no right to provide schools, reformatories, or restraints for the outlaw, the plunderer, the robber, or the murderer; and that society should hav no security, no redress, from the constituted authorities. If this is really the case, will he please tell us what governments are for? If governments cannot serve us, protect and save us, then we evidently hav no longer any use for them. Why, to restrain a thief is a moral function; yet he says, virtually, government has no such right. If so, then government has no right. How supremely ridiculous! Governments can declare war, force millions to battle—where hundreds of thousands are slain; and spend billions of money; they can liberate millions from the vice and immorality of slavery; they can keep a standing army to protect themselvs against the disloyal and immoral wrong-doer, yet they hav no moral function. What hav they, then?

"Personal liberty is inviolable;" another vagary. Was it so during the rebellion? A man has the liberty to pay his taxes and conform to the laws. Has he the inviolable liberty to refuse to do either? If he has the liberty to indulge in a vice, can he also commit a crime with impunity? Does he mean to say the government is violating personal liberty, and guilty of a crime in restraining the thousands of the criminal and vicious from their liberty to perpetrate their depredations on society? Because the manufacturers, dealers, and consumers of intoxicants enjoy their personal liberty inviolate to inflict one of the greatest wrongs and curses on society, should every vicious person, therefore, hav his liberty? Is he longing to see, and is he in favor of, the exercise of personal liberty, till it runs into unrestrained brutality and barbarism?

That the authority to restrict personal liberty is somtimes abused is admitted; but to say that "personal liberty is inviolable" belies all past experience, ignores history, and condemns the philosophy of social and civilized life. Mr. Bell is opposed to "any legislation which assumes to regulate the conduct of the individual, except in so far as it directly and immediately affects the rights or interests of others." There is a blind and a snare in the words "directly" and "immediately." A multitude of crimes are premeditated and are just as effectually perpetrated, mediately and indirectly, that hav produced all the evils of crimes committed immediately and directly. And the mediate, gradual poison of alcohol is one of them. People hav been starved to death, harried to death, and frightened to death. Bad men often accomplish, mediately and indirectly, by bribing the weak and impressible, the crimes which they would not commit directly, and which would not hav been committed at all but for their own unscrupulous meanness and perfidy. Yet governments cannot legislate or meddle with such villainy, no matter how clear and positiv it may be, because it was not perpetrated directly. This may be Liberalism, but it is not justice or humanity. Bad men hav instigated riots, then stood back while their dupes committed the overt act. Tens of thousands of drunkards' wives and families hav been mediately, gradually, and indirectly made to suffer from starvation, neglect, abuse, or maltreatment even unto death.

Every crime or vice, however atrocious, if it be committed mediately or indirectly, should be exempt from all legal cognizance, is the beautiful and sublimely Liberal theory of Mr. Bell. In the face of the indescribable abomination of the liquor traffic, is it evidence of either wisdom or common sense for us to stand and parley and split hairs over the question, or about the distinction, as to whether we can do anything strictly and technically within the bounds of our moral or our civil rights? Hav the barriers we hav set up in our imagination left us helpless and defenseless in the presence and under the curse of an implacable enemy?

He says, "There is no short cut to the welfare of society." But there is a summary, short cut to self-defense, and society will continue to use it even at the risk of its occasional abuse.

There is a circumbendibus, never-ending, and long-lingering cut or laceration that is in beautiful harmony with the slow, the heartless, murderous philosophy and abstract morality of Mr. Bell.

Is Mr. Bell's mental and moral vision so obfuscated and distorted that he can see nothing in the line and order of cause and effect on this subject, as they really exist, and as most unbiased people see them? He says, "Prohibitionists do not see that it is wretchedness and despair which plunge so many men into intemperance." Whereas the facts are that tippling, moderate drinking, and the drinking habit contracted by youth and young single men degrades and demoralizes them, destroys self-respect, and their enslavement to the debauching habit is what drags them and their families in later years into "wretchedness and despair." Nearly all drinkers contract the habit while young, when without care or domestic responsibility. But few men who never indulged in drink in early life, who grew up in total abstinence, ever take to drunkenness in maturer years from "wretchedness and despair," or from any other cause. And these few would not do it if the traffic was not legalized and defended by the plausible, insinuating sophistry of its many apologists like Mr. Bell. It is very rarely indeed that a total abstinent takes to drink from wretchedness and despair. Why is Mr. Bell so blind to the facts in the case, and so lynx-eyed to see what is not true and what does not exist? If there are some temperate people who toil the long, dreary hours, liv cheap and remain poor, their helplessness and poverty in most cases may be traced to drunken ancestors, who transmitted to them physical, mental, and moral imbecility, both by heredity, example, and drunken domestic and business training. And, according to Mr. Bell, this sad inheritance of the innocent is comparativly a virtue. It is no crime, no wrong, compared to the one the prohibitionists would commit in drying up the fountains, or cutting short the stream whence it nearly all flows. This flood of intoxication produces the feeble human material, directly or indirectly, on which the capitalist can depend, and by which he is tempted to furnish them employment, not for their own meager support, but for his own aggrandizement.

The rum traffic enables the capitalist to do much more in the way of oppression than could be done without it, and the anti-prohibitionist is doing what he can to favor the complicity.

Mr. Bell "clearly shows that the prohibition movement is a sentimental, rather than a logical one." That is, he shows all the horrid and appalling realities of intemperance that sends sixty thousand drunkards, more or less, annually to untimely graves; the poverty, sorrow, and affliction of sixty thousand families; that four-fifths of the crime, pauperism, and insanity, and of the vast expenditure of supporting prisons, almshouses, and insane asylums, and the cost of supporting criminal courts throughout the country, and of the wretchedness and despair in society, are only a sentiment, and not reality. Would it not be well if Mr. Bell could be prohibited from diffusing such ideas of sentimentalism? Would prohibition make this vice of his a crime? If so, we will not ask it, for his new theories and logic and his conceptions of sentimentalism can affect no one but with surprise and commiseration, save those who are already infatuated or enslaved by rum, or with that capacious sense of liberty which justifies the commission or non-commission of crime at option.

If Mr. Bell's Liberalism should rule, there would soon be no society to govern, and no need for governments to exercise either moral or civil function. There would be no crimes to distinguish from vices, and personal anarchy would be inviolable, sentimentalism would rule the world, and there would be no longer use for facts, logic, or common sense.

A theory of morals, of civil government, of philosophy so abstract, sentimental, and transcendent that it disdains matter-of-fact experience, that in its supreme loftiness cannot come down to the practical affairs of life and men, as we find them, may do to amuse the logician or the sophist, the visionary and speculativ, but it is of no use for any practical purposes of good. Were it not for the evil they might work on the young, the doubtful, and undecided, and for the comfort and encouragement they offer to the tippler and toper, and the prestige they giv to the traffic, such theories and special pleadings had better remain unnoticed.

The source whence they come, and the publicity they hav received among those whom they might affect unfavorably, are the only reasons that these fallacies should be noticed and exposed. T. E. L.

Money.—No. 1.

In 1879 we had in the United States $683,943,799 of paper money, and $427,206,852 of specie or metallic money, making a total of $1,111,150,651 of money in the country. This was equal to $23.64 per capita.

IS MONEY WEALTH?

No one will contend that paper money is wealth, or that it is wealth more than to the value of the paper of which it is made and the cost of printing. No one will contend that a $100 bill is more wealth than a $1 bill made the same size and of the same material; for, if all the paper money in the country should be destroyed, it could be replaced at the cost of the paper and printing. If an article of clothing or of furniture should be destroyed, it would take its full value in labor to replace it; but it is not so with paper money. For this reason it is evident that it is not wealth but to the extent of the cost of its production.

The same principle of reasoning may be applied to metallic money. It is only to be considered wealth to the extent of the cost of its production, but the cost of its production is much nearer its money value than is that of paper money. But, if all the nations of the earth should cease to use gold for money, it is quite probable that its market value would be very considerably reduced, and it is a fine question to decide whether gold should be considered wealth to a greater extent than its value would be if not used for money.

IS MONEY A MEASURE OF VALUE?

The value of a thing depends upon its utility and its scarcity, and the whims, fancies, and fashions of the purchasers. Value is not a fixed quality of a thing, as length, weight, etc. It is an ideal thing, and cannot be measured. The value of a horse may depend upon its color or the existence or non-existence of a spot on his forehead. His value may change every day, and may double in one hour, according to the whims of some purchaser. We can determin the length of any thing by applying the yard measure to it; we can determin its weight by placing it on the scales; but we cannot determin its value by applying money to it. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided that money is not a measure or standard of value, but that it represents value.

MONEY REPRESENTS VALUE

much on the same principle that x represents the unknown quantity in an algebraic problem. We simply agree, for the sake of convenience, to let it pass for value. The milkman sells tickets, and these tickets may be of almost no intrinsic value, but we take them, and they represent a certain value or quantity of milk. No person imagins that the milk tickets must be of the same value as the milk they represent. It is simply a method of keeping tally, or a crude method of bookkeeping. This is all that money is, or that it need or should be. It is a great national system of bookkeeping—only this and nothing more. The less intrinsic value we put into money the better, for then, when it wears out, we lose so much the less. Any kind of money is good that we can pass for as much as we gave for it, and no kind of money is good unless we can do this.

But we are told that paper money is not good unless it has a specie basis. How is it that the milk tickets are good without a metallic basis? Why cannot national, general tickets be made as good as milk tickets without any metallic basis? But if paper money is not good without a metallic basis, we must hav had, according to the above showing, $56,736,947 of bad paper money in circulation in December, 1879; for we had that amount of paper money more than of metallic in circulation.

Money should be made of some light material, and should not be bulky. It should also be made of durable material. But the most important quality of money is that

IT SHOULD BE OF UNIFORM VALUE.

Money should be made as near as possible to represent the same amount of labor. Since labor is the creator of all values, it is evident that it is the true basis of money. If it requires as much labor to produce one bushel of wheat as three bushels of corn, we should be able to sell three bushels of corn for money that would buy one bushel of wheat; and when we take this money we want to feel confident that its value will not diminish whilst in our possession. A money whose value can be changed by money loaners is liable to be used by them as tricky gamblers use cards to enrich themselvs at the expense of all others. And as there are many different kinds of tricks in card playing, so there are many tricks in money playing. But there is no trick so profitable to the money kings as that one of changing the value of money.

Hutchinson, Kan. J. G. MALCOLM.

Does the Fear of Future Punishment Make People Better?

My attention was called to this subject recently by a letter received from a lady friend, asking, "Is there not some restraining influence in the old beliefs?" Most orthodox Christians claim, and seem to believe, that without such restraint we should be like a ship without a rudder, and liable to go altogether to the bad. My Catholic friends often say they know if it were not for their belief in God and future punishment they would commit any or all crimes known to the world, as they should hav opportunity or inclination. And a good Methodist lady said recently that were it not for her religion, she would enjoy herself in all manner of excesses that the worst of her sex sometimes practice. Priestcraft, for its own selfish ends, has so thoroughly indoctrinated its followers with such ideas that many of them do believe it. And the priests know it is necessary to keep them in that state, or their occupation is gone.

Has humanity fallen so low, is our sense of justice and right so debased, that we cannot enjoy ourselvs without doing wrong or committing crime? Is there then no enjoyment for mankind in the practice of good deeds, and in the consciousness of doing and saying that which will make us better in this life? That there is not seems to be the theory of orthodox Christianity.

This doctrin, that our only restraining influence is fear, is pernicious, and when coupled with its kindred dogma, that through priest or prayer all crimes may be forgiven, is only a license to do wrong.

Let us see how this beautiful restraining Christian theory works in practice. The good Catholic is required periodically to go to the confessional, where, through the instrumentality of the priest, sins are pardoned and the person confessing is absolved from all penalties incurred on account of sins committed. And so it may be from week to week, and year to year, through a long life of iniquity and crime. A person may liv a life as bad as the worst, and go straight to heaven at death, if the priest is only present to perform the necessary rites. And should it happen that a Catholic is cut off without the services of a priest, he may only go to purgatory for a time, for priests and angels hav power by their intercessions to place the soul of the person who dies in sin in all the glories of paradise. So we see a Catholic goes to heaven, notwithstanding his life may hav been as bad as the worst. But mind you, priestcraft says, he must hav been a Catholic. But our Protestant Christians will say, "That is popery. We take no stock in any such mummery as that, and do not believe that kind of religion will save anybody."

Well, let us see how our Protestant Christians stand in this matter. They hav even an easier and cheaper way than Catholics. They may do all the wrong, commit any crime, theft, arson, murder, any or all known in the code, and all they hav to do is, at any time wherever they may be, to penitently ask God by prayer to forgiv them through the merits of the atoning blood of Christ, and it is done—God always forgivs the penitent sinner. The old hymn says,

> "While the lamp holds out to burn,
> The vilest sinner may return."

While I think some of the teachings of these religions result in good, I am constrained to believe that they may and should be replaced by something better. Let us illustrate this Christian doctrin of pardon on confession, or for the asking, by comparison with the practice of the same principle in matters pertaining to this life.

A notorious criminal is arraigned before a court for a heinous crime; according to law he has forfeited all right to liberty or life. But if he will plead guilty, and promis not to do wrong in future, the judge will absolve him from all punishment, and let him go free to commit the same or any other acts in the future, and he, or any number of others, may continue to do the same, and be pardoned for the asking.

Will our Christian friends claim that such a state of things would exercise a restraining influence for good? No; they would scout the bare idea, and claim, with reason, that such laws would do more harm than good.

According to the conclusions to which the foregoing leads it seems evident that the doctrins and dogmas of Christianity hav been and are productiv of more harm than good. But we should not claim that all its teachings and practices are bad.

Many of our charitable institutions originated with, and are sustained by, Christian organizations. They are a benefit to humanity in the world at large, and Christians may ask with much pertinence what Liberals and Freethinkers propose to do or giv the world in exchange if they succeed in convincing people that these old creeds are false. Liberals should not be mere iconoclasts; they should not try to tear down unless they can build up. The mass of religious people honestly believe their religion to be not only true, but productiv of good. It is dear to them, and we should not ask them to renounce it unless we can formulate, teach, and practice a better way.

I believe we can, but it cannot be done all at once; it must grow. And it will require the best and most persevering efforts of talented, wise, and good men and women to accomplish it.

Let us teach and practice that it is better to use our best endeavors to teach the people how to shun that which will produce misery, and seek for and do everything that will enhance the comforts and enjoyments of this life, that is real and tangible, rather than in an imaginary existence of which all experience and common sense teach us we cannot know, however much we may believe.

It is well to cultivate a hope that there is a future life, for it can do no harm and to most people it givs pleasure. Then let us teach the very just and reasonable theory that should there prove to be another and immortal state of existence, we shall be likely to start there just as much better as good conduct, while here, entitles us to receive.

Then, in place of what I hav endeavored to show is the false doctrin of forgivness for the mere asking of all sins or wrong doings, let us teach that punishment will inevitably follow transgression whether of the civil law or the law of nature.

Let our theological colleges, our cathedrals and churches, be turned into places where everything pertaining to our duties to ourselves and each other shall be taught; let us strive to learn everything pertaining to this world, that mankind may more and more seek for that knowledge that will enable us to liv longer, better, and more enjoyable lives.

Let our men and women of talent, education, and ability to instruct be heard, if they will only lay aside all doctrins, dogmas, and creeds pertaining to imaginary life in some unknown and unknowable future existence, and giv us their best thoughts of how to liv instead of how to die.

C. CLOSE.

Kansas Corn.

Smiling and beautiful, heaven's dome
Bends softly over our prairie home.
But the wide, wide lands that stretched away
Before my eyes in the days of May,
The rolling prairie's billowy swell,
Breezy upland and the timbered dell,
Stately mansion and hut forlorn,
All are hidden by walls of corn.
All the wide world is narrowed down
To walls of corn, now sere and brown.

What do they hold—these walls of corn,
Whose banners toss on the breeze of morn?
He who questions may soon be told.
A great state's wealth these walls enfold.
No sentinels guard these walls of corn,
Never is sounded the warder's horn;
Yet the pillars are hung with gleaming gold,
Left all unbarred, though thieves are bold.
Clothes and food for the toiling poor,
Wealth to heap at the rich man's door;
Meat for the healthy, and balm for him
Who moans and tosses in chamber dim;
Shoes for the barefooted, pearls to twine
In the scented tresses of ladies fine;
Things of use for the lowly cot,
Where—bless the corn!—want cometh not;
Luxuries rare for the mansion grand,
Gifts of a rich and fertil land—
All these things, and so many more
It would fill a book to name them o'er,
Are hid and held in these walls of corn,
Whose banners toss on the breeze of morn.

Where do they stand, these walls of corn,
Whose banners toss on the breeze of morn?
Open the atlas, conned by rule
In the olden days of the district school,
Point to the rich and bounteous land,
That yields such fruits to the toiler's hand.
"Treeless desert," they called it then,
Haunted by beasts and forsook by men.
Little they knew what wealth untold
Lay hid where the desolate prairies rolled.
Who would hav dared, with brush or pen,
As this land is now, to paint it then?
And how would the wise ones hav laughed in scorn,
Had prophet foretold these walls of corn,
Whose banners toss in the breeze of morn!

The Drunkard's Wife.

In a hospital ward a woman lay
Painfully gasping her life away;
So bruised and beaten you scarce could trace
Womanhood's semblance in form or face,
Yet the hair that over the pillow rolled
In a tangled mass, was like threads of gold;
And never a sculptor in any land
Molded a daintier foot or hand.

Said one who ministered to her need:
"None but a coward could do this deed;
And what bitter hate must hav nerved the arm
That a helpless creature like this could harm."
Then the dim eyes, hazy with death's eclipse,
Slowly unlocked, and the swollen lips
Murmured faintly: "He loves me well—
My husband—'twas drink—be sure you tell
When he comes to himself—that I forgiv;
Poor fellow—for him—I would like to liv."
A shudder, a moan, as the words were said
And a drunkard's wife on the couch lay dead.

O fathers who hold your daughters dear,
Somebody's daughter is lying here.
O brothers of sisters, come and see
What the fate of your precious ones may be;
O man, however you love your home!
Be it palace or cottage, 'neath heaven's blue dome,
This demon of drink can enter in,
For law strikes hands and bargains with sin.

You hav legalized crime, you hav the gold.
Now hand them over, the sons you sold—
Keep pushing them forward, Drink, boys, drink!
Your fathers are paid for your souls, they think.
And in the great mart where mammon strives,
Cheapest of all things are human lives.

—E. V. Wilson in the Inter-Ocean.

"Take Heed, Ye Unwise Among the People."

"Take heed, ye unwise among the people;
O ye fools, when will ye understand?"
From pulpit or choir beneath the steeple,
Though the words be fierce, the tones are bland.
By a louder than the church's echo thunders
In the ears of men who may not choose but hear;
And the heart in him that hears it leaps and wonders,
With triumphant hope astonished, or with fear.
For the names whose sound was power awaken
Neither love nor reverence now nor dread;
Their strongholds and shrines are stormed and taken,
Their kingdom and all its works are dead.

Take heed, for the tide of time is risen;
It is full not yet, though now so high
That spirits and hopes long pent in prison
Feel round them a sense of freedom nigh,
And a savor keen and sweet of brine and billow,
And a murmur deep and strong of deepening strength.
Though the watchman dream, with sloth or pride for pillow,
And the night be long, not endless is its length.
From the springs of dawn, from clouds that sever,
From the equal heavens and the eastward sea,
The witness comes that endures for ever.
Till men be brethren and thralls be free.

. . . . . .

How long—for haply not now much longer—
Shall fear put faith in a faithless creed,
And shapes and shadows of truths be stronger
In strong men's eyes than the truth indeed?
If freedom be not a word that dies when spoken,
If justice be not a dream whence men must wake,
How shall not the bonds of the thralldom of old be broken,
And right put might in the hands of them that break?
For clear as a tocsin from the steeple
Is the cry gone forth along the land,
Take heed, ye unwise among the people;
O ye fools, when will ye understand?

—Swinburne.

Past and Future.

The old, old question of questions—if a man die will he liv again? remains still unsolved—still a mystery—a hidden mystery, men say, yet who does the hiding? Those who do not believe in myths and phantoms must look to other causes for the hiding—to our ignorance and lack of development, instead of imaginary beings.

Why we fail in obtaining the much desired solution of this all-important subject is mainly because light has always been sought from a single point of view—having a basis in the idea that by some mysterious overruling power we are, against our will and protest, brought into a world which we hav no part in making or fashioning, but in which we willingly liv a brief time, and are then ruthlessly, and against our will and protest, unceremoniously thrust out and never again seen, with no word of explanation or reason for such terrible outrageous actions.

This is the statement of apparent facts, and if they are facts the enigma will never be solved; and the conclusion inevitable in favor of the clay and boss potter theory.

This question looks differently if viewed in the light of modern science and philosophy. The well-known principle of the non-destructibility of matter, coupled with the equally logical one of its non-production in any of its form or manifestations, will form the basis of a new view of the subject.

Nature or creation (one and the same) is, and always has been, complete; either an atom added or an atom destroyed would indicate a fault—a mistake—hence life is co-incident with creation, and as indestructible as any part of it. Life, then, is natural; and death, being intensely antagonistic, the antipodes of life, is logically unnatural. In the organization of all animal life from man down, the principle of freedom of action to the extent which each organization will admit is in perfect development. Whatever else of imperfections there may be, this remains through all changes unchanged, and without this important characteristic, individuality would be impossible.

In the free exercise of this characteristic, in contact with nature's elements, we hav whatever of health, comfort, or happiness we obtain, being highest when our actions harmonize most, and lowest when in greatest antagonism with nature. It is not a rationally supposable case that nature ever antagonized itself at all, or was always warred against by intelligent beings whose happiness depended on harmonious surroundings, hence it is rationally presumable that, in the vast, illimitable past, there was a time of entire harmony on the earth.

This, then, would be the natural condition of things—a world without a disturbing cause—consequently, perfect days, perfect health, perfect happiness—with neither sorrow, pain, or death.

This conclusion is logically inevitable; and from that natural and happy condition of things down to the present the principle of freedom of action will account for each step.

That this natural state of existence and of nature is again attainable cannot reasonably be doubted, if the desired end is kept in view and our actions made to harmonize with nature.

What may be, may hav been; that which does not exist, or never has, cannot be attained. A future possibility is constructiv proof of a past probability. The earth, and every constituent of its development to-day, or of its possible future development, may hav been reduced to vapor in the long ago; but even that would hardly be conclusiv of its being then in a state of nature, but rather in a condition lacking nearly everything natural. This is self-evident.

Unnatural actions caused the first and every subsequent death, and, as a consequence, the first and every subsequent birth—the last being the logical outcome of the first. Hence our horrors are of our own invention and production.

There is not an ill that affects humanity or the world which man is not accountable for—not a twinge of pain; not a blast of cold or heat; not a storm, flood, or famin; nor a fleck of cloud that hides the sun, but has a human origin.

Man is his own destroyer, and, a priori, his own redeemer.

A CERTAIN Mr. Cole, who has for many years been the superintendent of a Church of England Sunday-school in the north of London, recently married his deceased wife's sister. The local clergy thereupon refused to admit him to the holy communion on the ground, probably, that he was a "notorious evil liver;" and the bishop of Bedford, "with great pain," has indorsed the action of the clergy. Mr. Cole has replied to the letter by joining a Nonconformist congregation.

IN the eighth chapter of Matthew we find Jesus complaining that the Son of man—that is, himself—had not where to lay his head; while in the first chapter of John he takes two disciples of the Baptist home with him and entertains them for a day. It is evident that the testimony of either Matthew or John is here capable of being construed as inaccurate.

Was Jesus of the House of David?

We fancied this was a pretty well settled query, but here comes a Catholic priest from Canada, who, having a little controversy with a friend of ours, sends him this "explanation" of the apparent discrepancy between Matthew and Luke, which our friend forwards to us and wishes explained:

"DEAR MR. MARREN: In reply to your inquiry how the following objection against the gospels is to be answered, I submit the following:

"The objection is thus made by Colonel Ingersoll: 'Is it not wonderful that Luke and Mattthew do not agree on a single name of Christ's ancestors for thirty-seven generations?'

"This objection is old, having been made by Julian the Apostate in the fourth century, and it was answered by St. Augustine. Of course, as there is no other contemporary work on Christ's life than the gospels, these are the only witnesses we can absolutely call upon. If, however, there is a way to account for the difference of the names, the difficulty will be answered, and the gospels will be vindicated.

"St. Luke wrote after St. Matthew, and knew of St. Matthew's gospel. Undoubtedly he refers to it in Luke i, 1: 'Many hav set forth a narration of the things that hav been accomplished among us, who were witnesses.'

"He could hav no reason to giv a different genealogy from St. Matthew, unless both were true, and readily understood to be so by his readers. Those who do not know the law of Jewish genealogies might be confused by the apparent discrepancy, but those who knew the law would find no discrepancy at all.

"The occurrence of two true genealogies quite distinct might happen in either of the following ways:

"1. By the law in Num. xxxvi, 8, every daughter with an inheritance should be wife to one of the family of the father's tribe; so the daughters of Zelophadad married their father's brothers' sons (verse 11).

"For the same reason Mary married her mother's brother's son. Mary's mother was Anna, the aunt of Joseph. Mathan was grandfather to both Joseph and Mary, and the genealogy of Joseph, given by St. Matthew, was, therefore, also the genealogy of Mary and of Christ, through Mathan to Solomon and David.

"Heli was the father of Mary (elsewhere called Joachim). Heli's genealogy is, therefore, the genealogy of Mary derived through Nathan from David.

"Christ is thus proved to be the son of David either through his grandfather Heli or his grandmother Anna; that is, through his great-grandfather Mathat given by St. Luke, or Mathan named by St. Matthew. Thus the names of the ancestors naturally differ.

"It may be objected that Joseph is called the 'son of Heli' in the Protestant version. Notice that the words 'the son' are in italics. This means that they are not in the original. In the original Greek we hav only 'of Heli,' as in the Catholic version.

"Nevertheless, by his marriage with Mary, Joseph was adopted into the family of Heli, being his son-in-law. He is therefore said to be 'of Heli,' and both genealogies are correct. Heli is thus brought in to make the genealogy that of Christ through his grandfather.

"2. A different explanation is given by other authorities.

"By Deuteronomy xxv, 5, 6, when a man dies childless the widow marries his brother in the name of the dead brother, and the children are in law reckoned as the children of the dead brother.

"Thus Heli died, and his wife married Jacob. Joseph was born of this marriage. Jacob and Heli were brothers from one mother, but of different fathers, Mathan and Mathat. Hence Jacob was the natural father of Joseph, Heli the legal father. St. Matthew givs the genealogy of Jacob, St. Luke that of Heli, and in both cases Christ is seen to be truly the son of David.

"Either genealogy shows the genealogy of Christ, since Mary's mother Anna was sister to Jacob.

"Either of these hypotheses shows that there is no discrepancy in the two genealogies, like cases to both having, no doubt, frequently occurred."

These explanations of Augustine hav also been adopted by some Protestant commentators. But no weight whatever can be attached to them, for the reason that other priests and commentators, equally distinguished, and some of the very highest church authorities, reject them.

This priest says Luke wrote after Matthew. That is not so, according to the best authorities. Neither is it true, that either "St. Luke" or "St. Matthew" wrote at all. The books ascribed to them are now known to be anonymous, but that of St. Luke is given the precedence. Luke's reference (i, 1) was not to any of the four gospels (see Davidson, Westcott, Waite, and others, whose commentaries are too long to introduce here). Luke had no reason for differing from Matthew other than that he knew no more of Matthew than Æsop knew of Swift and his "Gulliver's Travels."

The first explanation of the two genealogies is that Luke givs the pedigree of Mary, and not of Joseph. This is an assumption with no scriptural authority, for Luke mentions Joseph and not Mary, and Greek grammarians assure us that no possible rendering of the Greek will stand that construction. Luke (i, 27, and ii, 4,) declares Joseph to be of the house of David, while he nowhere says the same of Mary, or that she was the daughter of Heli. According to the epistles of James, or the Protevangelion (an apocryphal book), Mary's father was Joachim, who, our priest assures us, was identical with Heli. This is not so, and even if it were, it would not reconcile Matthew and Luke, for they both assert that they are giving the genealogy of Joseph. And if Christ's own words are of any weight, he did not believe himself to be of the house of David (see Matthew xxii, 41–46; Mark xii, 35–37; Luke xx, 41–44). The people who listened to Jesus, and those who wrote the gospels, believed Christ to be the carpenter's son, and according to the last three references cited, neither his father nor mother was believed to be of Davidical lineage (see Matthew xiii, 55; Mark vi, 3; Luke iv, 22; John vi, 42). It may be noted, in passing, that about the only point upon which the "evangelists" agree is that Jesus and his parents were not of royal blood.

The edge of this priest's argument is that Mary was the daughter of Heli, instead of Joseph being his son, as the Bible declares. This can be admitted only by impeaching the veracity of Luke—precisely what he is endeavoring not to do; establishing the identity of Heli and Joachim; and making canonical the apocryphal Protevangelion. Now it is easy enough to impeach the veracity of Luke (Matthew alone does it), but it cannot be established by any sufficient authority that Joachim was Heli, or that Mary was Heli's daughter. If the words "son of" in italics in Luke signify son-in-law, then Adam was, according to that theory, the son-in-law of God, which is nonsense. It is unreasonable to believe that "son-in-law" was meant to be expressed in each case from Christ to Jehovah, and there is no excuse for discriminating in the case of Joseph and Heli. Another point against the supposition that Mary was of royal blood is that she was a cousin of Elizabeth, whose husband was distinctly declared to be of the house of David, but nowhere is the claim made for either Mary or Elizabeth.

A slight comparison of Matthew and Luke made by Lord Amberley in his "Life of Jesus" (a chapter from "Analysis of Religious Belief," one of the best works ever published) will be pertinent here. After giving in parallel columns the genealogies as recorded by the only two evangelists who pretended to know how Jesus came to be born, Lord Amberley says:

"Various observations offer themselvs on these discrepant genealogies. In the first place it will be observed that Matthew, in his anxiety to show that the whole period comprised is divisible into three equal parts of fourteen generations each, has actually omitted no less than four generations contained in the authorities he followed. For since he traced the descent of Joseph through the royal line of Judah, we are enabled to check his statements by reference to the Book of Chronicles (1 Chron. iii), and thus to convict him of positiv bad faith. In the first instance he omits three kings, representing Uzziah as the son of Joram, who was his great-great-grandfather; in the second he passes over Jehoiachim, making Jehoiachin the son instead of the grandson of Josiah. In the third period we hav no authority by which to verify his statements beyond Zerubbabel, but his determination to carry out his numerical system at all hazards is shown by the double reckoning of Jehoiachin, at the close of the second and the beginning of the third division. The latter has in fact but thirteen generations, and it was only by this trick—a little concealed by the break effected through his allusion to the captivity—that the appearance of uniformity was maintained. Luke has adopted a different method. Leaving the line of kings, he connects Joseph with David through Nathan instead of Solomon. Now, beyond the fact that Nathan was the offspring of David and Bathsheba, nothing whatever is known about him. Indeed it may hav been his very obscurity, and the consequent facility of creating descendants for him, that led to his selection in preference to Solomon, though unless it were that his name stood next above Solomon's (2 Sam. v, 14)—there is no obvious reason for his being preferred to several other children of David. However, he answered the purpose as well as any, and after him it was not a difficult operation to invent a plausible list of names to fill up the gap between him and Joseph. The compiler of the list in Matthew had the advantage in so far that he did not require to draw on his imagination except for nine names between Zerubbabel and Joseph, while the compiler of the list in Luke had to supply the whole period from Nathan downwards with forefathers. But the second compiler had the advantage over the first inasmuch as his fraud did not admit of the same easy exposure by reference to its sources, and it was, on the whole, a safer course to desert history altogether than to falsify it in favor of an arithmetical fancy.

"Another discrepancy between the two writers remains to be noted; it is the enormous disproportion in the number of generations between David and Joseph. Matthew has twenty-five generations, and Luke forty, excluding Joseph himself. A difference of this magnitude—involving something like 400–450 years—is not to be surmounted by any process of harmonizing. To which it may be added that the two Evangelists, by assigning to Joseph different fathers, clearly inform us that his true father was unknown."

To this we may add the statement of Scott ("Life of Christ," p 20):

"Paul lays great stress on the circumstance that the promis given to Abraham was made, not to his seed, as of Mary, but to his 'seed which is Christ.' To whatever passages in the Psalms or elsewhere Peter may be supposed to refer, to the Jews unquestionably the words meant, what they appear to mean, that such anticipations could be fulfilled by a prenatural birth, without any known father, from a virgin of whose Davidic descent there is the slenderest possible evidence, or rather no evidence at all, is a conclusion which can be acceptable to those only who believe in alleged historical narrativs on no other grounds than that they wish them to be true, and dare not call them in question."

We conclude on this first "explanation" with the words of Dr. John McNaught, incumbent of St. Chrysostom's church, Everton, Liverpool:

"On the first glance these genealogies, as given by Matthew and Luke, are so evidently different that it has been the ordinary, if not invariable, practice of Christian harmonists and commentators to represent the former evangelist as recording the descent of Joseph, while the latter evangelist is said to hav given the pedigree of Mary. We will say nothing of the plausibility of this explanation, which acknowledges the genealogies to be wholly different, and supposes they belong to two persons. Our questions must rather affect the truthfulness of this mode of explaining away the difficulty. Let the reader bear in mind how Matthew states that 'Jacob begat Joseph, the husband of Mary,' and how Luke's words are, 'Joseph which was the son of Heli,' and then let the reader say whether it is truthful to allege that these different genealogies belong to different individuals. Is it not plain that each of them professes to trace the lineal descent of one and the same man, Joseph? If we are still to be told that when Matthew professes to giv the descent of Joseph, he is to be understood as giving the descent of Mary, then we simply rejoin that such an explanation is nothing more or less than an abandonment of the idea of inspirational infallibility; for it represents the Bible as saying one thing and meaning another."

The second "explanation" is a little wilder, if possible, than the first. "Heli died and his wife married Jacob." How does our priest know this? "Joseph was born of this marriage." What is the authority for that? "Jacob and Heli were brothers." In what part of the Bible is this found? "St. Matthew givs the genealogy of Jacob, St. Luke that of Heli. Either genealogy shows the genealogy of Christ, since Mary's mother Anna was sister to Jacob." Where, in what history, sacred or profane, is all this related? Ah, it is a hypothesis, the same as the first explanation! Well, until some more reasonable one, supported by at least one word of evidence is adduced, we shall not be blamed if we pay no attention to it. We hav men in the United States who can make better guesses than that and not half try.

Is It Dying?

Considering the heresy of Mr. Newton and the apathy manifested by the leaders of the Episcopal church toward his ecclesiastical crime, the Rev. Mr. Hague, Baptist, says that Infidelity is honeycombing the foundations of Episcopalianism, and that it is falling into manifest decay.

This charge induces Mr. Dana to likewise consider the situation, and he finds that there are several men now filling Episcopal pulpits who do not belong there, "unless a very great change has come over that conservativ church of recent years." For instance: "What is the Rev. Dr. Rylance of St. Mark's except a Christian Socialist? 'The system which makes it possible for one man to own a hundred millions of dollars is at the core rotten,' he said the other evening; and he has often experssed like sentiments, though his parish is one which includes men who are distinguished for rich ancestral possessions. In all New York there is not a clergyman who is so free in declaring socialistic opinions as Dr. Rylance, who seems to be a man of an exceedingly broad and liberal mind, though he is the rector of one of the most conservativ parishes in town. Bishop Potter himself is not afraid of modern ideas, and Bishop Littlejohn of Long Island is entirely familiar with all the phases of contemporary philosophy. They are both prelates who are not disposed to hold their clergy up to a narrow theological standard, and neither is exacting enough in that respect to satisfy their Baptist critic, the Rev. Dr. Hague. In Boston the Rev. Phillips Brooks draws about him a congregation largely composed of people who inherit a prejudice against the Trinitarian faith. In a Unitarian city he is by far the most esteemed of clergymen, and temples of worship at which are proclaimed the doctrins of Channing are poorly attended, while Mr. Brooks preaches always to great and most fashionable audiences. The change which has come over Boston, the Puritan capital, during the last generation is very striking so far as its ecclesiastical sympathies are concerned. A few weeks ago, in a Massachusetts village, an Episcopal church of great architectural beauty was dedicated with more than usual pomp and ceremony. It was the gift of a gentleman who erected in it a monument to the memory of his wife. But not only was she a Unitarian, who belonged to a family of Unitarians, but he also is of that faith, which formerly stood in total opposition to the theology his church is built to preach. Hard by, too, is the old home of Jonathan Edwards, who hated all Anglicanism with a bitter hatred."

The position of these Episcopal preachers and the institution of a monastic order in the church indicates, perhaps, that the break-up, not formal, but in reality, of Episcopalianism is near at hand, in which the live men and Radicals will come to Rationalism, and the Conservativs will go back to Rome. At any rate, Episcopalianism, as a Christian sect, appears to be in a bad way.

A Monastic Order in the Episcopal Church.

It has just come out that the Revs. Huntington, Morgan Dix, Arthur Ritchie, and John W. Shackelford took part in the monkish mummery of consecrating a young man, the Rev. J. O. S. Huntington, to the "Order of the Holy Cross." One clause of the profession runs thus:

"I desire for love of Jesus to devote myself body, soul, and spirit to the service of Almighty God in the religious life as a member of the Order of the Holy Cross, and to that end to take upon me of my own free will the vows of religious poverty, chastity, and obedience."

The bishop who received the profession asked and was answered as follows:

The Bishop: Do you solemnly and forever surrender all that you possess, or of which you may hereafter become possessed, even to the least article of personal use or enjoyment, in accordance with the vow of religious poverty?

The Novice: I do.

The Bishop: Will you diligently serve God for the remainder of your life in the virgin state, striving to follow the example of the perfect purity of our virgin Lord in all your thoughts, words, and deeds, as the vow of religious chastity demands?

The Novice: I will, the Lord being my helper.

The Bishop: Will you shape your life in accordance with the Rule of Life of the Order of the Holy Cross, and will you giv respectful obedience to all lawful commands of your superior, and all decisions of the chapter, submitting your will to their godly directions and administrations, under the vow of religious obedience?

The Novice: I will, by the help of God.

It is, of course, entirely beyond the province of government to interfere in religious matters, but if the young man has friends, they will do well to institute an inquiry into his sanity.

Editorial Notes.

THE holiness people of Carthage, Mo., performed a most miraculous faith-cure upon a Mrs. McKinney. After a day or two of great rejoicing, the excitement subsided, and the woman died. The sensible people of the place now charge them with causing her death, alleging that she would hav recovered if they had left her alone.

A ROSSVILLE, Kansas, little boy recently received a bright silver dollar as a prize for committing to memory eight hundred verses from the Bible. He took his dollar and went straight to the drug-store and bought himself a pack of elegant satin-finished linen-back playing cards. He evidently believed that the end justified the means. He did evil that good might come.

THE daily papers of December 24th contained the following dispatch:

"TORONTO, Dec. 23.—A Frenchman named Paquet, a professed Infidel, while denying the doctrin of eternal punishment in a discussion with his fellow-boarders yesterday, was stricken with paralysis, the whole of one side, from head to foot, including the tongue, losing vitality."

This looks something like an act of providence, but it looks a good deal more like a lie.

IN the midst of the exciting political campaign in Ohio last fall, one of the political leaders there employed J. E. Remsburg to giv his lecture on "Bible Morals," defraying the entire expenses of the meeting. That man will occupy a seat in the next Congress.

NEXT week we shall publish in full the official report of the Canadian Convention of Freethinkers. It arrived too late for this issue, as we go to press early in order to get the paper mailed before New Years. The report is long and interesting. The action of the convention is important, as it has been left to the Freethinkers to form the first bond of union between Canada and the United States.

"THE greatest romancer of this century is not Thackeray, nor Dickens, nor Disraeli, nor Dumas, nor George Eliot, nor Honore de Balzac, but—Monsignor Capel. They wrote their fictions; he extemporizes his; and thousands of blind devotees and half-read people take them for truth."

We copy the above to show the way a Methodist editor takes to avoid stating (what he evidently means) that Monsignor Capel is an unmitigated liar.

THE following from the parish records in Alfred, Me., shows that they knew how to quicken religious zeal in olden times: "April 6, 1784.—The inhabitants of this parish met pursuant to adjournment and passed the following vote: Voted, To purchase 2 barrels of rum, 1 barrel of pork, 4 bushels of beans, 10 gallons of molasses, 10 pounds of coffee, and 28 pounds of sugar to raise the meeting-house. Voted, That Nathaniel Conant was desired to procure said articles." It seems that the "spirit" they relied on in those days was rather ardent than heavenly.

WHEN the editor of the Christian Advocate stated in a letter from Hamburg, Germany, that, on the average, not one in fifty of the people in that city attend church, it was suggested that he did not know what he was talking about. Dr. Christlieb's address at the Evangelical Alliance, says the Advocate, is now at hand. He says that in Hamburg, with nearly 400,000 inhabitants, only 5,000 attend church on the Sabbath. This means, of course, the average attendance. In the same address, speaking of Berlin, he says that, with a population of 1,000,000, only 20,000, or two per cent, attend.

JOHN SWINTON proposes that one hundred millions of the surplus money lying unused in the national treasury should be devoted to the construction of public works under the auspices of Congress. This, he holds, would start the wheels of industry by giving employment to the immense number of idle workmen, and the works would pay for themselvs in a short time. Apart from the fact that it would throw an immense number of votes into the hands of the party in power, whichever it might be, the scheme, if judiciously conducted, looks feasible. With two millions of work people idle, and many of them hungry, some new departure appears to be urgently called for.

BETWEEN Brother Bell's arraignment of prohibition, and "T. C. L.'s" defense of it, the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will get this week considerable light on that subject. If prohibition ever comes, it is hoped its effect will be as beneficent as its advocates look for. If it is not to come, there should still be no abatement of endeavor by moral suasion to lessen the evils of intemperance. Perhaps, after all, that will, in the long run, be the better way. In the "Letters from Friends" the Spiritualists hav come to the defense of the belief with a zeal, and an array of facts, worthy of their cause. Yet such is the constitution of the mind of man that though one-half the world should testify to the facts of Spiritualism, the second half would still disbelieve; and if the second half should proceed to demonstrate that every person through whom, and to whom, manifestations hav occurred is a trickster, the first half would still believe. Perhaps our correspondents may see in this fact an excuse for not making the discussion unreasonably extended.

IN the course of Dr. Cuyler's remarks at the Baptist ministers's meeting in Brooklyn, last week, the following observations escaped him:

"I don't think it is worth our while to spend any time defending the Bible. We surrender our strong point the moment we admit that there are parts of the Bible to be defended. Nine-tenths of your congregation will never know that anybody doubts the Bible unless you tell them.

"Brethren, if we hav any doubts keep them for the study; don't bring them into the pulpit. There are many things we don't comprehend. Who can comprehend the Trinity? Who doubts it? I don't understand it, but I believe it. People say, 'Do you preach that which you don't understand?' Certainly I do. I preach incarnation; I don't understand it, but I believe it."

The Rev. Dr. Cuyler's people hav reason to feel complimented by his estimate of their intelligence! If he has a congregation so idiotic as not to know that the truth of the Bible is not only doubted but disbelieved, it would look as though pastor and people were very well adapted to each other.

A GOOD hit at his enemies was made by Mr. Newton last Sunday. "Plenty of men will be found in the church to-day," he said, "who at this time will do honor to the memory of the great reformer while doing violence to every principle for which he strived; men who can admire the plea of reason when urged five hundred years ago, but who now call such a test of truth rationalism; who swear by the heretics of yesterday and swear at the heretics of to-day; who do homage to the right of private judgment as exercised by Luther, but would silence it as exercised in our church to-day." Mr. Newton's sermon was upon Wycliffe's struggle against the religious tyrannies of his time. Further along he said: "Let us remember that the same social movement of the workingmen is running abreast of the new Christianity as in the time of Wycliffe, and an old order is passing sway. Liberty has generated into license; self-interest has turned out selfishness; natural law has left us no place for moral law; the right of might has legitimatized a new tyranny; laissez faire has resulted in chronic crisis. If my buggy is constantly breaking down, I know it is time to get a new one. So when our commercial system comes to a standstill every ten years, it is time to hav a new one. Bradstreet's is authority for the statement that 300,000 are out of work in our own most favored land. There is danger of anarchy to-day, and anyone who reads the wild and fiendish utterances at Chicago on Thanksgiving Day may see the danger. Dower and wealth may try repression. Now, there is nothing quite so sure of creating an explosion as to pile the weights on the safety-valve when there is a furious pressure of steam on. That may come in the nineteenth century, as in the fourteenth. That will come unless relief is found for the forces of discontent."

A LARGE audience assembled in Chickering Hall to listen to Professor Felix Adler's lecture last Sunday. Charles Sheldon, a graduate of Princeton, took the professor's place, and, although there was a shade of disappointment at the change of program, there was ringing applause as he closed his peroration. He described a man on his knees in Paris praying—not to God, but to the great spirit of humanity. It was not a visionary character he portrayed, he said, but one who had constructed a hierarchy of knowledge, and one who had claimed the discovery of the theological, logical, and positiv state of development. By the former state, all that was personal in religion had been put away, and thus there came a new metaphysical epoch which, the speaker hoped, would be the final epoch of knowledge. It was not a religion of God as a personality that this man believed in, but a religion of humanity. "I do not believe in a personal God," said the speaker, "but I ask you not to deify humanity too much. Worship something outside of, and above ourselvs. Worship the King of Glory, not the God Almighty of the past, who was so powerful, but the universe and its law. The religion of the future must rise upon universal foundations, based upon truth, and its spirit must reach into eternity. It is the universe alone that is great." What in the world is the King of Glory?

Lectures and Meetings.

THE friends of equal rights and impartial liberty will hold a four-day celebration in Linesville, Pa., beginning Jan. 26, 1884. Watts, Putnam, O. P. Kellogg, Mrs. Krekel, and several other speakers will be present. Linesville is but a small town, yet in the work of Liberalism she is a shining mark.

J. E. REMSBURG'S program for January is as follows: New York, 2d; Philadelphia, 4th; Carversville, Pa., 5th and 6th; Montezuma, N. Y., 8th and 9th; Hamilton, Ont., 11th, two lectures; Cleveland, Ohio, 12th; Port Clinton, Ohio, 13th and 14th; Eaton Rapids, Mich., 15th and 16th; Burr Oak, Mich., 17th; Sturgis, Mich., 18th, two lectures; Versailles, Ohio, 20th and 21st; Chesterfield, Ind., 22d; New Castle, Ind., 23d; Louisville, Ky., 24th; Nashville, Tenn., 25th, 26th, 27th, 28th, and 29th.

W. S. BELL writes: "Notwithstanding the cold weather and hard times, I hav traveled during the past thirty days more than fifteen hundred miles. November 30th I left Chicago for Muskegan, Mich., where I gave three lectures and assisted in reorganizing the Liberal League. The Liberal element here needs the powerful aid of organized effort. My lectures were enthusiastically received. I was kindly entertained by Mr. Charles Vanderlinde and wife; Capt. Becker and family also hav our thanks for courtesies shown us. From Muskegan I passed over six hundred miles to the next appointment at Menomonie, Wis. There I delivered a course of lectures to crowded houses, and I am confident that my lectures awakened some minds to think upon subjects they hav heretofore never dared to hav an opinion upon of their own. Messrs. Martin R. Cheney and Frank Johnson were the gentlemen who arranged for the lectures. From Menomonie I rode twenty-five miles in a sleigh with the thermometer ranging from twenty to thirty degrees below zero, to lecture at Rock Elm; and another ride of twenty miles under similar conditions to reach the railroad again. My next place was Osseo, Minn., where I rang my Bell two evenings to rather slim, but quite enthusiastic, audiences. Mr. John Hechtman is the leading Liberal of the place. We were generously entertained by Monsieur Lapray, with whose little boys we spent some hours in talking and reading French. Everywhere the people complain of hard times, and it seems to me that their complaint is not without reason, since I had to travel over fifteen hundred miles to get in nine lectures. But I am still well and happy, and shall cheerfully travel more miles to giv more lectures."

"Bible Morals."

"I hav read with great pleasure Mr. Remsburg's new pamphlet entitled 'Bible Morals.' It is a bill of indictment, consisting of twenty counts, or specifications, with all the evidence of their truth drawn from the document itself. Mr. Remsburg is one of our most clear-headed and sententious writers. In his style he avoids verbiage, and uses words as economically as a prudent man uses money—only when it serves a good purpose. Remsburg is always sure of his aim. He never hits a nail sideways, so as to bend it, but drives it home to its head. He is a drill-master in our army of Freethinkers. His writings are full of information and consecutiv thought; and new converts from the church by making themselvs familiar with them are armed and equipped and ready for battle. Bell is another of those logical writers whose productions edify—that is, build up. And I see in a late number of the Investigator that a new recruit, a Mr. Simpson, who hails from Tennessee, seems also to belong to the school, which I admire above all others, that don't commit the error of taking too much for granted as to the intelligence of the people, but adapt their discourses to the common mind. If popery and Protestantism unite in this country to put down the Freethinkers by law, as many students of the signs of the times foresee, all our hope will be in the masses who vote. Blessed, therefore, is the scholar who would rather be useful than famous, and who is unambitious enough to come down to the people's level, and to impart that instruction which will not only make them free from superstition themselvs, but which will, when the pinch comes with the church, lead them to sustain the Constitutional policy of an everlasting divorce between the state and the church. A. B. BRADFORD."

Letters from Friends.

OREGON, Mo., Dec. 21, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: If we were church-members, what a lot of money we would willingly giv every year to support churches, ministers, missions, and superannuated clergy! We liv in an age when almost every class of people organize to aid each other in time of need. Our very poor-farms are established on this plan in many Western states; we pay a tax annually to support those in need, expecting that support to be given in turn to us for which we hav paid all our lives. Now, we Liberals are not well organized. We hav but one superannuated laborer, and we do not half help him. He has given much in his day of strength, and really has a right to a return. I refer to Father Hacker. I move that everyone who reads this inclose as much as he feels able to giv, from ten cents up, to J. Hacker, Berlin, N. J., with a card addressed for reply. CLARKE IRVINE.

MURRAY, O., Dec. 19, 284.

MR. EDITOR: I notice by the tab on my TRUTH SEEKER that my subscription has about expired. I had hoped that something would hav turned up before this time so as to enable me to remit promptly, but such has not been the case. I hav not earned a cent since the 9th of last June, and very little prior to that time for the present year. I am still idle, with no prospects of work for the near future. Therefore you will see, taking into consideration that I hav had a family to maintain, that it is impossible for me to renew at present. Hence if my paper is stopped I shall not feel offended, although I shall miss the perusal of it very much.

I can promis to pay up as soon as possible if you are disposed to continue sending the paper. This letter will be information for H. L. Green and others to the effect that I am not able at present to subscribe for any paper or magazine, however much I may desire to. D. E. LEWIS.

TO ALBERT CHAVANNES.

320 OTIS ST., PHILA., PA., Dec. 21, 1884.

Friend: From time to time I hav attended Spiritualistic seances all over this city, at the same time not making myself known, lest there should be a special opportunity afforded for the practice of impositions upon me, and I hav waited upon mediums personally in order to examin into Spiritualistic phenomena, and I can safely say that I hav seen no manifestation whatsoever; nothing further than I hav seen accomplished by mesmerists, who did not belong to the Spiritualistic sect. Those persons who came under my notice purported to hav received communications from the spiritual world. I hav followed up and interviewed them, and as a physician and close student of human nature I do assert that they were highly impressible persons who only had been thrown into a hysterical or somnambulic state, which must be attributed to animal magnetism—"which is a mode of action upon the nerves through the medium of the senses. Beyond this the magnetizer cannot reach." I regret to say I detected an attempt at gross imposition. ALEXANDER FULTON.

FARMINGTON, O., Dec. 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Apropos of Mrs. Slenker's investigations of Spiritualism, I desire to giv your readers a chapter from my experiences of over thirty years in the investigation of this subject.

Thirty-five years ago, I became acquainted with a young lawyer of the name of W. J. Bright. He was a man of fine ability, very genial in manner, and would make friends with all, but was wanting in moral principle. He had a good gift in getting into debt, but not so good in payment. I sold him a buggy for $65, and took his note for the amount. About twenty-five years since, he removed to Wisconsin, and left this note unpaid. He died twenty years ago.

A few years since, I was in close relations with a remarkable medium in the investigation of these singular phenomena, for a period of some three years, on and off. He had different phases of mediumship, one of which was that, without the trance state, he would claim to see spirits, and hear them talk (and still does), and he certainly gave wonderful evidence that his claim was true. I know this man never knew and never heard of the man Bright. On one occasion that I was with this medium, he announced a spirit very anxious to be known to me. He did not at first giv the name, but he leaned back in his chair and got off a laugh, just as I had seen Bright do a hundred times. I did not then recognize Bright at the moment, and the medium said, "He says he was a lawyer." I then named W. J. Bright, and of course the medium said it was he. But, be it remembered, things were then said that in all reason seemed to fix the identity of Bright, and, among many other things, this: "Curtis, I hav not forgotten that note you hold against me [I am sure I had not thought of it for years]. I am going to pay it in money, principal and interest. I can pay you in this way, and I hav seen your spirit band before this, and asked them to call on me when I could be of service to you in your business; and they promised to call on me, and they will." Three years since, I had some peculiar experiences in business that raised the inquiry in my mind if Bright was not impressing me—for I had been told I was susceptible to spirit impressions.

Two years ago last November, Mr. Charles Watkins, a medium for slate-writing, stopped a week at the Park Hotel, Warren, Ohio. I liv fifteen miles from that place, but I went to see him. I called on him about 11 o'clock A.M., and found him alone in his room. I had never seen him before, and I am certain he had never heard of me, and I kept my name to myself. I told him I desired to test his powers in the manner of his advertisment. He wet one end of a towel in his washbowl and handed it to me, telling me to clean two of those slates (there were half a dozen or more new slates on the table) and write the names of half a dozen of my deceased friends on slips of paper, with a question to each, and fold tightly and mix them up so I could not know the one from the other. He then went out of the room while I did these things, and there was no person in the room but myself. The arrangements completed, Watkins came in and took a seat at my right. He did not touch these pellets, or the two slates I had cleaned. He told me to touch one of the pellets with my pencil, which I did, not knowing, of course, which of the six I touched. Watkins took one of his slates and made the letters, "W. J. B." and asked me if I had written a name with these initials. I said, "Yes." He then wrote, with his own hand, this:

"Friend Curtis: I hav impressed you in your business to some extent, but not so much as I wish to and intend to.
"W. J. BRIGHT."

I now opened this pellet that I put the pencil upon, and it was this: "W. J. Bright: Hav you ever impressed me in my business?" I now put the pencil upon another pellet, and immediately the medium said, "They are going to write to that themselvs." He bit off a small piece of pencil and put upon one of my slates. I threw the other over it and took both in my two hands, with the pellet tight between thumb and finger of left hand. At once I heard a scratching between these slates. When it ceased, I took off the slate and this was written (here let me say I hav four brothers in spirit life—or "nowhere," as Elmina hopes her trip has helped to establish):

"My Dear Brother: I and all of the brothers are present and send you our love and blessing. God bless you. Father is here also, and I wish he could write, but he does not know how to control this law of spirit return as well as I. We all send love to all. H. W. CURTIS."

I now opened the pellet in my hand, and it was this:

"H. W. Curtis: How are you and the brothers?"

Thomas Douglass, of Warren, seventy years of age, a Materialist, and most worthy man, came into the house where I was stopping an hour after I got this slate-writing, with a slate written over in the same manner as mine, as he said. It bore the name of his father, but was spelled "Duglas." This he could not understand. His father died in England when this son was ten years old, and he did not know that he spelled the name in this way. He went home and soon returned with an old book which he said was his father's, and in this book the father's name was written, red with age, and was spelled "Duglas."

"Magic pencils"—"Truesdell tricks!"
Ever after light, E. F. CURTIS.

OGDEN CITY, UTAH, Dec. 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I am very sorry that I had not the money to send you sooner. Times hav been very bad in Utah for this last year. I hav one hundred and fifty dollars' worth of work done, but I cannot get it in, or I would hav sent the money three months age. I am just sending the three last dollars I hav. I am thinking of going away this spring to find a place. I am a brickmaker by trade. Could some of my Liberal friends locate me a place where there is a demand for making brick on my own hook, and sell them burnt with either coal, wood, or coal-slake? RICHARD FLINT.

SPIRITUALISM AND MATERIALISM.

MINNEAPOLIS, Dec. 10, 284.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 6th, a misrepresentation is made by Brother L. N. Wallis; please giv a little space to reply? I hav no more doubt of a future spirit life than of my present existence, but not as Mr. Wallis represents me by "faith" and "feeling," but by the absolute testimony in all ages, of all savage and civilized nations of mankind, which seems to me to be much more reliable than unproved Materialism! Wallis desires to know why he (Kingsley) "is anxious;" and answers his own question thus: "Because he [Kingsley] is conscious of uncertainty." How fallible Wallis knew that he was proclaiming and publishing truth, when he made that positiv, unwarranted, uncalled-for statement, is more than we can understand and comprehend.

Universal nature being the cause which produces all effects, we repeat we hav no doubt of the truth of philosophical Spiritualism; therefore Mr. Wallis's statements, like his arguments and opinions, are surely at fault, very unreliable, if not untrue. As Materialism is infinitly better than orthodoxy, the devil, hell, and eternal damnation, no wonder that Kingsley "is anxious" for annihilation instead of hell! Anxious for Materialist to prove (if possible) that Spiritualism and immortality hav no foundation in truth, and if Materialism is not true, it is impossible ever to prove it so.

The eternal difference between Spiritualism and Materialism is, Spiritualism givs proof, while Materialism givs assertions as follows: "faith" and "feeling;" "Kingsley is conscious of uncertainty," and thousands of similar assumptions and assertions, without giving demonstrations and proofs by, or from, or through any of the learned and most profound Materialistic Atheists. Spiritualism givs and requires demonstration; Materialism givs simple assertions, negations, and annihilation.

Who will inform us how, where, and when the learned scribe Wallis (or any other man, woman, child, or philosopher) did demonstrate and prove that Spiritualism, which teaches a glorious, delightful, and happy future existence (of which the universe is the cause, and spirits and future life the effects), is by Atheists pronounced and proved fabulous, impossible, and false; and that Materialism is most desirable and absolutely true?

We submit it as an absolute fact that Materialism is infinitly better, more desirable and philosophical, than orthodoxy and eternal damnation, but that is no proof that Materialism is infallible and true. We desire truth founded on nature and common sense, for these never fail, and never utter falsehoods. Spiritualism makes millions happy. Does Materialism make one happy in time or in eternity? We pause for natural and truthful replies. E. N. KINGSLEY.

CINCINNATI, O., Dec. 22, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Of what use are all those religions to the world? Do any of them promote the morality, happiness, wisdom, intelligence, or prosperity of mankind? I think, sir, that the honest verdict from all sensible people must be that they do not. Nay, sir, do they not produce quite the reverse? Let any impartial observer look round on every hand, and behold things just as they are, can there be anything more clear than that all those places and people, who are the most steeped in religious superstitions, are the most deplorably ignorant, immoral, vicious, and deceitful, also the victims of squalor, poverty, and filth, perfectly regardless of honesty, truth, and decency? Millions of them are but slightly removed from the lowest order of brutes. The great object of all the priestly crowds has been to keep the masses of mankind in the most groveling ignorance, so that their power over them might be supreme. They hav worked upon their fears to such an extent that their dwarfed minds are enslaved, and rendered nearly idiotic. O priestcraft, thou curse of man! Could the earth be rid of thy contemptible influence, how bright, how cheerful, how prosperous and happy, would the people be, and our glorious globe would be a true and eternal paradise.

Onward, ye lovers of universal mental liberty, and bring speedily the charms or universal brotherhood.

With all creeds, dogmas, and superstitions forever ruled out, and love and good will reign supreme, is the hope and desire of T. WINTER, Materialist.

MENDON CENTER, N. Y., Dec. 20, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Frequently while telling my spiritual experiences in a private circle of friends, they hav expressed a desire for me to write some of it for the general reader. I timidly commenced the task, appreciating from lack of education my weakness to produce an article worthy of attention.

I hav been a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER for a number of years, and in reading its columns I am willing to acknowledge that I am not in unison with all the Materialistic productions I find therein, because I hav faith in a continued existence beyond the confines of the present life. Yet my belief stands not in the way, for I shall continue my subscription, and be one in a small way to render material aid to assist in the circulation of the paper, and I deem it the most progressiv at the present time.

The poet Pope has given us these truthful lines:

"'Tis education forms the common mind,
Just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined."

So I find it, as a member of the society of Quakers of the Hicksite school, Unitarian in belief, in harmony with all truth seekers, with a deep interest in the demands of Liberalism. Our Disciplin contains strong testimony against priestcraft and making merchandise of the gospel. And if it be a truth that Jesus declared and meant these words in sending forth his disciples, "Freely ye hav received, freely giv—without money and without price," then the hypocrisy and sordidness of the ecclesiastical state is unbounded. Can they be aught else than wolves in sheep's clothing for their rash assumptions? As Freethinkers and Liberalists we need to stand on broad vantage ground, our morality and consistency blossoming and bearing golden fruit in our example before the world. In filling the full measure of truth, should there be a claim that a plant resembling it, as manifesting itself in unsanctified ground, can we consistently discard it because of its unpopularity? Let Spiritualists giv this share of praise to the womanly virtues of Elmina Slenker for even daring to examin the claims of spiritual phenomena, considering the vicissitudes that George Chainey has undergone, even though she failed to find proof, finally giving in her testimony that the claim is bankrupt, not having any assets to pay its liabilities Contemporary with Elmina, across the Atlantic Ocean, the English premier, W. E. Gladstone, also gave Spiritual phenomena a careful examination, the medium, Eglington, submitting to crucial tests, and manifestations occurred under conditions which Gladstone affirmed utterly forbid a possibility for deception. We here note a difference between these two late investigators. Elmina, at the finis, by the tone of her communication indicates thankfulness that she discovered nothing to change her former opinions; whereas we again note an honest conviction guiding the mind of Gladstone toward the importance of spiritual facts, in his communication to a Liverpool journal, in these words: "I know of no rule which forbids a Christian to examin into the professed signs of pre-natural agency in the system called Spiritualism; but it seems to be his duty. I speak as one who is deeply convinced that God has yet many a fair plant to rear in this portion of his garden."

Let me hasten, regretting that the preface has obtained such limits, to giv my experience. While in New York a few years ago, a stranger and alone, I called upon the medium, J. V. Mansfield. He asked me no questions, and I kept my own counsel. He wished to know if I wanted to write a question, fold and seal the same, and hav it answered, or take what I I could get without leaving my volition on paper. The last met with my approval. He went to his writing-desk. I went from his presence to a remote part of the house, that my influence might not in any way impress him. Think of my joy and amazement when in about ten minutes he brought me a communication reading thus:

"Thank thee, thank thee, my dear son, for the assurance hav thee allows me so warm a place in thy loving heart. Nelson, could thee but hav known when we, thy friends an relativs, were near thee, thy heart would hav responded, 'God be praised for this wise provision in his great economy.' Well Nelson, we hav followed thee about, up and down the earth and at times we did fancy thee did detect our nearness; then again at other times thy mind was so absorbed with the business cares of thy mortal life we were at a loss to know if the really did detect our nearness. Not long since thy brother-in-law, Isaac G. Ewer, and uncle, Henry Powell, were here, but with all their control they failed to impress thee with their presence. They then sent their messenger for Abby and Mary, that they might assist the control, but even with the united strength the attempt was a failure. Mary said if Moses Ingraham had been present, we should hav succeeded. But my son, it is not always we can control the medium successfully; then, again, at other times do. But, Nelson, be of good cheer. We are about thee from time to time, and that to bless guide, and guard thee at all times. Aunt Lydia we often meet, but she is not with us at the present time. Thy father

Joseph, he, too, is with me and thee often, so fear not, my son; dare to proclaim this truth from the housetop. Lovingly remember me to all friends in Monroe county, and also where they recollect me kindly.

"Affectionately, thy mother, MARGARET POWELL.
"To NELSON POWELL."

During the centennial year, my wife and self being in Philadelphia, Mansfield also residing there, we concluded to call. While on our way we agreed to write a line to my brother, Nathaniel, who had been in the spirit world more than twenty years, and see what we could get. In his audience-room he gave me a blank strip of paper, and I wrote lightly so that I might not impress my volition too strongly there, this question:

"Brother Nathaniel, are you present? NELSON POWELL."

I folded and held it, while Mansfield sealed it with mucilage, he appearing not to care anything about its contents. Without it once leaving our sight, he holding his left hand upon it, he wrote for an answer:

"Heaven bless you, dear Brother Nelson, for taking time you intended Nathaniel should hav occupied, but he not being present, I hav come to speak instead. Yes, brother, we are with you and Sister Mary at the great show. Oh, could you hav seen us as we did you, you would not hav thought us so very far from you. Yes, brother, let this assure you that we liv, and because we do, you will.

"From your brother-in-law, MOSES INGRAHAM.
"To NELSON POWELL."

In a digest of this answer I realized that the theory of mind reading was out of the question. Again, with greater confidence, I addressed a niece thuswise:

"Hannah Ewer, are you present? Hav you a word for your your father and mother? NELSON."

Answer:

"Yes, dear ones, I am present, and for this proffered opportunity of sending a word to the dear ones at home, let me thank you. Tell father and mother that their daughter livs, and loves them not less dearly than when with them. Tell them that I am with them and the dear ones daily; that we shall meet again. HANNAH P. EWER."

Her full name was Hannah Powell Ewer. I forgot to insert the middle letter. It looks a little queer that the medium should insert it, unless his hand was guided by an invisible intelligence.

A significant event took place two days subsequently in another state, in the presence of a materializing medium. A form resembling very closely this same niece materialized in our presence, and my wife asked her if she had any word to send home. You can realize our astonishment when what purported to be she repeated the identical words, from, "Tell father," etc., to the end—the very words of the communication we had so lately received through Mansfield. I also, in the presence of the medium Watkins, hav had the arrangement of the slates according to my wishes; hav had a communication written inside, the intent of which the medium could hav no possible knowledge of. Neither did I giv him the slightest chance to write it.

I hav been shown a communication by a Mrs. Stuart, a friend of mine, obtained of Watkins at the home of her son, written on the folded slate held by her while Watkins, with overcoat on, had opened the door to leave the house. With one foot on the threshold his exit was arrested by hearing writing, the slate being ten feet distant; when through, the medium went on his way. She opened the slate and read a letter signed by his deceased brother.

Then there are two witnesses living who can testify to the bottom being knocked out of one of the bottom facts of Truesdell.

Last summer I received "False Claims," by J. Remsburg. I loaned it to a neighbor for perusal, he promising to return it to me by putting it in my box at the post-office. By some mishap it accidently got in the box of our leading Quaker minister. He is a good citizen and a kind man, but has positiv prejudices and religious biases. He, of late, preaches mostly to orthodox hearers, their ministers commanding him, perhaps. This change of base voiced the impression that the best way he could please God would be to burn the hateful tract. Let John Remsburg giv him a wide birth. NELSON POWELL.

NEW YORK, Dec. 20, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Will you allow me some space in your paper to answer to the article, "Anno Scientiæ, 284," from Mr. Sidelinger, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 20th? Mr. Sidelinger says: "It was not the year 1 until the twelve months of this year had actually passed away." According to this logician, when we hav, for an example, Sunday, we do not hav it, nor can we count it the first day of the week, or Sunday, until after midnight—that is, after it has actually passed away! Such nonsense comes from the "Hub" of the New World; and there Mr. Sidelinger is not alone of this way of thinking. Now, I hav thought all along that when we commenced a new year, say 1884, the first day of January and any other day following to the 31st day of December to the end, to be each a part of the year 1884; but now comes Mr. Sidelinger and says that I am wrong, and pities me very, very much. Truly, either Mr. Sidelinger or Koezly ought to be shut up in an insane asylum.

Mr. Geo. N. Hill claims to be the originator of the so-called new calendar, and wants it started or commenced to count from and with the 1st day of January, 1600, and then to fall in with the present year of Christian era 1884, and count in the new way 284. Mr. Hill says the 1st day of January, 1600, was the initial day of the 17th century, and consequently his calendar is all right, to the contrary of anybody else. This new fashion commences to count with 0; all other common people commence with 1; but it makes me think the new Athens "breeds exceptionally very wise owls indeed, eccentric figgerers" and eminent mathematicians ahead of the common mankind, on which they look with pity or disdain.

What would the rest of us become if we lost the Hub? Why allow France to send us a statue to enlighten us and the rest of the world, while so much nearer to us the Hub might hav sent us one of its incomparable mathematicians as a statue for our enlightenment?

Mr. Sidelinger wanted a real epoch to start from a new calendar. Then I ask, in all humility only, would not the 4th day of July, 1776, the Declaration of Independence of these United States of America, be a better real epoch, and, I think, fifty million times more acceptable to the people, than yours? But who claims for it? No one. We do not want any needless disturbance, and to act accordingly, if we took the 4th of July, 1776, as a starting-point, that day would be the first day of new year 1 of the independence of these states. Let well enough alone. Neither Mr. Sidelinger nor Mr. Hill has ever named the first benefit a new calendar would giv us—not one. Their motivs must be vanity and notoriety.

Mr. Hill and Mr. Sidelinger object to the Christian era, and, after all, take it as a foundation for their new one. What in consequence? The Literal League has wisely confined itself to the Nine Demands, as one thing at a time may be attainable, but a confusion, never. FREDK. KOEZLY.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., Dec. 13, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: There can be nothing so truly a people's paper as that which admits all opinions, respectfully addressed, upon all subjects. This THE TRUTH SEEKER does, and in this fact I predict its future great success. To speedily bring about a 100,000 or more copies issue weekly, I hav thought that stencil plates employed by enthusiastic men and women in all parts of the country, might be effectiv. These could be cut out of pasteboard by you and sent to all desirous of taking an activ hand in the work. I would hav it read: "THE TRUTH SEEKER is the largest Freethought newspaper published. Sample copy free. 33 Clinton Place, New York." Stenciled upon the blank part of bills, already on dead walls in cities and large towns, and upon board fences everywhere; a million people could thus soon hav their attention drawn to this, the star newspaper of the earth. It is this in matter, form, and principle, and, like so many of our co-workers, I am anxious to see it attain that circulation which its merits deserves. One of the incentivs to work for an immense circulation is the sure reduction in price, perhaps to as low as one dollar per year, and if a man were too poor to pay this, it might be given to him by publisher or friend. Should THE TRUTH SEEKER think well of this project, I shall be glad to receive and pay for an outfit, and will personally see to it that it is used in and about this city. A few strips of pasteboard, a small brush, and a shallow small box of paste ink, will make but a small, very small, package to take along on a walk or a ramble. For one, I am willing to make the "woods full of them."

It must prove very amusing to many old-time Spiritists to see the anti-spiritists get such scoring as they are being subjected to. Truly, "they hav eyes and see not, ears hav they, and hear not." They are the positivly truly credulous on a negativ. They hav not the remotest idea of fairness in the proof or disproof of facts. The great lights of earthism, almost to a man, fail to admit the facts of spiritism, showing, therefore, to be either ignorant, cowardly, or dishonest. They talk of science as though it were anything more than truth, and, to cap the climax, "shut out" spirits by saying, "one world at a time." Suppose, for a moment, we had but "one world at a time," what would become of this insignificant earth, rolling, as science has it, in space? Why, independent of the sun (another world), moon (another), and stars (billions of them), seen and unseen (billions of other worlds), science declares we should go to "smithereens" in a twinkling. But suppose it is, practically, "one world at a time" that is wanted; mind you, it is not the truth that is particularly called for, but simply and purely "one world at a time," practically, you know. What, then, is this world's boundary? At what parrallel hight from the earth is the air included? or, shall the air as much as possible, like my neighbor's rooms, be excluded, or shall it (the air) extend to a certain hight and still be considered of this one world? Surely this is a grave question to settle. Let those in authority settle it; let us be informed just what constitutes this "one world." And when we are told this, let us know if earthists are only happy in being deaf, dumb, and blind to facts under their ears and eyes, which disprove their "one world at a time" theory, or rather wish. DR. GEO. HARDCASTLE.

ANAHEIM, CAL., Dec. 14, N.E. 284.

MR. EDITOR: As I hav had the privilege of uniting with a Liberal League eight miles from here in Santa Ann, I hav an order for two copies of the "Truth Seeker Collection" from members of the League, as we find it a great help in conducting our meetings. We are in hopes of organizing a free readroom and library room, and hope if anyone interested in the League, or in Freethought, as far as Secularization is concerned, has a desire to unite in contributing books, tracts, or papers, they will remember our new society. Liberals, at this day, should consider that if they wish to preserve there liberties from religious despotism, they must use the same amount of zeal and money as the theological hosts do. The theological doctrins are so firmly entrenched in our literature—our secular public school books—that it is only through the outspoken sentiments of Infidels, Spiritualists, and Secularists that they (the doctrins) are held in abeyance and kept out of our laws as much as they are. The time has come to join our forces, throw aside all opinionated predjudice, and work together that we may realize the blessings of liberty, equality, and fraternity. Long may the noble TRUTH SEEKER liv to greet our eyes with impartial sentiment on all subjects. Let there be light and the priviledge of investigating truth however unpopular. Herein lies our safety. K. PARKER.

OMRO, WIS., Dec. 9, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: While I consider it to be my duty as well as a pleasure to keep the Spiritualists of the country posted as to progress of the movement in this state, I shall not attempt to giv a verbatim report of our meeting just held in Milwaukee. The elements seemed to conspire to defeat our expectations, for it rained incessantly from Friday afternoon until Sunday morning. Nevertheless the attendance, which was fair at first, continued to increase till Sunday evening, when the hall was packed. The speakers were listened to with marked attention. J. E. Remsburg gave three lectures, the main drift of which was to show the baneful effects of priestcraft and the false teaching of theology, giving facts and figures in proof of his statements. He was very gentlemanly in his treatment of the subject, and was well liked by the audience. Professor A. B. French lectured Saturday evening on "Prehistoric America." And Sunday evening closed the meeting with one of the grandest lectures I ever listened to, subject, "The Beauties of Spiritualism as Compared With Materialism." Professor Lockwood spoke on the "Spiritualism of Science," Sunday P.M. Delegates and mediums from all parts of the state, as well as a number from Chicago, Mrs. Isa Wilson Porter, Mrs. Sparrow, and others. The Cross Concert Troupe, consisting of father and four children, furnished the music (mostly Professor C. P. Longley's composition) throughout the meeting. The city press was well represented and gave good reports of the proceedings, for which a vote of thanks was given. Our next meeting will be held in Milwaukee the 27th, 28th, and 29th, 1885.

Will friends in Wisconsin please send me the names of every Spiritualist and Liberal before that time.

DR. J. C. PHILLIPS,
Secretary of the Wisconsin State Association of Spiritualists.

KANSAS CITY, MO., Dec. 16, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $6.50 to be placed on credit for the following persons.

We hav plenty of Liberals in Kansas City, but cannot organize them. Col. Ingersoll has been here twice in the last two years, and always had a crowded house, but ministers hav the advantage of us. It would be well for Messrs. Putnam and Watts to giv us a call. I keep THE TRUTH SEEKER on my table, and, judging by the many who interestedly read it, I think the paper has many friends here, some admirers, and some doubters. I hav often been amused by different parties, at different times. Men who hav families whom they are bringing up (with the assistance of the wife) to believe in the God the Bible tells about, come into my place of business, pick up THE TRUTH SEEKER, and commence reading. Pretty soon they will say, "Mr. Larson, look here. I hav been brought up by good Christian parents, and lived to the age of fifty, and here is something I never before saw or even thought of. It almost makes me think the Bible lies. The fact is, Mr. Larson, I hav been brought up to look only on one side of this great question, and it never occurred to me that there was any other side, because I had been taught to believe that those who said anything against the Bible were sinners, and would go to hell; but here is something in THE TRUTH SEEKER which makes me feel as if I had just woke out of a sleep; something that assures me that there is more than one side to this question."

Now, Mr. Editor, one of the aforementioned deluded mortals is a subscriber herein. Let the good work go on; come down to common sense; banish ignorance and fear; let us take the world as we find it, and as it proves itself. In the language of the poet, Mr. Editor, "Giv 'em hell."

JOHN LARSON.

PHONOGRAPHY AND PROGRESS.

CONCORDIA, KAN., Dec. 20, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: The mind that tends to liberty and Freethought is most likely to adopt the quickest mode of expressing that thought. I, too, began to teach myself phonography about the time T. C. Leland did, buying Andrews and Boyle's Reader in 1846, and hav been an ardent advocate of telegraph speed in our system of recording human utterance. I hav used our orthodox, barbarous, senseless system of representation under impatient protest for forty years, and it seems about as hard to get rid of it as orthodoxy or tobacco.

The spirit of the age demands that children at school should learn to read and spell in one year, or less; that at fifteen everyone in the school-room should be able, while hearing the teacher's words, to record them verbatim et literatim; that everyone at a lyceum or lecture should be able to carry away with him or her all the words of the speaker; that every educated person, everywhere, should record upon paper, as well as upon the tablet of the brain, the expressions of the tongue; that the brain and the fingers should keep pace together (as in instrumental music) in internal elaboration and external expression, or record.

As it is now, in most cases, sound givs no clue to, or suggestion of, form, nor form of sound. Because of this, how much time is wasted and labor expended in setting soundless, useless, and superfluous type on THE TRUTH SEEKER, and all other papers and publications!

In this respect the mental, moral, and spiritual world is far behind the material, business, and commercial word, as far as books and papers are concerned. If I could send articles to THE TRUTH SEEKER in phonography, and there were phonographic compositors to use them, how mow much time would be saved! These thoughts are suggested by your quotations from W. A. Croffut, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 13th. In this connection let me recommend T. C. Leland, whom I hav known mentally and by correspondence thirty-seven years, as a teacher of phonography. He "has the teach in him," and I would advise young people to go to 744 Broadway, and learn how to make your fingers keep up with the brain.

J. H. COOK

NEWPORT, ME., Dec. 13, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: In a late letter I wrote you that I was having a visit from a "fourteen-years-old Infidel." When she was about leaving her home, a little twelve-year-old sister said to her, "When you get to Newport, and no one meets you, you inquire for Mr. Mitchell, and if they ask you if it is 'that crazy Mitchell,' you say, 'Yes, that's the man.'"

Now, I inclose in this twenty-five cents. Please send me some kind of a book suitable for a child of that age, free from any God or Christ. EWARD MITCHELL.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Glad New Year.

Hurrah, hurrah, for the glad New Year,
With its snow, and ice, and winter cheer!
We'll snap our fingers right in his face,
While we with snow-balls each other chase.

We'll laugh as we merrily slide down hill,
To the gay old tune of Jack and Jill;
And as, with skates, to the pond we go,
To the winter's cold we'll not say no.

Fairy voices sing: "Make room, make room,"
For mosses soft and spring-time bloom,
For the blossoms that our love doth share,
The violets sweet and daisies fair;

For the summer flowers in richest sheen,
For summer skies and grasses green,
For the autumn's golden fruit and grain,
And the maple leaf aflame again."

Hurrah, hurrah, for the glad New Year,
Its joy bells ring afar and near,
And we sing songs of welcome, too,
While we promis all good things to do.

Santa Claus and Susie.

"I shall see Santa Claus to-night! Oh, I shall, I shall! He is coming to my house to-night, truly!' and Susie danced about the room, laughing and clapping her little hands in great glee.

To her Santa Claus was a sort of good fairy, who, as she had been told, visited children on Christmas eve, and brought them "goodies" or a bundle of briars, as they had been good or naughty during the year

Her papa had been down in the swamp, and cut a little evergreen tree, had brought it home and planted it in a corner of the parlor. Her mamma and auntie had hung upon it a number of pretty toys, useful and ornamental articles, and some fruit and candies. Susie herself had fastened among its branches seme little presents for papa, mamma, gammoo (as she called her grandmother), and auntie. The tree was all fixed for Christmas, the candles upon it were lighted, and Susie was hopping about in an excited state, anxiously waiting for the coming of Santa Claus. It was Christmas eve, and for a long time she had looked forward to this time with eager delight and fond anticipation. She was four years old then, and was an unusually bright child for her age.

All at once the door bell rang, ting-a-ling-ding, ting-a-ling-ding. Jusie jumped up. It must be Santa Claus. She was in a tremor of expectation, but snatched her doll and ran and hid her head in auntie's dress.

Her mamma opened the door, and there entered a queer-looking old man, dressed in a long blue soldier coat, a big woollen comforter or scarf around his neck, thick mittens on his hands, and a slouchy fur cap pulled down over his long white hair, while his face was nearly concealed by an immense white beard. Susie peeped out one eye, and drew back, half afraid.

In a deep voice the man said, "I hav come to pick the fruit off this tree here in the corner, and deliver it to the owners," and he immediately began removing the articles from the tree.

The first thing he took from the tree bore the name of Susie's grandmother.

"Does any one know such a person?" he inquired, calling the name.

"Yes, sir," ventured Susie; "that's my gammoo's name—that's the lady, sitting in the rocking-chair."

"Hum!" exclaimed the man; "here is a box marked, 'Little Susie;' who is she, pray?"

"I s'pose that means me!" and Susie endeavored to creep under the lounge in a spirit of bashfulness.

"Hav you been a good girl?" questioned the big man, "for all the year past?"

"Yes, Mr. Claus," replied Susie; "that is, I was naughty sometimes, but most of the time I was pretty good."

"What did you do that was naughty?" and the voice of the old man sounded harsh and grim.

"Why—I—kicked and screamed sometimes, when I could not hav my own way—and—sometimes I talked—sarcy!" and down went the little head on the floor.

"Do you think you will be naughty any more?"

"No, Mr. Claus—that is, I won't if I don't forget."

"Well, come and get the box, then."

Susie jumped up with alacrity, and reached with a long arm for the box, which contained a lovely wax doll.

"I thank you, Mr. Claus," said she modestly.

Susie had a heap of pretty presents, and so did her papa, mamma, gammoo, and auntie, all gathered from that tree. But the dear little girl could not throw off the restraint and bashfulness that came upon her when the old man came in, until after he had said, "Good-night, and pleasant dreams," and taken his departure. Then she had a jolly time looking over all her new playthings, and commenting upon the appearance of the strange visitor.

"Now," said she, "I should like to know, for one, who is Santa Claus, and where he came from, and how he knows good girls from naughty ones."

Nobody enlightened her that night, but the next day she persisted in her inquiries.

"Did ever you see anyone like him before?" inquired her auntie.

"I never did," she said. "His hair was some like that of my grandfader, who livs away off, but I know it was not my grandfader."

"Perhaps it was your papa," said her auntie.

"Oh, no; that could not be. Papa's hair is not white."

"Well, now, Susie darling, the big man was your papa, after all, disguised like a real Santa Claus."

Susie's eyes grew large and round, as she remarked slowly, "But it did not talk like my papa, and my papa does not wear such a coat as that."

"It was your own papa, nevertheless," said her auntie.

"Well, is there no Santa Claus then, for truth? What does it mean when people say, 'Santa Claus is coming?'" And the large eyes looked perplexity itself, and were half inclined to cry.

"Well, my dear," said the auntie, "when you are old enough to understand, I will tell you the whole story, all about Christmas and Santa Claus, or St. Nicholas. For the present I will only say this, that the celebration of Christmas is the perpetuation of—"

"What is perpetuation, Auntie?"

"It is the handing down, the keeping alive. Well, Christmas is the keeping alive in another form an old pagan custom, celebrated years and years ago under a different name. It is a festival day, and is now supposed to celebrate the birthday of Christ, hence the name—Christ-mass. Nobody supposes that he was born on the 25th of Dec., but some people agreed to fix it upon that day, and, perhaps, that is as good a day as another. In Germany the people call it the "Children's festival," and they giv presents from a tree, the same as we did last night. Sometimes a man all dressed up, as your papa was, goes about from house to house, and distributes the presents, and they call him Knecht Rupert; and Santa Claus means the same as Knecht Rupert, and was brought into this country by the Dutch people."

"Then there is no real Santa Claus."

"No, it is only an imaginary existence. The papa and mamma of children, and other relativs, are the ones who think most fondly of their darlings, and spend time and money to make them glad and happy."

"Isn't there any more to tell about Christmas, Auntie?"

"Oh, yes; the Swedish people hav a story that when Christmas time comes all the men who liv in the cold climate of that country are suddenly changed into howling wolves—"

"O Auntie dear!" exclaimed Susie.

"But it is not true, dear, only to make-believe. The story, and it is only a story, says that they meet in the night, all these people that are said to be changed into wolves, at an appointed place, and talk, in the wolf language, about men and animals that are mild and quiet, and carry on worse than real wolves, and that the good people suffer dreadfully from their wild attacks."

"What made us hav the evergreen wreaths in the windows?" asked Susie, suddenly.

"Well, a great, great while ago, ever and ever so long ago, there were people who preached, and taught, and sang in the woods, and they were called Druids. Of course they liked the evergreens and hollies, the laurel, mistletoe, and ivy, and everything that was like the green-wood, and they used to deck themselvs with wreaths and branches of green. Hence comes the custom from the Druids, of bringing the green wreaths of ground pine and holly branches into our homes. They used to think, a good while ago, that the wood nymphs or sylvan spirits, certain imaginary beings called by those names, would come into the homes where the evergreens were, and that the cold frost, snow, and ice would not catch them then."

"Well, auntie dear, I do think it is nicer to hav one's own papa, and mamma, and gammoo, and auntie to giv us good things, than a naughty old Santa Claus, who will bring us sticks if we are not good," said Susie.

"It is better still to deserve the good things that our friends bestow upon us.

"It is a pretty custom to dress our homes in green, and takes a little of the chill of winter away to see the green of summer on the walls, and in the windows. Christmas is a good time for re-unions; for families to come together, and it is a happy time when no one is missed from the family circle; when there is no vacant chair, no one absent. It is appropriate to celebrate the close of the year as they used to in the old, old time, and to bring good wishes, pretty presents, little mementoes of affection to our dear ones. And while we remember our own, we should also remember the many who are poor and lonely, and strive to make their lives a little better, happier, and more cheerful, by sharing what we hav, to some happy degree, with them. Thus while we giv joy to those less fortunate than we, into our own lives will fall softly new joy and sweet happiness. Do you understand, darling?"

But Susie, snuggled close in her auntie's arms, was fast asleep with a smile on her lips, and whispered dreamily, "Yes, auntie."

My Christmas Story.

[The following story arrived too late for last week's issue, and so we giv it to our readers this week. We are greatly obliged to Mrs. Wheelock, and to all our contributors for their kindness and interest in the Children's Corner. —ED.]

Ten years ago, I passed the winter months at Savannah, Georgia. My two little boys, Jamie and Theo—the elder five and the younger but three years of age—were with me. That winter here was an exceptionally cold one; there it was like a warm spring nearly all the time. Only an occasional northeaster would ever remind us of frost and snow that we had left at home.

Every day, with the rare exception of a rainy one, we were out for a walk in the fine parks that dot the city of Savannah all over with resting-spots of beauty.

Here, the landscape was one unbroken sheet of snow; there, the grass was living and green, whereon troops of bright-eyed children, accompanied by their colored nurses, played in wild abandon, for there were no signs posted up, "Keep off the grass." Here, the trees were robed only in their cloud-gift drapery of snow and ice; there, they waved their leafy banners, some of them in gorgeous bloom, and others, like the orange-trees, burdened with their golden fruit. The most noted among the southland trees were the stately yellow pines, through whose branches the balmiest breeze moans a ceaseless plaint, the broad-spreading live oak, and the beautiful magnolia, whose very name brings up visions of Southern beauty and romance.

In the Southern parks, all the year round, the spray of fountains plays upon blooming flowers, fringe-like mosses, and clinging vines. There I first saw the camelia blossom, in all its proud imperial beauty. It delights the eye, but is destitute of the essence of beauty, sweet perfume. Its charm lies in the perfection of its color, and in its chaste sculpturing, such as no art can ever paint or imitate.

In the afternoon of all bright days, and especially on Sundays, these parks are always thronged with people from everywhere—with adults and children, nearly one-half of whom are of the "dusky race." To one unaccustomed to these features of Southern life, it seems strange to see so many sable faces, but after a while we would miss them from the living picture of Southern life, as we would miss the dirge-singing pines from among the blossoming Southern trees.

Directly in front of the house where I was an invited guest was a grassy lawn, spray-sprinkled, and with beds of bloom here and there, where it was always holiday-ground for the children. I had never allowed mine to go out alone, but the day before Christmas was so sunny and beautiful, and they pleaded so hard "just to go out in the park," while I was engaged at my morning writing, that I yielded. I sat by the open window where I could look down upon them and know that they were safe.

For half an hour all was well, but suddenly I looked, only to find them gone. I peered forth with loving anxiousness among the groups of children gathered there, but my own were not among them. In one moment I was in the park looking for them, calling them and inquiring after them, but they were gone, no one knew where.

What should I do? Where should I go? Trembling in every nerve, I returned to inform Dr. K—— that my children were lost. Three of us started off at once in search of them. After a few minutes of rapid walking, I met Jamie running toward me, who, in frightened tones, said, "Mamma, I'se lost Theo."

"O Jamie, where did you lose him?" I asked.

"In the crowd of girls and boys up there by the Santa Claus store," he replied.

I had got a clue, so on I started again. The crowd of children was still there, but no little Theo was among them. So I went on and on through miles of city lanes and streets, down into the negro quarters, and everywhere, but my longing eyes found him not. The lengthening shadows told too plainly that the night was fast approaching; but too weary and too dispirited to prolong my search, I returned to Dr. K——'s, who told me that he had ordered the city police to search for the child.

My mother's heart was almost wild with fear that he was lost or stolen, and that I should never see him again. My exhaustion was so great I was forced to rest and wait in an agony of suspense.

It was just the moment between daylight and dark, for there is no twilight at the South, when my anxiety had merged into despair, that I heard, in the hall-way below, my boy's clear, happy voice ringing out like the chirrup of a bird. I gav one joyful bound and in one instant clasped him in my arms. With a face illuminated with happines, his first salutation was, "O mamma, I saw such pretty things down to the Santa Claus store. Will Christmas bring some to Jamie and me?"

The dear boy, he did not know that he had been lost, nor had he any realizing sense of the peril of such wanderings in a strange city. Two young girls were with him. They found him, as they said, in the following way:

It seemed when he separated from his brother that he strayed two miles away, and when found was surrounded by a bevy of colored children, who were laughing hilariously at something he had said. Just as the girls were passing they heard him tell his sable companions that he could not find Jamie anywhere. They instantly thought that the little fellow had lost his way, and stopped to question him, when the children laughed, as before, saying, "That boy says his name is Peter Grasshopper. What a funny name!"

One of the girls then asked, "What is your name, little boy?"

"Peter Grasshopper," he promptly answered.

"Sure enough," the girls said, "that is a funny name."

And here we must go back a few months in the history of our lost boy. The summer preceding my visit south, I spent with friends in the central part of this state.

A bright-eyed girl one day asked Theo what his name was.

"I don't know," he answered.

"Don't know?" said the girl; "well, I'll tell you what your name is—it is Peter Grasshopper. And now, when any one asks you what it is, you tell them, Peter Grasshopper."

In his playful way he always did, after that, when asked his name, answered, "Peter Grasshopper," until he really thought it was his name.

To resume the thread of our story, the girls took Theo in charge, and learned enough, by urgent questioning, to know that his mother was stopping at the house of some physician in the city. They took him home and gave him food, and then started out to find the place. Fortunately they came upon the street where Dr. K—— resided, and Theo, at once recognizing his house, exclaimed: "Oh, there is where my mamma lives!" And thus my child, the day before Christmas, was lost and found again.

In my anxiety for my lost darling, all thoughts of Christmas gifts had vanished from my mind. But not so with good, generous-hearted Dr. K——. He had a Christmas tree filled with gifts for the poor children in the neighborhood. It was his yearly custom to do this, and that bright Christmas eve, when my lost boy was found, and my life was again joy-filled after the day's suspense and anguish of soul, a beautiful surprise awaited us. Suddenly, in the midst of boy-questionings as to what Santa Claus would put in their stockings in the chimney-corney, folding-doors opened, and what a sight met our delighted vision. A green cedar-tree brightly illuminated, and its branches drooping with their burden of everything that a child loves and longs for, and at this instant a throng of wondering children were admitted; little street waifs whose dreary orphanage and homelessness made life not a joy, but a troubled dream. Kind-hearted Dr. K—— then spoke a few words of welcome to them all, and then distributed the gifts and sweetmeats. For a whole hour these little ones were made to feel at home where there was comfort, and beauty, and brightness; my own little boys the happiest among the happy. Christmas gifts there were for all, and from the hand of the children's benefactor, good Dr. K——.

When it was time for baby eyes to close in sleep, I put my darlings in their cozy bed, and when I gave them their good-night kisses, my little Theodore twined his arms about my neck and looking up to me, said in sweet, plaintiv voice, "Mamma, if I had stayed lost you wouldn't hav a merry Christmas, would you?"

A kiss, and a tremulous, "No darling," was all the answer I could giv.

PROSE POEMS

And Selections,

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued.

It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author.

The work is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it.

In the more elegant styles of binding, this volume is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

In workmanship the volume is a masterpiece. The type is large and beautiful; the paper heavy and richly tinted; the presswork faultless; and the binding, as perfect as the best materials and skill can produce. The book is quarto in size, and contains 248 pages. No item of expense has been spared to make the work worthy of author and public.

PRICES:

Silk-cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side,	$2 50
Half-calf, mottled edges, elegant library style,	4 50
Full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitely fine,	7 50
Full tree calf, highest possible style and finish,	9 00

Sent to any address, postpaid, on receipt of price. THE TRUTH SEEKER,

CONSULTING ROOMS,

Something for Invalids to read and study over—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

And but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would not submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we hav treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors, Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all forms of chronic invalidism.

The political aim of THE TRUTH SEEKER is to enforce the Nine Demands of Liberalism, which are as follows:

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

In philosophy, THE TRUTH SEEKER advocates the upbuilding of a rational system that shall lead to better lives on the part of the people, and that shall yield to its adherents all the social and emotional enjoyments of the churches, without any mixture of superstition, or the use of rites and ceremonies degrading to manhood and womanhood. This philosophy must be a growth, an evolution from lower forms, and this growth THE TRUTH SEEKER hopefully fosters. It is, therefore, both destructive and constructive.

Among the contributors to THE TRUTH SEEKER are the most eminent men and brilliant writers in the Liberal ranks of the United States, including Courtlandt Palmer, Charles Watts, T. B. Wakeman, S. P. Andrews, T. C. Leland, C. B. Reynolds, S. P. Putnam, J. E. Remsburg, W. S. Bush, Elliott Preston, John Peck, J. L. York, Susan H. Wixon, Helen Gardener, Mrs. Slenker, and many other able men and women. THE TRUTH SEEKER also makes a feature of reprinting the ablest English essayists and philosophers, and during 1884 has given its readers several papers from the pens of Frederic Harrison and Herbert Spencer. The home contributors are legion, and the communications embrace the widest possible range of subjects—religious, philosophic, Anarchistic, Socialistic, land reform, tariff and political reform.

EVERY LIBERAL IN THE COUNTRY WANTS THE TRUTH SEEKER.

DEPARTMENTS:

In the League Department is recorded the news of the National Liberal League, furnished to our columns by the secretary, and other officers of the National and auxiliary Leagues.

We also have an able correspondent in Canada, who furnishes weekly news of the Freethought movement in that dominion.

Our Children's Department is edited by one of the best and most successful writers for children in the United States. Miss Susan H. Wixon is widely known, not only in the Freethought ranks, but as a writer for popular papers and magazines. We have from all sides the strongest testimonials to the efficiency of her work in THE TRUTH SEEKER. She will continue the Department through 1885.

Through the department of "Letters from Friends" hundreds of subscribers have made pleasant acquaintances and lasting friendships. Its two pages are a place for exchange of thoughts, relation of experiences, and whatever the friends of Freethought find occasion to say. This department is a "talk together" of great and varied interest.

A FEW PRESS OPINIONS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER MAY BE GIVEN:

If any of our readers desire to read one of the best Freethought and reform journals published, we should unhesitatingly recommend to them THE TRUTH SEEKER, published by the Truth Seeker Company, 33 Clinton Place, New York, at $3 per annum. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a large, sixteen-page paper, and is filled each week with the choicest literature pertaining to Freethought and the overthrow of superstitions. It also ably discusses reforms politically and socially, and is really one of the best papers we have ever read. It is bold and fearless in its denunciations of kingcraft, priestcraft, and all other ways and means by which the people are held in bondage and ignorance, and no one can read THE TRUTH SEEKER a year without becoming nobler and better. You can get the paper three months on trial for fifty cents, and if you try it you will not want to be without it thereafter.—Rochester, N. H., Anti-Monopolist.

One of the finest monuments ever seen in this country has recently been erected to the memory of D. M. Bennett, founder of that able advocate of Freethought, THE TRUTH SEEKER, in Greenwood Cemetery, New York. One thousand friends of the dead journalist, admirers of his sterling qualities and the beauty of thought, goodness of heart, and the self-abnegation which distinguished his life, contributed to the fund by which this magnificent memorial was erected. A colored lithograph of this beautiful memorial has just reached us In reality it is a present that is appreciated more than cold words can express. Besides a view of the monument there is a fine likeness of Mr. Bennett On the monument are engraved many of the famous utterances of the departed Liberal as well as the record of his life and the work to which many years of his activ manhood were devoted. THE TRUTH SEEKER perpetuates the fame of its founder by this truly generous act, and while accepting its generosity with thanks it is but just and proper that we should add our testimony to that of thousands of others who have many times declared that as an advocate of free thought, free speech, and all that is ennobling in nature THE TRUTH SEEKER has no superior in the universe.—Lackawanna Democrat.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is an iconoclastic journal. The sworn foe of superstition and error in all its forms, its motto might appropriately be, War, war to the knife, and the knife to the hilt—for it never lets a chance go by to hit superstition a resounding blow. It is a first-class exponent of what we call fighting Liberalism. . . . Under the direction of Mr. E. M. Macdonald, it still flourishes. Besides numerous articles of a polemic character, it contains a department for children, "Notes," "News," "Gems of Thought," "Odds and Ends," and numerous letters from correspondents. Besides THE TRUTH SEEKER, the firm publishes also Liberal books, one of the best specimens of which is their last publication, the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC, a perfect gem, both in contents and finish, and which we would recommend to be sent for by those who are not yet acquainted with THE TRUTH SEEKER publications—The Sociologist.

In some towns, records the Tribune, there is more demand for roller-skating rinks than for churches.

The Journal of Rome announces the formation of a "temporal power league" to establish committees throughout the world with the object of advocating, in the press and from the pulpit, a platform for the restoration of the temporal power and domains of the pope.

A priest named Ferdinand, Baron Reverend Von Rupplin, whom dissipation had driven from the pulpit and from decent society, committed suicide last week in St. Louis, Mo. In a letter which he left he says that, having been abandoned by the bishop and priests, for the last eleven years he has been obliged to beg from door to door.

The popular faith is experiencing a change of base. "Sam," said Chio, "why doan you talk ter old massa'n tell um ter lay up treasures in hebben?" Sam: "Gwuffum heah, niggah! Sense dem Sund'y-school sup'ntendents 'n pious folks hez took ter 'bezzlin' I hez moah confidence in airthly banks then heavenly uns ez fininshul instooshuns."

The Rev. Dr. Moss, of Indianapolis, was recently published as having announced himself in the light of a fallen man, and as asking the charity of all Christians. He now denies that he ever did anything of the kind. He says he does not realize that he has fallen, and intimates that Christian charity is more especially needed by those who fabricated such falsehoods.

For several months Mr. Anthony Comstock has been forcing the Kings county officials to close the pool-rooms and other gambling hells. His failure to convict some of the men led him to charge that District-Attorney Ridgeway was in league with the gamblers. Week before last Sheriff Stegman revoked Comstock's license as a deputy sheriff of Kings county, on the ground of non-residence.

When a pulpit is employed for a useful purpose, the fact is worthy of remark. A story is told of a country parson who went to preach in a remote parish church. The sexton, in taking him to the chapel, deprecatingly said: "I hope your reverence won't mind preaching from the chancel. Ye see, the chapel's a quiet place, an' I've got a duck settin' on fourteen eggs in the pulpit."

The Methodist church at Upper Jay, N. Y., is in a bad way on account of an organ. The instrument was recently purchased, but some of the people objected to praising God by machinery, and one Sunday morning the bellows was found to hav been cut from the instrument. Everybody is mad, but no one has as yet suggested placing the minister in the organ to furnish the wind.

The students of a Western theological seminary are reported to hav discussed the question whether, in the case of a prayer having been read from a printed slip on a formal occasion, and there having been a typographical error entirely reversing the meaning of a passage, the petition was received by Providence as uttered or as originally written. The debaters spent a whole evening over the point, and then had a tie vote.

The Rev. R. Heber Newton preached on "The Attributes of Deity" last Sunday, setting forth the character of the Almighty as a mother as well as a father of the human race. He said that the common idea of God was derived from the teachings of men, who had naturally elaborated a picture of an omnipotent man, dignified and serene while dooming the greater portion of his own creatures to eternal torment. This idea had been dwelt upon by religious teachers until the world had come to believe "that wild dream of the school man, the dream of a loving father sacrificing his own son to satisfy law."

The only son of the Bishop of Rochester has been received into the Roman Catholic Church. Protestants, says the London Freethinker, readily perceive that the conversion of an alleged "Infidel" to Christianity proves the incontestible truth of the religion he adopts. But somehow the conversion of a Protestant to Roman Catholicism proves nothing but the terribly insidious nature of the Romish system and the weakness of human nature.

There is an old lady in the eastern part of Mississippi who says the Lord has commanded her to spend the balance of her life in fasting, and for three weeks she has not touched a morsel of anything. "We do not know," says the Grenada (Miss.) Sentinel, "what the Lord said to that old lady, but we think there are quite a number of people about this time that will be in her condition, without any Almighty fiat, before many moons shall wax and wane, unless they go to work."

A fund is being raised for the relief of Gen. Grant for his losses through his rascally partner, Ward. Gen. Grant's income is at present $15,000, but that is not considered enough. While few will object to the nation's favorit soldier receiving all the money his admirers may see fit to giv him, there is still a chance to inquire if something might not more appropriately be done for the poorer persons who were entirely ruined by placing their confidence and money with the firm of Grant & Ward.

A paragraph in a Toronto paper says: At church fairs in Birmingham, England, there has been a great deal of gambling. The Congregationalists had raffles for bank-notes, and the Episcopalians announced an open raffle, "tickets threepence each," with a number of prizes, including bottles of wine and boxes of cigars, for the benefit of some church schools. At last the corporation has felt itself bound to refuse the use of the Town Hall, unless some guarantee is given that there shall be no raffling.

Comstock is getting outside his legitimate sphere of activity, having just arrested a pious deacon in Hoboken. The religious gentleman was vending packages of sawdust labeled cigars, and supposed to be counterfeit money. Having purified the world, the flesh, and the devil, Comstock has at last got to work inside the church. Compared with the battle he will there find opportunity to wage, it will be seen that his previous exploits with the hosts of wickedness hav been mere skirmishes. We fear Mr. Comstock has bitten off more than he will ever be able to masticate.

Report says that "Dr. Moorhouse, bishop of Melbourne, has refused to order prayers for rain in his diocese. His lordship givs as his reason that, before complaining, people should do something themselvs toward storing up the superfluity in the wet season against the drought." We are compelled to say that the bishop of Melbourne is theologically unsound. If there is efficacy in prayer to bring about physical results, they should be prayed for. When so obtained they would come easy, and the time usually spent in useless labor could then be devoted to improving the mind.

The Baltimore Sun of Dec. 24th records the examination by the coroner of a number of witnesses in the case of Emma Kitzmiller, who died through the neglect of her husband to summon medical aid, by relying on faith to effect the cure. The deceased was the wife of Lewis B. Kitzmiller, an artist. Several weeks ago Mrs. Kitzmiller complained of illness, but having, like her husband, become a convert to the "faith cure," and placing firm reliance on the efficacy of prayer, she declined to hav medical treatment. They were members of the "Heavenly Recruits," an organization similar to the Salvation Army, and many of their relativs were also worshipers in the same school. Most of the witnesses were believers in the faith cure, and testified that Mrs. Kitzmiller refused to take medicin, averring that Jesus was her only physician. It was shown that the husband, after reading the 14th verse of the fifth chapter of St. John, laid his hands on his dying wife and anointed her. Next morning he awoke and found her dead by his side. The cause of death was found, from the examination made, to hav been inflammation of the bowels, and a verdict was rendered accordingly. The doctor averred that a dose of castor oil administered at the proper time would hav saved the woman.

Most of the errors of the press, says the Home Journal, may fairly be ascribed to carelessness and mischance. Others, however, are on record which hav been committed knowingly and intentionally, and so can scarcely be classed as errors. They hav been mostly connected with Biblical matters, and intended to further party interests. It is said that Field, a printer of the time of Charles I., was paid £1,500 by the Independents to alter a single letter in the third verse of Acts vi, so as to make the word "we" read "ye," and so giv the right of appointing pastors to the people, and not to the apostles.

We find the following in the Wall Street News. It is suggestiv of the celebrated Isabella-Methodist mine: "I hear you are without a preacher over in your congregation." "Yes, he left two weeks ago." "Had a call at a higher salary, I presume?" "Not as I know of." "Health failed him, perhaps?" "No; his health seemed to be good." "Congregation didn't like his preaching then?" "Yes, they seemed to." "Well, then, he resigned?" "No, not exactly. Fact was, he unloaded a lot of railroad stock on us at 74, and the shrinkage, together with some talk about tar and feathers, took him out just as the stock touched 52."

January 4th, at Bay Roberts, Newfoundland, there was another furious Orange outbreak. The New York Redemptorist Fathers, who are holding a mission in that place, were imprisoned in their dwelling. An Orange arch was erected near the Catholic church, and hundreds of armed Orangemen paraded the streets. When the intelligence reached St. Johns, the United States Consul demanded from Gov. Glover protection for United States citizens. An extraordinary meeting of the Executiv Council has been summoned. The British corvette Tenedos has been ordered to Bay Roberts, and a large body of police has been despatched by special trains to the scene of hostility. The latest dispatch from Bay Roberts says: "Catholic Bishop McDonald is prevented by the Orangemen from holding service in the church, which they hav surrounded. Affairs are growing darker and more threatening. Hundreds of armed men are parading the streets. The police are unequal to the occasion. The British man-of-war Tenedos has just arrived to reinforce the civil authorities. The Orangemen refuse to take down the arches or flags."

Commenting upon the conduct of the Rev. Heber Newton in preaching heretical doctrins, the Troy Press queries: "What do Episcopalians believe in, anyway? Hav they really a creed? If so, is it a sort of patent India rubber come-and-go concern that may be twisted and yanked and turned to suit anybody's convenience? Here has the Rev. Heber Newton, a clergyman of that church, been preaching for a year or more the most rank heterodoxy, and still he is permitted to stay with the church. He was arraigned some time ago before the bishop for preaching doctrin conflicting with that of the church, but nothing was done. Last Sunday he preached a sermon in which the doctrin of the messiah, clearly adopted in the alleged creed of the Episcopal church, was explained away, and no Episcopal notice seems to be taken of it. The Rev. Mr. Newton holds about the same views as Mr. Matthew Arnold, and they may be correct; but that is not the point. The doctrins of a church must be maintained, or in effect it surrenders the name of church. If the mountain does not choose to go to Mohammed, then Mohammed should be brought to the mountain and bound over to keep the ecclesiastical peace, or else ordered to move on with his sermon-machine to some other locality. Heber Newton and the Episcopal church cannot both be right. One or the other must be heterodox. Perchance both, for aught we know."

News of the Week.

France is preparing for more vigorous operations against China.

Upwards of a dozen business failures and reductions were reported by the press last Saturday.

Mr. Gladstone, the English premier, whose health is bad, is ordered by his physicians to take a rest.

New York's new mayor, Mr. Grace, went into office on New Year's Day. Mayor Edson retires under indictment by the grand jury for corrupt conduct.

Demaire Desormiers, a priest, is behind the bars in Milwaukee, charged with criminal assault on a girl. Two other similar charges will be preferred against him.

Official statistics show that up to last Sunday 678 corpses had been removed from the ruins caused by the recent earthquakes in Granada, a province of Spain.

Louise Michel, the French female Socialist, imprisoned for incendiary utterances, has been removed to an insane asylum. Solitary confinement had upset her mind.

It is understood that about 700 Socialists in Chicago are armed and drilling nightly in military maneuvers. In view of this fact, a volunteer guard has been placed in one of the armories of the city.

The Rev. Dr. Newman has received $10,000 for a funeral sermon which he preached over a sixteen-year-old son of the deceased railroad magnate, Leland Sanford, of San Francisco. The preacher compared the boy to Christ among the Jewish doctors. Gush comes high this year.

The Rev. James Pullman, of this city, preached last Sunday on the doctrin of fire, especially hell fire. The word, he thought, should be used in the discussion of religion only in a moral sense. He did not believe that fire would ever come in contact with a human soul after death.

Moody, the evangelist, is in Richmond, Va. He is a good Southerner when in the South, and takes pains to say that he never said anything unfavorable of Lee and Jackson. In thus becoming all things of all men, Mr. Moody has a no less distinguished predecessor than St. Paul the Apostle.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie, the rich iron manufacturer of Philadelphia, proclaimed himself a Socialist at a recent meeting of the Nineteenth Century Club held at the house of Mr. Courtlandt Palmer. Mr. Carnegie said to a reporter that he thought Socialism would one day rule the world, and that then the millennium will hav come.

Twenty-three students in the theological seminary at Moscow, Russia, having shown a tendency to sympathize with the Nihilists, the archbishop of the diocese has caused each of them to be severely flogged by soldiers. The friends of the students are trying to hav the priest brought to account for the outrage, but the czar's government takes no notice of their appeals.

This is the week of prayer among the churches. These institutions hav for some years devoted the first week to that sort of diversion. If they think that times hav grown better as a consequence they should feel encouraged to go on in the great work. If otherwise—and it certainly looks otherwise—it would appear like a matter of national policy to hav them influenced to desist.

A church in Brooklyn has for the last five years been occupied alternately by Baptists and Episcopalians. Now there is war over the question whether the Baptists or the Episcopalians shall hav entire control of the edifice. The Baptists at present are in armed possession. Last Sunday five men of that denomination held the fort, each with a revolver in his hand, and the Episcopalians were unable to carry it by assault. The matter will be settled in the courts, pending which it is hoped bloodshed may be averted.

Canadian Convention.

The Toronto Freethought Gathering.

In response to a call issued by the Central Executiv of the Freethought Association of Canada, addressed to the Freethinkers of the Dominion, inviting them to assemble in convention in Albert Hall, Toronto, on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, December 13th, 14th, and 15th, to consider questions relating to the perfection of the organization and germane topics, a number from Toronto and other cities and towns of Canada presented themselvs at the hall on Saturday morning. The morning was devoted to friendly greetings and pleasant conversation. It was the spontaneous opinion of those present that it would be unwise to proceed to business at once in the absence of many who were expected to arrive on the afternoon trains. Just before separating for dinner it was announced that the Convention would open at 2 o'clock.

At that hour Mr. J. Ick Evans, president of the Central Executiv of the Association, called the Convention to order. After reading the circular calling the Convention he said it would be in order to elect a chairman.

Mr. Watts moved, and Mr. Sisson, of Port Hope, seconded, that J. I. Evans be elected chairman. Carried.

Mr. Evans made a short speech thanking the Convention for the honor.

Mr. Risser was elected secretary.

Mr. Harrison, of Toronto, moved, and Mr. Groom, of Meaford, seconded, that Mr. Charles Watts, of Toronto, Mr. S. P.Putnam, of New York, and Mr. John E. Remsburg, of Kansas, be elected life members of the association. Carried.

The chairman explained that it was six years since the last convention, or annual meeting provided for by the rules, was held; since when the association has been inactiv. When it was proposed to bring Mr. Watts to Canada early last winter, a consultation meeting was held by the Hamilton and Toronto Freethinkers, and it was considered desirable by that meeting to resuscitate this organization. The Central Executiv, elected at the 1878 convention, held over until their successors were elected and qualified, and had power to fill vacancies in their body. Accordingly a meeting of the Central Executiv was called, which met on March 3d, last. They filled all vacancies in their ranks by electing the following gentlemen to serve until the present convention: Corresponding secretary, J. A. Risser; recording secretary, W. H. Durand; committee, J. Harrison, J. Taylor, C. Peters, Geo. Piddington, A. Earsman, and W. Dillon.

The convention unanimously indorsed the action of the surviving members of the Central Executiv in electing the gentlemen just named to fill the vacancies in their body.

The reports of the officers were postponed till Monday.

The subjects to be considered at the convention of which notice of motion was given in the call, were then taken up.

The question of changing the name to that of the American Secular Union, and also that of amalgamating with the National Liberal League, which is expected shortly to be known under the same name, were both referred to the following committee: Watts, Toronto; McDonnell, Lindsay; Sisson, Port Hope; Littlehales, Hamilton; and Harrison, Toronto.

Risser and Sisson moved and seconded that the Annual Convention be held on the fourth Saturday in September and following days. Harrison and Strange moved and seconded in amendment that the Annual Convention be held in September, the date to be fixed by the Central Executiv. Amendment carried.

The amendment to the constitution as noticed on the call, to change the annual contributions of the branch societies to the Central Executiv to twenty-five cents per member, instead of one-fourth of the annual membership fee, was carried.

The question of arranging for a Canadian edition of one of the Freethought papers in the States was referred to the following committee: Strange, Toronto; Putnam, New York; McClellan, Wallaceburg; Butland and Risser, Toronto.

The question of the best method of propagandism, and to raise a propagandist fund, was referred to the following committee: Remsburg, Kansas; Groom, Meaford; Young, Binbrook; Van Zandt and Allen, Stouffville.

The question of raising a building fund for building Secular halls, was referred to the following committee: R. Algie, Alton; Stoddart, Bradford; McClemont, Glandford; Taylor and Earsman, Toronto.

The question of adopting the Principles of Secularism, the Demands of Liberalism, and other resolutions as printed in the call, was referred to the following committee: Remsburg, Kansas; Chantler, Hamilton; Thompson, Duval, and Peters, Toronto.

Risser, Butland, and Earsman were appointed on the Committee on Credentials.

The secretary read letters of regret and congratulation from Geo. Wilson, R. C. Adams, C. Stevens, and F. Boas, Montreal; ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds, New York; Allen Pringle, Selby; John Ray, Welland, and several others.

The latter part of Mr. Pringle's letter discussed several matters of business to be brought up in the convention, which was referred to the several committees having the matters in charge. This portion of his letter reads as follows:

And now in regard to the business proposed to be transacted at this convention, and outlined in circular No. 4 under nine heads, I may say that with one or two exceptions it has my entire concurrence and approval. These exceptions, having reference to the 5th and 9th propositions of syllabus, I beg most respectfully to submit for your consideration.

Number five proposes "to arrange for a Canadian edition of one of the Freethought papers in the United States." This, in my opinion, would be an unwise move, almost sure to end in failure. The leading American Liberal papers are too large, and too high-priced, to meet our condition and needs in Canada at present. Very few more would take the "Canadian edition" than already take the original, while a new Canadian paper, moderate in size and price, would, in my opinion, be well sustained henceforth in Canada. Such a paper, with the name of Charles Watts as editor-in-chief, would easily get a dozen subscribers where the one proposed would get one. By this no reflection whatever against the American Liberal papers is either meant or implied. Nevertheless the fact remains (and it is a fact) that in the minds of our liberal Christians, and even quasi Rationalists, from whom no inconsiderable portion of support to our paper would be drawn, there exists a great deal of prejudice against the American Freethought papers, which would not be felt against a Canadian paper. The high price of the American papers, added to this fact, would make it quite impossible to reach these classes in the manner proposed, while, with a properly conducted Canadian paper, at a moderate price, we certainly could reach them, if not at once, at least gradually. Our neighbor's papers are too large, and too high, and the consequence is, circulations very limited. And who of those here who do take them read them half through? This is a busy age, and life is short, and our literature must be "boiled down," or we cannot go through it. For myself I never read more than one-third of the Index, the Investigator, or THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I do not know any subscribers who more than half read them. If they were half the size, and half the price, they would hav, perhaps, five times the circulation. No matter how excellent a paper may be in its own department, it is, after all, only one side of life, and as life has many sides the progressiv man must hav the others, and, therefore, none should be so cumbrous as to encroach on the others.

If anything is attempted in the way of a paper, I would strongly suggest a new paper of our own, small in size, and moderate in price. If the new paper could not at first issue weekly, let it be a fortnightly, or monthly, or even quarterly, and work its way up on a safe basis. Such a paper, aided by contributions from among ourselvs, and under the editorial control of Mr. Watts, conducted with the judgment and discretion we know Mr. Watts to possess, would, I think, succeed financially and otherwise in Canada. A small fortnightly or monthly paper need not absorb much of Mr. Watts's time, nor need it interfere very materially with his lecturing tours, provided some of the Toronto friends could look after the mechanical part.

If anything is done in the premises, I would suggest a mode of procedure something like this: Get out a circular announcing the paper, size, price, etc., and send it out to the friends throughout the country, asking them to canvass for subscribers in their respectiv districts, and send in the names by a fixed date—subscriptions for one year to be paid on receipt of first issue of the paper. If the number of names forwarded were insufficient to warrant going on with the paper, the project could be delayed. The annual subscription price ought not, I think, to exceed one dollar to begin with, even though this should necessitate a small sheet of infrequent issue.

The other matter in published syllabus of business to which I beg most respectfully to take exception is contained in proposition No. 9. Therein it is proposed to adopt not only the celebrated "Nine Demands of Liberalism" from our American brethren, but also the "Resolutions" passed at the Cassadaga Convention. Now, as to the "Nine Demands," so changed in phraseology as to suit Canada, and with the sixth radically changed, as hereinafter set forth, I am entirely in favor of their adoption by us; but I cannot see the propriety or utility of burdening our principles and platform with the "Resolutions" referred to, as they are more or less irrelevant and local in character. The same remarks I ventured to make in connection with the size of Liberal papers I venture to suggest here as to our principles and platform. Let there be no useless verbiage. Boil them down so that even our enemies will read them.

As to the Sixth Demand, that "the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead," I do not think we hav any right to make any such demand. This would very clearly (to my mind) be an encroachment upon the rights of Christians. Those people who conscientiously want to swear and take an oath to assist them to tell the truth ought by all means to be allowed to do so. And we hav no right, had we the power, to take so sweet a privilege from them. We hav a right to demand that no disability shall be imposed upon us in the courts or elsewhere, either in the matter of evidence or otherwise; but this is all we hav any right to demand. I would therefore respectfully ask you to expunge this Demand, or radically alter it before adopting them.

Yours faithfully and fraternally, ALLEN PRINGLE.

Groom (Meaford) and McDonnell (Lindsay) moved and seconded that a vote of thanks be given to the gentlemen who hav so kindly remembered us in their letters, and that we regret their absence from our meeting.

The consideration of further business was adjourned till Monday morning, 10 o'clock.

Before announcing the adjournment, the chairman extended an invitation to all the delegates to attend an informal meeting and reception at the rooms of the Toronto Secular Society, which is a branch of this association, in the evening at 8 o'clock.

A large number of delegates had arrived on the afternoon and evening trains, and the rooms, No. 9 Grand Opera House, were well filled. After some time spent in making the stranger delegates acquainted with each other, it was decided that the chairman call the meeting to order and that the secretary read the minutes of the day for the information of the new arrivals. After an informal and very interesting talk on the questions to be decided by the convention, some one called for music. A very enjoyable feature of the evening followed, which was highly appreciated by the visitors. A few members of the Toronto Society gave some samples of their musical and elocutionary talent in playing piano solos and singing sentimental and comic songs, and readings. At a late hour the company dispersed, to meet in the morning at Albert Hall to listen to a lecture on "The Sabbath Question," by Mr. John E. Remsburg, of Kansas.

Sunday morning at 10:30 o'clock, a good audience was in attendance at Albert Hall. Mr. George Piddington, first vice-president of the Toronto Secular Society, took the chair and introduced Mr. Remsburg.

ABSTRACT OF MR. REMSBURG'S LECTURE.

Mr. Remsburg showed that the Sabbath was by no means of supernatural origin; that it was a natural holiday, instituted among some of the ancient races from observation of the stars, etc., and was copied from them by the Jews.

He also showed that the Bible Sabbath was on Saturday and not Sunday; that the Bible commanded the strict observance of Saturday, but of no other day, and everyone, therefore, who did not keep Saturday was disobeying the injunctions of scripture. To keep Sunday avails not, for there is not a single word, or even suggestion, in the New Testament that authorizes any change. If Christians accept the Bible as an infallible rule for faith and practice, then they are in duty bound to keep holy the seventh day of the week, and not the first.

If there is any abrogation at all of the law, then the Sabbath is entirely abolished, and there is no holy day to take its place. This is the position of St. Paul, who nowhere enforces the observance of the Lord's day, or first day, and leaves the disciples to do in this matter as each one was persuaded in his own mind. This was also the attitude of the early Christian fathers, as Mr. Remsburg demonstrated by ample quotations. Both Luther and Calvin declared in the same way, and Luther plainly said that he would hav one sing and dance on that day rather than surrender his independence. The originator of the present strict observance of the Sabbath was the bloodthirsty Constantine, one of the greatest tyrants that ever cursed the earth. The first man to make a Sabbath-law was a murderer. What a gift for the Christian church to receive!

Mr. Remsburg showed the relentless injustice of Sabbath legislation as it was enforced by our Puritan ancestors. Noble women were fined, imprisoned, and whipped in the public streets even for visiting a sick daughter on this holy day. The annals of the Inquisition contain nothing more ghastly and outrageous than this. Shame on a church that boasts of such tyrannical customs.

The Sabbath to-day, as Mr. Remsburg affirmed, is the stronghold of the church. Destroy the Sabbath, and the church will disappear. Its hold upon civilization would be forever gone. But while we would destroy the Sabbath as an unjust ecclesiastical institution, the Sunday might still remain as a beneficial holiday for the workingmen, maintained upon a purely secular basis. The Sunday and the Sabbath are not identical. Sunday is the first day of the week. The Sabbath is an ecclesiastical formality, which according to the Bible belongs to Saturday, according to Constantine and modern Christianity belongs to Sunday, but according to common sense and universal justice belongs nowhere. Neither industry nor morality demands such a relic of superstition.

After some discussion, in which Mr. Thompson and others took part, the meeting was declared adjourned till 2:30 o'clock in the afternoon.

Sunday afternoon, at the hour stated, Mr. George Maddocks, secretary of the Hamilton Secular Society, took the chair, and made a few preliminary remarks, after which he introduced Mr. S. P. Putnam, secretary of the National Liberal League, who proceeded to deliver his lecture on "The New Work of Secularism (Liberalism)." He spoke as follows:

There will be a new church or common association around some grand ideal. We must work together, join heart and hand, and giv and take. Individuality should be preserved, and personal liberty, but greater than ourselvs is the united life of all.

We cannot organize upon the basis of mere opposition to orthodoxy. Humanity grows slowly from one idea to another by due process of law, and it is by a change of conditions, and not by direct argument, that minds are advanced. Orthodoxy itself is continually changing, and what was heresy at one time is now the popular theology. The fundamental conception of orthodoxy is wrong, namely, that there is a supernatural salvation, and it must be swept entirely away; but the surest method to do this is to show by actual accomplishment that the new is superior to the old, that there is a gospel wrought out of the common facts of life more noble than was ever ushered in from the breaking heavens.

The character of the new church is to be thoroughly democratic. It is to be of the people and for the people, and each local organization is to be independent of all outside authority, and supreme in itself.

The architecture of the new church shall be more beautiful and entrancing than that of the old. It shall express the most glorious hopes of man. Paintings and statues shall elevate the soul, and teach noblest things with a perpetual beauty. The voice of oratory, too, shall be heard. The priesthood shall pass away, but not the scholar and the thinker, who shall hav ever-enlarging career, to unfold the ever-fresh meanings of science and literature, to trace the history of man, not falling like a star from Eden, but ever advancing, until is produced the civilization of Egypt, the poetry and philosophy of Greece, the strains of Virgil, the songs of Dante, and the dramas of Shakspere. The Bible then will be a valuable book, not as containing a supernatural revelation, but being a record of the struggles of humanity. We disown nothing of the past, not Moses or Jesus. Along with them we take the lives of all, and from every point of history gather hope and inspiration.

To understand man, to understand the universe, will be the object of the church of the future, and into this glorious study our children should come also and feed upon our noblest ideas. They should not be repressed with dogma, but expanded with the sweetest teachings of science, and thrilled with the poetry and romance of life that come from the real beauties by which we are surrounded.

The music and the drama shall bear their part also in the moral progress of man. Music is not the child of the lonely superstitions of the past. Science shall touch it to noblest import, and the songs to come shall blend in triumphant exultation with the old-time joys.

The theater shall be one of the teachers of humanity. In its bright and changing scenes will be witnessed the common destiny and glory of us all. The home and social life shall be more beautiful than ever. With man's prodigious intellectual advancement there must be a deeper and finer brotherhood, a blending together of the individual and the universal.

This shall surely come; with more truth there shall be more beauty and more humanity.

"In the wide future there's a golden age,
Richer than ever gleamed on poet's page,
Where all that's excellent on earth shall thrive
And the pure, generous soul alone shall liv;
Where meanness, treachery, and narrow thought,
The stupid pleasures that are sold and bought,
The heart that's false, the spirit insincere,
The dark ambition, and the soul of fear;
All these shall vanish in its vivid light,
And happy homes shall sparkle on the sight;
Sweet liberty shall reign in every soul,
And truth and righteousness complete the whole.
Ah, yes; this happy time shall surely come;
Eye not the future with long faces glum,
This world of ours is not so very bad;
From every struggle comes a music glad;
In every sinking of the soul with dread
There is a resurrection from the dead;
When in the wilderness we faint with thirst,
Heaven's sudden angel shows the fountains burst:
Oh, there are prophecies of this bright time,
In many a burning word and thought sublime.
We feel them when the gorgeous springtime flows,
When summer murmurs to its golden close;
We feel them in those deep and mystic days
That flash and gladden in October's haze.
And winter's pure and spangling lengths of snow
Unfold its fairy visions in their glow.
Oh, nature comes from out the heart of love,
It's rich with joy below, around, above;
The universal glory flames in all,
In constellation's huge and feathery ball;
Within, without, to purity and life
The perfect wonder shines above the strife;
The earnest purpose makes the future bright,
And paradise is found in doing right."

The meeting then adjourned till 7 o'clock. In the evening Mr. J. Ick Evans called the meeting to order, and introduced Mr. Watts, who lectured on "Freethought—Its Nature, Struggles, and Achievements."

Freethought assumes that reason is the highest faculty of man. Although it is not infallible it is the best guide we hav both to truth and morality, and we must use it without fear. The moment we submit our reason to anything outside of itself we are slaves. The church, the Bible, the Gods must be defined and expressed in the terms of reason, or else they are useless. If they cannot endure the light of reason they must be swept away. Every one who has done anything for the advancement of the world has been a Freethinker, at least in that one thing by which he has benefited mankind. No fresh thought has ever come, nor new truth has ever been discovered, except by Freethought. The martyrs who hav perished at the stake hav been Freethinkers in that one conviction for which they hav died, for they hav clung to that conviction though all the world was against them. This is the nature of Freethought to submit to nothing but the enlightened intellect. There may be mistakes and errors in the process of reasoning, but reason, and reason only, can correct itself. It studies facts first of all, more facts the better; from facts, and a constantly increasing experienee, ever new results are arrived at, and nobler attainments made.

Freethought has ever had to struggle; priestcraft and kingcraft hav ever been against it. Freethought has its martyrs and its heroes adorning all the pages of human history. It has advanced slowly but surely. Through all the dark centuries it has made more light and more happiness and a higher virtue. It has developed the manliness of man, the nobility of woman. Its triumphs are great, and they will be greater yet. The future belongs to Freethought; the authorities of the past, based on superstition and ignorance, are losing their influence. The mind of man asserts its inward power. Science is to be the Christ of humanity. It opens the fountains of life and givs hope and inspiration. To Freethought we are devoted; for it we shall struggle, and in its triumphs we shall rejoice. Through its victory morality shall be enthroned in the place of blind faith, humanity shall be exalted as the supreme being for us to admire, love, and respect, and to which our energies shall be consecrated; and the future shall contain on the bosom of this earth that heaven which is the dream of its noblest spirits. Freethought shall clothe us with the powers of nature, unfold the wealth of human faculties, and by emphasizing what is useful to the world, create that which is the most beautiful and progressiv.

The three Sunday meetings were thrown open to the public by special invitation, which was made known by advertisment in the newspapers and by other means. The result was a good attendance at each of the lectures. In the evening, particularly, the hall was crowded to the doors, a large number not being able to obtain admittance. The three speakers made an exceedingly good impression on their audiences, and hav no doubt started a boom in Secularism and Freethought in Canada that will gather force as it rolls along. At the close of the meeting it adjourned to resume business at 10 o'clock, Monday morning.

Monday morning the chairman called the Convention to order promptly on time.

The secretary stated that he would like to hav the convention appoint an assistant secretary, and he nominated Mr. George Maddocks, of Hamilton, for that position. Carried.

The president made his report as follows:

Brother Agnostics, Secularists, and Freethinkers: My heart warms within me when I remember that on April 14, 1877, or nearly eight years ago, it was my pleasing duty to welcome delegates from nearly all parts of Canada and the United States to a convention held in this self-same spot, and where, for the same purpose and like business, I now cordially welcome you. Eight years bring in their wake many changes, joys mixed with regrets, and, in our case, amongst the latter may be reckoned our losses by absent friends and fellow-workers in the good cause of the intellectual emancipation of downtrodden humanity.

The number of intelligent faces I now see around me recalls to memory the many sterling friends whose absence we must all deeply regret. Many removals to distant parts, the insatiable demands of King Death, and other causes hav conspired to thin our ranks, whilst some of our numbers, having become tired and weary of the bitter fight for our rights and liberties, hav laid down their weapons of warfare and hav become passiv spectators of the great struggle now being carried on by younger and fresher forces.

In all great reforms, how few of those that first enter the field of battle for the rights of humanity liv to see the realization of their fondest hopes. In the ranks of science and philosophy we are constantly reminded of this in the fate of Copernicus, Galileo, Servetus, Bruno, and many of the most noble of mankind who hav been persecuted and murdered by bigotry and superstition.

In all ages of the world's history hav truth and enlightenment been born to be smothered by ignorance and cupidity, and therefore, friends and brothers, thrice welcome is your presence here to-day as valiant reserves come to support and succor the grand army of liberty. Your presence amongst us is more than ample satisfaction for the many causes of regret which it has been both my duty and desire to make known. You are worthy comrades in a noble cause. The question whether the world shall remain manacled and chained by ignorance and intolerance is still left to the arbitrament of your noble efforts. To the Agnostics of the world, the world owes whatever freedom mankind may possess. Roman, Greek, European, and Indo-Egyptian history is full of the glorious attempts of ancient and modern Agnosticism in striking from the ankles of an ignorant and benighted humanity the shackles of superstitious bigotry placed upon them by cupidity, self-interest, and credulity.

Now the irrefutable demonstration of scientific research opens to the world the pages of a Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, and others who form a brilliant galaxy of modern-born light, whilst the philosophic pages of Spencer are lifted from the depths formerly fathomed by Aristotle, Bacon, and the more ancient of the world's philosophers who had not the scientific assistance furnished by more modern times. Science now rushes into the arms of Agnosticism, spurning the unnatural embrace of all supernatural religions. Henceforth she occupies the throne of reason, and banishes forever from her imperial court the polluted presence of error, superstition, and ignorance.

How long may we not dwell upon the recollections of friends, comrades, and companions whose manly presence in the past gave us heart and nerved our hands in the hour of the thickest fight, and when the saddening influence of apparent defeat recalled to our minds the immortal words of one of the greatest of the world's heroes, "These are the times that try men's souls;" and truly it may he said there hav been times in the existence of our beloved society when these words of the immortal Thomas Paine were not only fully realized, but were nobly responded to in the redoubled efforts of a well-directed energy on the part of its members.

Our happy meeting here to-day is the well-earned outcome of eight years of indomitable perseverance, and although the overwhelming force of circumstances prevented our obeying the mandate of the last convention of the Freethought Association of Canada to call a convention of the Freethinkers or Agnostics of Canada at least once a year, we hav been compelled to delay such call till we felt sufficiently strong to warrant your officers in bringing from their distant homes the Agnostics of the United States and Canada to this important convention.

But although nearly eight years hav elapsed since the meeting of the last convention of the Freethinkers of Canada, we are here to-day ready to place again in your hands the noble trust with which you honored us. A small number of the old officers of the Freethought Association of Canada, which were elected at the last convention, are still within its ranks, but where it was necessary to fill vacancies to carry on the business of the association, such appointments hav been made relying upon the circumstances of each case and the good will of the members of this convention to ratify and sanction such appointments.

Your officers hav much pleasure in announcing the fact that the Freethought Association of Canada is a fully incorporated society, having all the rights, privileges, immunities, and emoluments that such incorporation implies. This incorporation was obtained under the general act of the House of Assembly of Ontario, passed for the benefit of benevolent and other societies, but there is strong reason for believing that if it had been foreseen that Agnosticism or Secularism would avail itself of the provisions of the act it would not hav become law.

The evidences of the foregoing fact are so strong that they remind us of the injustice and intolerance that still sorely vex the Agnostics or Secularists of Canada. The most notable of these is the law of evidence. This iniquitous law has to some extent been modified by the provincial government of Ontario in civil cases, but still the foulest murder may be committed upon an Agnostic in any part of Canada, and if no other evidence than that of a brother Agnostic could be obtained against the murderer, he could not be convicted on such evidence. It therefore becomes every Agnostic or Secularist to sack party, to divest himself of all personal considerations in one determined effort to obtain repeal of a law that disgraces the statute-book of any country or people professing to be free. To the Mowat government of Ontario belongs the honor of the first step in the relief of persecuted Agnosticism.

You will be asked at this convention to sanction the amalgamation of the Freethought Association of Canada with the Liberal League of the United States. The main object of such amalgamation is to be prepared to meet arbitrary exactions, deprivations, or vexations to Agnostics in Canada or the United States. The necessity of such organization is made fully manifest in Canada by the late seizures of the works of Paine and Voltaire in the Toronto and Montreal custom houses on the absurd plea of "obscenity." Had this amalgamation existed when this unheard-of plea was put forward by the over-zealous collectors of Montreal and Toronto, they would hav most certainly been called upon to defend their positions in the law courts of the country. Such amalgamation of Agnosticism and Secularism on this continent will make bigots of the stamp of these sapient collectors think twice before they again attempt to become the laughing-stock of all advanced or enlightened communities. These books hav since been condemned to destruction by the dominion government of Canada, thus soiling its otherwise intelligent rule by the irreparable stain of bigotry, superstition, and intolerance.

In obedience to the resolutions passed at the last convention of the Freethought Association of Canada, held in this hall on the date before named, and in furtherance of the propagandism of Secularism in Canada, your officers invited to Canada, as a permanent propagandist lecturer, Mr. Charles Watts, of London, England, upon an arrangement that will be laid before the convention for ratification and approval. The extraordinary success of these lectures, together with the increase of local branches at Hamilton, Welland, Dunville, Owen Sound, Meaford, Oshawa, Lindsay, Belleville, Gananoque, and other places fully warrant the step taken by your Executiv to place before the people of Canada the principles of scientific Materialism.

Your Executiv in returning into your hands the honors conferred upon them, confidently ask your approval, and this, if given, will mply repay the trials and anxieties naturally consequent on so important a charge as the propagandism of Freethought or Secularism when orthodoxy is so strong as it is known to be in Canada. But before separating or rendering up their respectiv offices, they respectfully beg to recommend that the future corresponding secretary receive the sum of two hundred dollars annually, payable quarterly, as a douceur, and not as a salary. The arduous nature of the work required in the effectiv working of the office of corresponding secretary cannot be insured without some such provision.

A detailed account of receipts and expenditures will be laid before the convention, and which we trust will meet with your approval, hoping that you will be able to acquit your Executiv of laxity of endeavor or of extravagance of expenditure. Much more might hav been done with more ample funds, but your Executiv fully trusts that the financial and general management of your generous trust will be found to hav been administered with due regard to the best interests of our association, and to the satisfaction of the honorable members of this convention. All of which is respectfully submitted by your humble servant, J. Ick Evans, Pres. F. A. of Canada.

The secretary made a brief verbal report, promising to giv a more extended one in the columns of The Truth Seeker and the Investigator at a future date. After giving a brief resume of the condition of the Association previous to the reorganization of the Central Executiv, he stated the circumstances that brought about the re-organization. The leading Freethinkers of Hamilton and Toronto had made a proposition to Mr. Charles Watts to make his home in Canada and organize the Liberal element throughout the country. It was considered desirable to place this matter before the Freethinkers in the Dominion as early as possible. That it might be done in a manner that would create confidence, it was decided to resuscitate the Freethought Association of Canada that was incorporated under a general act of the Ontario Parliament in 1878, that its Central Executiv should should take the matter in charge and present it to the Liberals of the country, soliciting their support, both financially and activly. On March 3d of this year the old members of the Central Executiv held a meeting at the rooms of the Toronto Secular Society, and filled the vacancies in its body—as stated by the chair in the proceedings of Saturday. Under the instructions of this body a circular was drawn up, dated April 1st, and mailed to all Freethinkers whose addresses he had procured. The contents of this circular, that gave the details of the proposed arrangement, hav been in the possession of all present, and need not be dwelt upon here.

The responses to this circular hav been very liberal, but still more money is needed. The detailed report of receipts in response to this circular will be given in the treasurer's report. In September Mr. Durand, who was elected secretary to fill a vacancy, resigned his office, since when the corresponding secretary has filled the office pro tem. The Toronto Secular Society voted itself a branch of the Freethought Association of Canada, and branches hav been instituted as follows:

Welland Secular Society.
Aylmer Secular Society.
St. Thomas Secular Society.
Belleville Secular and Literary Society.
Gananoque Secular Society.
Alton Secular Society.
Hamilton Secular Society.
Oshawa Secular Society.
Lindsay Secular Society.
Meaford Secular Society.
Owen Sound Secular Society.

The societies at Toronto, Hamilton, Welland, Alton, and Lindsay are in flourishing condition, the others need more or less encouragement and assistance. The preliminaries that hav brought about this convention are more or less familiar to all, and it is not necessary to take up your time in recaptulating them.

The election of officers who compose the Central Executiv for the term ending with the next annual convention was then taken up, and resulted as follows:

President, J. Ick Evans.
Secretary, R. B. Butland.
Corresponding secretary, J. A. Risser.
Treasurer, John Taylor.

Committee, F. Strange, J. Harrison, Geo. Piddington, A. Earsman, G. McFedries, Chas. Hicks, Chas. Peters.

Trustees, who are not members of the Central Executiv, T. Littlehales, Hamilton; Wm. McDonnell, Lindsay; John Groom, Meaford.

Mr. Charles Watts, from the committee on changing the name of the association and amalgamating with the National Liberal League in the United States, recommended the passage of the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the name of the Freethought Association of Canada be changed to that of the "Canadian Secular Union."

2. Resolved, That the Canadian Secular Union (late Freethought Association of Canada) be amalgamated with the National Liberal League of the United States, under the general title of the American Secular Union.

Mr. Watts said that the whole of the committee appointed to consider the advisability of this change and amalgamation were heartily in favor of the proposed alterations. Personally, he deemed it a most important step in the right direction. The term Secular was more definit than the phrase Free-

The Liberal Club.

The regular reporter of the proceedings of the Liberal Club—probably fearing that Mr. Vaughan would be there, or that the ghost of Mr. Shook might stalk through the hall—declined to attend. This chronicle will, therefore, as it is prosaically accurate, and unrelieved by a vivid reportorial imagination, be different from previous reports.

Prior to the lecture by Mr. Remsburg, Madam Delescluze occupied the platform for half an hour soliciting aid for John Swinton's Paper. Twenty subscriptions was the amount of aid she wanted. The writings of Mr. Swinton, Madam Delescluze alleged, contain food for thought and exhilaration. Nineteen subscriptions were soon obtained, but the twentieth came slow, and Dr. Foote put in another dollar to relieve the suspense of those who did not wish to help, yet feared the lady would turn to them personally. Madam Delescluze thanked Dr. Foote warmly, and also the club. She would, she said, make the labor unions blush for their lukewarmness when she recounted to them the generosity of the Freethinkers. (A voice: "That's extreme." Another voice: "That's so.") The club was not a labor organization, yet it had done more to help the labor cause than any union in the city. The madam was going on to make a speech, but the chair cut her short by intimating that she could hand the twenty dollars to Mr. Swinton with the compliments of the club, and that now Mr. Remsburg should hav the floor.

Mr. Remsburg denied that Sunday was established by the Bible, and quoted, to show its origin, the edict of Constantine, A.D., 321:

"Let all judges and all people of the towns rest, and all the various trades be suspended on the venerable day of the Sun. Those who liv in the country, however, may freely and without fault attend to the cultivation of the fields, lest with the loss of favorable opportunity the commodities offered by Divine Providence should be destroyed."

He cited the following authorities against Sabbath keeping:

Martin Luther: "As regards the Sabbath, or Sunday, there is no necessity for keeping it; but if we do, it ought not to be on account of man's commandment, but because Nature teaches us from time to time to take a day of rest. . . . If anywhere the day is made holy for the mere day's sake, then I order you to work on it, to dance on it, and to do anything that will reprove this encroachment on the Christian spirit and liberty" (Table Talk).

Phillip Melancthon: "They who think that by authority of the church the observance of the Lord's day was appointed instead of the Sabbath, as if necessary, are greatly deceived" (Augsburg Confession).

John Calvin: "Christians should hav nothing to do with a superstitious observance of days" (Institutes, B. II., chap. viii).

William Tyndale: "As to the Sabbath we be lords over, and may yet change it to Monday, or into any other day as we see need; or we may make two every week, if it were expedient, and one not enough to teach the people. Neither needed we any holy day at all, if the people might be taught without it" (Tyndale's Works, B. I., chap. xxv).

Archbishop Whately: "There is not even any tradition of their having made such a change; nay, more, it is abundantly plain that they made no such change" (Notes on Paul).

Jeremy Taylor: "That we are free from Sabbath observance, St. Paul expressly affirms in Collossians" (Doctor Dubitantium, B. II., chap. ii).

Bishop Warburton: "The observance of the Sabbath is no more a natural duty than circumcision" (Divine Legation, B. IV., sec. 6).

John Milton: "The law of the Sabbath being thus repealed that no particular day of worship has been appointed in its place is evident" (Christian Doctrines, B. II., chap. vii).

Erasmus, Neander, John Knox, John Bunyan, Richard Baxter, Dr. Paley, Bishop Cranmer, and many other eminent divines and reformers might be named as standing opposed to Sabbath observance.

In closing, Mr. Remsburg said: "Against these Sunday laws let every honest man protest. They are not needed. Justice is not observed in their enforcement. Whatever is a crime or misdemeanor on Monday, is a crime or misdemeanor on Sunday; and whatever is lawful on Monday, cannot in justice be unlawful on Sunday. Let the people of this country enjoy that entire civil and religious freedom which the genius of their Constitution guarantees them. Let each one determin for himself, not only which shall be his sacred day, but also in what manner it shall be observed. Let those who deem it their duty to set apart one day in seven for religious worship do so; let those who desire to appropriate a day to rest or study do so; and let those who desire to devote a day, no matter what that day may be, to pleasure and recreation, do so. Let them step forth from this puritanical prison into the grand palace of nature—not as escaped convicts, liable to hav their reputations brained by a statutory club in the hand of some brutal justice, but as free people, serene with the consciousness of not having committed even an artificial wrong. Let those who wish to make Sunday the saddest, dreariest day of all the seven, enjoy the 'blessed privilege,' but let them keep their meddling fingers from off those who would make it the brightest, sweetest, happiest day." The lecture was attentivly listened to and heartily applauded.

Madame Delescluze said she thought all ministers did not wish to make Sunday a gloomy day. She knew many who wanted libraries and places of rational amusement open on that day. She was brought up to observe the Sabbath strictly.

Dr. Weeks did not believe that any institution was an unmixed evil. Superstition during the Dark Ages preserved the germs of civilization. Dr. Weeks once met a man in Westchester county, a Calvinist, who held that Universalism would lead to crime. He (Dr. Weeks) remarked that a man who thought that way ought to be caged—and Calvinism was just the cage for him.

Mr. Welch, if he had his way, would not permit Jews to keep their stores open on Sunday, because he had a cousin who kept a shoe-store on Grand street, and this cousin told him (Mr. Welch) that the Jews kept their stores open on Saturdays after 3 o'clock and all day Sundays. This compelled Mr. Welch's cousin to do the same. Mr. Welch thought the churches were not so bad as the rum traffic.

Mrs. Leonard said the saloons flourished better where Sunday laws were in force. In the cities of St. Louis, Cincinnati, and Chicago, which were the center of the universe, people had picnics and enjoyed themselvs freely. There were many reasons why we should hav a day of rest. The wealthy do not need any rest.

Mr. Rosenburg got up to go home, but upon Mr. Wakeman's agreeing to speak sat down. Mr. Wakeman said the speaker of the evening had told them why the Christian Sabbath should not be kept by church-going. He wished Mr. Remsburg had added a few paragraphs showing how the day ought to be used. By the farmer, Mr. Wakeman said, the Sunday should be utilized for mental improvement. The professional man should go out-doors. Mr. Wakeman usually spent the day on his farm, working. He had been threatened with arrest, but he told his Christian neighbors that out-of-doors was his church—couldn't they see the dome?—and that his way of worshiping was by communing with nature. He had not been arrested yet, but when he was that was the line he should fight it out on. People should also take a bath on Sunday, but should never use tobacco or alcoholic drinks—for what was the use of keeping the outside clean if the inside was filthy? Cleanly people who drank or smoked were whited sepulchers.

Mr. Remsburg said he could not tell people how to spend Sunday, except they should each judge what was best for himself or herself. What he was laboring and pleading for was the liberty to use the day in any way one pleased. At the conclusion of Mr. Remsburg's short reply the audience, including Mr. Rosenburg, dispersed, carrying away the impression that Mr. Remsburg knew about as much concerning the Sunday question as his critics.

Editorial Notes.

When the Catholics ruled Italy, its funds were quoted at thirty-six. Now they are at nearly the same figures as the English.

The managers of the New Orleans Exposition hav decided to keep it open on Sundays. At which decision the Protestants are wroth, but the Catholics look upon it with favor.

"There are some poisons so subtle that no chemical test can detect them, but the smallest quantity introduced into the system will produce almost instantaneous death. Such, too, is the secret poison of the tongue. How fatal it is! Oh, the lives it has ruined, the homes it has destroyed, the hearts it has broken! Sometimes half a truth is given; at others silence, accompanied with a suggestiv shrug, will blast a life, and, once started, you cannot stop it. Said an English writer who had felt the sting of slander, 'There is no personality too mean, no insinuation too audacious or too false, for the recklessness of these slanderers.'" So said the Rev. C. H. Eaton, in his sermon last Sunday. We hope he and his brother preachers will remember these words when they orate their usual abuse of Paine on the Sunday after the 29th.

"Somehow the beautiful Christmas spirit seems to hav penetrated even the unbelieving bosom of the editor of The Truth Seeker. How else account for the appearance of Christmas poems and stories in that Infidel sheet?"—Catholic Union and Times.

The observance of Christmas is a social custom derived from the pagan festival of the so-called birth of the sun. It has been stolen by the Christians, who try to make the world think they originated it. It is a season of rejoicing, and can be appropriately used by any one, pagan, Infidel, or Christian. The holidays are a time of jollity and good cheer, of making presents and renewing friendships, and most Freethinkers believe in using them. Certainly every occasion of doing good or of making relativs and friends happy should be utilized. A very good custom the Chinese hav on their New Years is that of paying their debts. It is a very good way to giv pleasure.

One of the questions put to the Advocate last week was as to the ultimate destination of one who was once an evangelical church-member and became a Unitarian in faith, but, until death, believed in prayer, and exhibited the fruits of the spirit in patience, long-suffering, charity, and the abhorrence of falsehood. This complication puzzles Mr. Buckley. While he has "no doubt of the destructiv nature of the heresy of Unitarianism, believing that its direct tendencies as a system are equally antagonistic to the doctrin and the spirit of the gospel, it is not our province to decide, or even to hav an opinion, upon the future of any one individual. If the person referred to became self-righteous, ignored Christ as a savior, lost all consciousness of sin and dependence upon redeeming grace, we see no ground in the New Testament for hope of acceptance. But if the change in the mind did not extend to the heart, and left the person practically a believer with the heart while somewhat astray in the understanding, the gospel givs ground to believe in his salvation. But dogmatic Unitarians who deny human depravity and guilt, the need of regeneration, and the atonement of Christ, repudiate specifically the doctrin of justification by faith, and feel competent to work out their own salvation, cherishing a claim upon the favor of God based upon conscious righteousness, are entirely outside the kingdom of Christ as described in the gospel." Dogmatic Unitarians will therefore please take notice that they can expect no mercy from the Methodist devil. He will burn them that the scriptures may be fulfilled.

The generous aid extended to Mr. Swinton by the members and attendants of the Liberal Club on the evening of Mr. Remsburg's lecture will, perhaps, open that gentleman's eyes to the fact that the best friends of the laboring man are to be found among the Freethinkers. It will be a long time before any champion of Labor will be allowed the use of a pulpit from which to plead for John Swinton's Paper. Madam Delescluze knew better than to go to Socialist Rylance for the opportunity of advocating to a Christian congregation the cause of the class of people among whom Christ is said to hav made his home, or to any of the preachers whose hearts bleed for the poor, but whose pockets and those of their sleepy hearers are hermetically sealed to all except the heathen, who are much better off than the poor appealing at the church's very doors for justice and a chance to earn their living. The condition of those who most need the change will never be bettered till they hav dropped their superstition and work upon the utilitarian principle of happiness and prosperity here on earth, and cease to regard this life merely as a vale of suffering through which they must pass as best they can in order to enjoy a world hereafter.

The following account of missionary tyranny comes to us through the Hindoo Excelsior Magazine. It took place in Lahore: "A young man—a Brahman—adopted Christianity, and anxious to bring his wife over to the fold, went to bring her to Lahore from his nativ village. Arrived at Lahore, he did not go to his brother's, and quieted the suspicion of his wife by saying that he had fallen out with his brother and taken up separate lodgings. She was on this pretext taken to the mission compound, and introduced to a lady who passed herself off as a Khetrani. The suspicion of the decoyed woman was, however, soon roused, and she got hold of a sweperess to convey the news of her arrival to her husband's brother. In the mean time, her husband and the inmates of the mission coming to know that she was likely to be rescued, she was taken over to Kussoor, where she was detained for nearly a couple of days, without food or drink, under the auspices of the local mission. Great secrecy as to her whereabouts was observed, but the secret, notwithstanding, oozed out, and her friends, with the aid of the police, at length succeeded in effecting her deliverance." Proceedings for damages are about to be instituted against the zealous Christians.

An English Society for the Conversion of the Jews announces as the result of its last year's work the conversion of four Jews, at an average cost of about $21,000 each. The Times of this city thinks this is dear, and unfeelingly throws suspicion upon the genuinness of the work. "There was formerly," it says, "and perhaps still is, an edifying ceremony held yearly in the baptistery of the Roman Church of St. John Lateran, where a Jew is publicly baptized. It has, however, been more than suspected that the Lateran Jew undergoes conversion annually for a fixed salary, and that he promptly returns to the Mosaic faith the day after his baptism, and continues steadfast therein until the next year. Converts like this one are not particularly useful, and certainly they are not worth $21,000 apiece. Heathens come so much more cheaply than Jews, that it seems as if the English society already mentioned could spend its money with better results in Africa and Polynesia than among the European Jews. A fair article of African convert can be made at a cost of about $250, and the gentle Polynesians can be converted at even a cheaper rate. The money which the society has laid out on four Jews might hav converted 84 Africans and, say, 100 Polynesians. This surely would hav been a better investment of the money, and would hav been far more satisfactory to the society's subscribers."

The present week sees the last of the Review, a Liberal monthly published by R. P. Wilcox, of Milan, Ohio, and the first number of the Agnostic, published by E. M. Lester in Philadelphia. In his valediction, Mr. Wilcox expresses deep regret at having to part with his readers. "We have worked," he says, "long and hard to make the Review an important factor in the cause of reform, and it pains us, after having spent our youthful days with our paper, to giv it up; but so it must be, as a pressure of other work has rendered it impossible for us to do it justice. Friends, we greatly dislike to part with you, many having been with us since our commencement of journalistic labors, but hope it is temporary, and only for a few years at most." The salutatory of the Agnostic promises that the paper "will strive to be as much of a gnostic as possible in all that pertains to the betterment of our condition in this life, and only assume the Agnostic position toward another life of which we know nothing, and can know nothing, notwithstanding the assertions of professional purveyors of such information to the contrary. The Agnostic will also fearlessly present the gospel of free speech, free press, and a free people, with the word free subject only to the limitations imposed by the essential conditions of civilized society, trusting in the protection promised by our constitution to save us from the avenging thunderbolts of priestcraft in this life, perfectly content to trust to our own prowess to outwit their sheriff and executioner (the devil) in any other world which we may chance to be sojourning." We lament with Brother Wilcox the death of the Review, and exult with Mr. Lester that a new standard-bearer has arisen. The Liberal press is the life of the Liberal cause, and the more journals we hav, the sooner will liberty triumph. But we could wish to see all Freethought papers better supported.

News and Notes from the Field.

A MERRY CHRISTMAS AND A HAPPY NEW YEAR.

My Christmas this year did suffer
"A sea change
Into something rich and strange"

up here among the magic snows of Canada—that is, I took my dinner at the hospitable board of Frederic Strange; and had no reason to be homesick. I met his cordial wife, who is still a Christian lady, but has the womanly knack of getting all the good there is in the old religion, without a particle of its bad. This is a marvel which a woman can accomplish, but a man, never.

Of course the plum pudding was gorgeous, and the mince pie as delightful as ever our New England mother could make. Old England and Yankeeland were thus nicely amalgamated in these two triumphs of cookery. Our Secular heart was thoroughly satisfied.

The afternoon passed merrily away with music, and in the evening we were "Off to Egypt" at the Opera House, witnessing a comical musical farce with the above title, written, I believe, by a Canadian author; and it is quite a clever production, and shows that the muse of poetry is not entirely frozen out amid these tremendous snows of Canada.

On Friday evening there was a pleasant elocutionary entertainment at the rooms of the Secular Society, in which Mr. and Mrs. Watts, Messrs. Strange, Harrison, and Piddington, and others took part with gratifying success. There is no doubt that the dramatic ability of this society will prove a powerful aid to its future growth.

On Sunday Mr. Watts lectured, as usual, to crowded houses, in the afternoon and evening. In the afternoon he gave "More Bible Saints," and it may be presumed that it was by no means an orthodox Sunday-school lesson that he gave. These ancient worthies did not receive their usual whitewashing by which they become shining models of virtue to the youthful mind. In the evening Mr. Watts lectured on "Orthodox Fictions: The Fall and the Atonement." No doubt orthodoxy received a logical fall for which it will receive no atonement.

When I left Alton a few days since, it was twenty-four degrees below zero, and I was somewhat impressed with the vigorous weather of this northern clime. However, it has, like New England weather, the faculty of change, and when I came back the snow was beginning to melt, and now it is all off the hills, and the roads are bare, and the winds hav been as balmy as spring, and the skies as blue and sunny; and one might almost imagin that the summer was at hand. But I was in time, however, to hav one happy sleigh-ride on Sunday morning, amid the winding hills and pleasant valleys. The snow sceneries were lovely with fringes of frost in the softly shining glare, and gave hints of the surpassing loveliness of summer's glory.

In the afternoon of Sunday there was a gathering of the Secular Society of Alton in the Hall of Science, and, as appropriate to its name, I gave an address on "The Spirit, Method, and Results of Science." The spirit of science and the spirit of theology are exactly opposit. Science is predetermined to no particular result. Theology is, and so all its reasonings are vitiated, because they are partial. The spirit of science takes in every aspect of the universe, and accepts the truth whether beautiful or ugly. The method of science is, first of all, to observe and then theorize and find law; then verify and make certain. Theology theorizes first, and then observes. It goes from ideas to facts; science goes from faots to ideas, and its ideas are founded upon facts.

Theology has produced nothing. Science has given all the delights and comforts of life—what we eat and wear, the roof above our heads, the golden harvests. Science flows to the art of life, and is the genuin Christ of humanity.

The theme presented by the speaker was discussed by William Algie, Robert Algie, Mr. Bull, and others. The constructiv side of the Secular movement was emphasized. We are not to overthrow the theologies of the past without putting something better in their place—all that science can teach and all that art can giv. The great end is the perfection of the human race, in body and mind. Improvement in all things is the word. We are to take hold of practical life and build it up in knowledge, and through that attain the beautiful and the good.

On Monday evening I also lectured on "The Church of the Future." The church is a circle or association of many minds around one common ideal or belief. But is there any common belief around which Liberals, with all their diversity of thought, can gather and become one great body? Yes, and the first is that aim, and not creed, is the test of fellowship. All who mean to do right, to work in any way for the happiness of the world, these will belong to the new church. The common beliefs of those who thus gather for the mutual attainment of truth and progress, are, first, nature, and not the supernatural; second, science, and not theology; third, liberty, and not authority; fourth, individuality, and not custom; and fifth, humanity, and not God. Around these noble ideals will gather advanced minds, and thus the best thought will become a fountain of practical happiness.

That the world is progressing with vast rapidity is seen in this little village of Alton itself, of about a thousand inhabitants. About six or seven years ago there were only about two Infidels in the place, and they were considered to be something awful. I hav no doubt I should hav been mobbed if I had given a lecture then on Freethought. But time has broken things up wonderfully, and now the Alton Secular Society numbers about thirty members, and it has a building of its own. However, the struggle is not yet over. There are three or four churches in this place, and all through the country there is tremendous opposition. The ministers realize that they are in peril, and are sending forth thunders of warning against this new Hall. One of these reverends has publicly in the newspaper advised all young people to avoid this building as they would a pit of devils, etc. Some of the papers hav taken it upon themselvs in their editorial columns to attack the Secularists. Mr. William Algie has vigorously replied to these onsets, and also some editors, seeing the signs of the times, hav put in a word or two for progress. So there is a great agitation going on, and for miles around the people are wondering and thinking about this affair. It is as if a bomb-shell had been thrown into their midst; and thousands of people who really never had an idea that there was any such thing as progress begin dimly to realize that the world moves, and heaven and hell are not such fixtures as they imagined, and are very likely to be lost in the confusion of these latter days. This Hall is like an electric battery, and it sets the orthodox to dancing in holy horror; but their dancing is much better than their former inaction; and since they are so lively in their heels, it is possible that they will be equally lively with their heads and thus get a notion of what this universe really is.

An amusing incident occurred this week—amusing and also instructiv and encouraging, as it shows the advance of truth and justice. Mr. Wm. Algie happened to be candidate for school trustee, because it was the general impression that he was altogether the best man, although he himself did not care for the onerous position, for he already had enough of responsibility. However, the district was determined this time to hav a live man, so that something might be done for the benefit of the children, so that they would not drag themselvs unwillingly to school, as if they were going to prison. The non-progressiv element, seeing that in the natural course of reason they would be defeated, thought to play their trump-card, and so the cry was raised that Mr. Algie was a heretic. This instantly developed activity, and for a few hours there was about the liveliest time on record.

"There was mounting in hot haste,
The mustering squadron and the clattering car
Went pouring forward with impetuous speed,
And swiftly forming in the ranks of war."

Every available man was brought into requisition. Even the women voted, as they can if rate-payers in school elections; but to their credit be it said they all voted "to a man" for Mr. Algie, and thus showed that the "softer sex" hav hard common sense as well as men, and can do their duty in the world of politics. It turned out to be a Waterloo for orthodoxy. It was roundly defeated. Of course, church-members and adherents of the old faith voted for Mr. Algie, otherwise he could not hav been elected. But he was elected on the ground that he was the best man, and the fact that in spite of all the hue and cry, and the terrible things that are said about the Secularists, of whom Mr. Algie is one of the pronounced and uncompromising leaders, the fact that church-members voted for him because they knew he was worthy, shows how deeply the tide of genuin humanity flows on, and that the affairs of this world transcend those of any other in the minds of common-sense people. So we can score one for justice and progress in this hot contest that for an hour or two shook Alton to its center. Mr. Algie was triumphantly elected.

Next Sunday Dr. Algie is to begin a series of lectures on "Sanitary Science," which will no doubt be of exceeding interest and value. The doctor has won his own way in his profession, and has ever been an out-and-out Secularist, although he was almost alone when he first came to Alton six years ago. His skill and energy hav conq uered in spite of all opposition. He is a man of original ideas, and thinks for himself, even in regard to medicin, which doctors do not always do, for medicin, like theology, has its orthodoxy.

Besides these lectures Mr. Wm. Algie will lecture on "Machinery: Its Struggles and Triumph," and Mr. Robert Algie on "The Faults of Our Present System of Education." Mr. Robert Algie has himself been a teacher and has some good thoughts to giv as to the right method of training the human mind.

So the Alton Society has laid out quite a work, dealing with the practical problems of the day and the real issues of life. They purpose at once to hav a gymnasium so as to cultivate the body as well as the mind. Both the material and intellectual will be well cared for in this temple of the new religion.

New Year's was the anniversary of the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Mathew Algie, and, of course, I remained to enjoy the festival occasion. Mr. and Mrs. King, of Georgstown; Mr. and Mrs. Beaumont, of Glen Williams, with other old friends, were present. Mr. Beaumont is a veteran Secularist, one of the first supporters of Mr. Bradlaugh, and is still strong in the harness. A few of us sat up and saw the old year out and the new year in. The day itself was bright and sunny, and the air was full of promis. When evening came it was closed with dance and song; young and old were gathered together and memory and hope blended in delight. We thought of the long years of the past, of what had been accomplished, and with the graciousness and majesty of old age crowned with gray, but bright with the freshness of eternal nature, was the brilliancy of youth, not knowing yet of all the ills of life, but feeling that good was more than evil; and from the beautiful example before them they realized that work, if well done, would receive its reward, and that life in itself is full of wealth if one has the patience, the skill, and the courage to evoke it.

Besides the music and the dancing, and the good things to eat, there were songs, recitations, and readings, and a short address and the following poem by S. P. Putnam, and the merry hours heralded the work and the victory of the future, and with memories of the dead, richer as time flows on, were joy and strength for the living.

GOOD-BYE, AND ALL HAIL.

Good-bye, Old Year! you and I
Hav traveled many paths together;
Through sorrows deep and joys sublime,
And days as lightsome as a feather.

Ah, me, what graves hav we gone by—
Graves of many hopes laid low;
But oh, what glories we hav seen
From hights that flashed like altar's glow!

Through golden dawnings we hav passed,
And midnight dark o'er dreary land;
And we hav looked on faces dead,
And greeted angels, shining grand.

A strange companion, thou, Old Year,
Smiling, frowning, singing bright;
Now dancing like a maiden fair,
Then creeping slow like burdened wight.

Tears and anguish thou hast given,
And the goblet's sparkling flow;
Thou hast dragged our bleeding footsteps,
Pressed the balm, and conquered woe.

O sweet Old Year, triumphant year,
O sad, and wild, and darkling year,
We bid farewell; life's angel thou,
We've traveled upward through all fear.

Our journey is a picture fair,
The dark and bright resplendent shine
Where Memory hangs it on the wall,
Made glowing by the hand divine.

All hail, New Year, we know thee not,
While still thy hand is frankly pressed;
Soft and bright thy morning look,
But thy course is faintly guessed.

Shall we walk through happy lands?
Shall we pluck the roses fair?
Shall we hear the singing splendor
Of the melting lark in air?

Shall we walk the hills delightful,
And the meadow's still content,
Where the limpid waters glitter,
And sun and shade are golden blent?

Shall we range the valleys splendid,
Gemmed with cataract's bridal veil?
Shall we linger by the palace,
When music sweeps the evening gale?

Or shall we feel the breath of sorrow
On the bleak and bitter way?
Shall we pass the solemn portal?
Shall we see bright hopes decay?

We know not, O uncertain Year,
What thy many paths may be;
But we greet thee, radiant stranger,
With a soul serene and free.

Fraternally yours, SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Lectures and Meetings.

PROFESSOR WM. M. LOCKWOOD'S address is Ripon, Wis., not Omro. His correspondents will please take notice.

W. F. JAMIESON can be addressed at Pipestone, Minn., by those desirous of engaging him to deliver courses of lectures.

COLONEL INGERSOLL will deliver his new lecture, "Which Way?" at the Academy of Music, in this city, next Sunday evening.

AMELIA H. COLBY is lecturing in Norwich, Conn., on every Sunday in January. In February she will go to Portland, Maine, returning to Horticultural Hall, Boston, for the Sundays of March, thence to Springfield, Mass., for April. For the month of May she is open to engagements. During the summer months she will be employed in western New York attending camp-meetings. Although lecturing for Spiritual societies, any Liberal in the vicinity of her engagements will find himself well repaid for attending. We never heard old theology more heavily hammered than by her, and she talks much less about the other world than about making this one better.

J. E. REMSBURG lectured on "Bible Morals" in Philadelphia Sunday night to an audience filling every part of Hancock Hall. The secretary of the Bible Soclety there had threatened the arrest of anyone who publicly attacked the Bible. Mr. Remsburg's address was announced through the press, and the clergy of Philadelphia invited to attend and reply. But one clergyman responded, the Rev. Dr. Westbrook, and he gave the lecture his unqualified indorsement. Dr. Westbrook said: "I cannot tell you how much I appreciate the lecture we hav heard. Every word of it I heartily indorse. Mr. Remsburg's impeachment of the Bible is just. I hav never heard the case so fairly and so ably stated as he has stated it to-night."

The "Directory."

MR. GREEN desires us to say that, on account of unavoidable circumstances, the Freethinkers' Magazine for January will not be out until about the 20th of the month It will contain original articles by T. B. Wakeman, Helen H. Gardener, Judge McCormick, and others.

thought, and conveyed in a clearer light the fact that our views hav reference to the duties of existence apart altogether from theological teachings. Secularism in Canada is but in its infancy, and it is therefore necessary that its true nature and position should be very distinctly understood by the public. Moreover, Freethought does not always include Secular philosophy, whereas Secularism, if properly understood, must necessarily embrace Freethought. It was gratifying to know that this truth was being recognized throughout Canada, where, during the last three months, branch societies hav been formed. Great and unprecedented as the progress of our principles in the Dominion has recently been, it is hoped that under the new name still further advancement will be speedily made. In some few places a slight timidity is manifested in connection with our advocacy on account of orthodox persecution. Our friends say that in such districts the time is not ripe for Secular advocacy. There is, said Mr. Watts, some truth in this, but then, he thought, the best way to make the time ripe was to judiciously expound Liberal views. Public opinion cannot be better prepared for the reception of new truths than by discreet advocacy and personal fidelity to conviction, allied with honor and integrity of conduct. Society is more ready than ever it was to value correct actions as being higher than loud professions. The secret of success in future will be work, not faith; deeds, not creeds. To welcome and enforce this grand improvement is the object of "The Canadian Secular Union." In reference to the proposed alliance, should it be accomplished, the truth of the proverb, "Union is strength," will be amply verified. An organization of between thirty and forty thousand members must hav its due weight with our opponents, and doubtless will make them less incline in the future to resort to such petty acts of persecution which, of late, hav been before the public. Secularists should be among the first to acknowledge that humanity is higher than nationality, and that the pursuit of truth ought never to be retarded by national distinctions.' The object of both associations, those of Canada and the States, is the same, the emancipation of the human mind from the allurements of a degrading theology born of ignorance and priestly machinations. The attainment of this object will be the surer and easier by concerted action. Besides, the new departure of the National Liberal League renders the amalgamation the more acceptable. Its basis of operation is now confined to principles upon which all Secularists can agree. Certain questions of a political and social nature are no longer deemed a necessary part of the Secular program, but are left to individuals to form what opinion commends itself to their judgment. This departure Mr. Watts thought a most wise one, and enabled him to consistently adopt the same policy in this country that he observed in England, namely, to keep political and social propagandism separate from the strictly Secular, in the sense which that term is now understood by the American Freethinkers. After some further remarks in favor of union and activ work, Mr. Watts concluded by urging the convention to indorse the recommendation of the committee.

After brief speeches by other members of the convention, that developed the fact that good feeling toward the United States body reigned supreme, the resolutions were carried without a dissenting voice.

Mr. F. Strange, from the committee to whom was referred the question of arranging for a Canadian edition of one of the Freethought papers in the United States, recommended the passage of the following resolution:

Be it resolved, That considering the present financial condition of the Canadian Secular Union, and its comparativ unorganized condition, for the present this convention avail itself of the liberal offer of the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER to devote one or two columns of that paper to the reports of Canadian news, and that the Central Executiv of the Canadian Secular Union be empowered by this convention to take steps for the publication of a weekly organ as soon as it shall be assured of the probability of success of such an undertaking.

The discussion that followed showed that it was the general opinion that the Canadian Secularists should hav a paper, and until one could be established on a good financial footing, that it was our duty to recommend to the Freethinkers of Canada to support THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator who hav given us the free use of their columns. The resolution passed without opposition.

Mr. John E. Remsburg, from the committee on the best method of propagandism, and to raise a propagandist fund, submitted the following report:

The bulwark of Secularism is popular education. To aid in this work we urge upon Secularists the importance,

First. Of sustaining our public schools; increasing their efficiency by eliminating as fast as possible all teachings of a supernatural character.

Second. Of establishing and supporting public libraries.

Third. Of extending the influence, and increasing the usefulness of the public press—encouraging and supporting those papers most friendly to our cause.

To promote the interests of Secularism in particular, we recommend the following:

First. That Secular societies be formed in cities, towns, and rural districts wherever a sufficient number of Freethinkers exist for organizing such a society.

Second. That frequent and regular meetings be held by such societies.

Third. That lecturers qualified to present in an intelligent and attractiv manner the principles of Secularism, be employed wherever and whenever practicable.

Fourth. That earnest efforts be made to extend the circulation of our Freethought papers and periodicals.

Fifth. That our Freethought pamphlets and books be circulated far and wide.

Sixth. We especially urge that Secularists strive as earnestly to instill into the minds of the young the truths of Secularism as Christians do to inculcate the errors of theology.

To secure the necessary funds for carrying on this work, we recommend a general fund be obtained.

First. By an assessment of ten cents per month upon each member of the several branch societies, these moneys to be forwarded by the treasurer of the branch society to the treasurer of the general society.

Second. By a general subscription from friends of the cause of whatever amounts they see fit to giv.

The report of the committee was carried unanimously after a brief discussion.

Mr. Robert Algie, from the Committee on Building Secular Halls, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a Building Fund be established in connection with the Canadian Secular Union. This fund to be contributed by the various local societies, or individual members of the Secular Union. This fund to be used in giving assistance in the way of a loan, bearing interest, to such local societies as may deem it necessary to build such halls. The amount of loan to be given to each society so requiring it to be determined by amount required for the building of such hall on which a loan is solicited, and by the amount already subscribed by the local society.

During the discussion that followed, one or two alterations were suggested, but not formally moved and seconded. The resolution of the committee carried unanimously.

Mr. John E. Remsburg, from the committee to whom was referred the principles and platform of Secularism, and certain resolutions printed in the call for the convention, recommended the adoption of the following as the Principles of Secularism:

1. That the present life being the only one of which we hav any knowledge, its concerns claim our earnest attention;
2. That the promotion of the general and of our individual well-being is at once our highest wisdom and duty.
3. That the only means upon which we can rely for the accomplishment of this object is human effort, based upon knowledge and experience.
4. We judge conduct by its results only—what conduces to the general well-being is right; what has the opposit tendency is wrong.

They also recommended the adoption of the following as embracing the Demands of Secularism:

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Parliament, in provincial legislatures, in the militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the governor-general or by the lieutenant-governers of the various provinces, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand the legalization of purely civil marriage and the establishment of a divorce court.
9. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
10. We demand that, in the practical administration of the government, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The committee also reported in favor of the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, 1. That all who favor the secularization of our government be earnestly and cordially invited to unite and become activ members of the Canadian Secular Union.

Resolved, 2. That in inviting co-operation with the different classes of Radicals in the grand objects of secularizing the Dominion and Provincial governments, and exposing the falseness of the popular superstition, the parties must never forget that in all our discussion of the main topics, and of such side issues as may occasionally present themselves on our platform, each person's thought and speech, while they must be entirely and sacredly free, should also be entirely respectful and considerate to those who may hold opposit views. This mutual respect and consideration being the the natural and immediate growth of Freethought, and the very meaning of the word, is absolutely the only ground on which we can stand in harmoniously executing the mission we here undertake as reformers.

Resolved, 3. That we deem it the duty of the Secularists in their respectiv localities to organize societies, lyceums, kindergartens, and all other instrumentalities for educating children in the principles of science and secular government.

Resolved, 4. That we earnestly recommend to Secularists everywhere to pre-arrange and give orders to their survivors concerning their funerals, so that their opinions and character may not be misrepresented after death by the exponents of the popular religion.

Mr. Phillips Thompson, from the same committee, presented a minority report, agreeing with the majority report in every particular excepting as to No. 7 of the Demands of Secularism, and was in favor of its elimination, believing that the existing law enforcing Sunday observance is absolutely necessary for secular reasons, in order to secure to the laboring class a day of rest and to prevent their being deprived of this boon by the insensate greed of capital.

In the the discussion that followed, it was explained by Mr. Remsburg and others who opposed the minority report that it was not their desire to repeal the laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as a day of rest, but of Sunday as the Sabbath. Some spoke in favor of two days' rest in a week, and that they should be guarded by all the legal restrictions and penalties possible. All that they demanded was the repeal of such laws as compelled everbody to religiously observe the day. The majority report was adopted.

Mr. Wm. Algie and Mr. J. Harrison moved and seconded the following resolution:

Resolved, That the corresponding secretary be remunerated for his services by the payment of $500 per annum from the General Fund; and that this sum be paid quarterly as a douceur and not as a salary.

The corresponding secretary said that in the present financial condition of the Canadian Secular Union he would not accept any moneys from its treasury, either as a gift or a salary. He thanked the gentlemen for their kind appreciation of his labors, and he would be pleased to labor gratuitously in the future, as in the past. He would not oppose the motion, simply because he did not wish to bind his successor to take his action as a precedent. If he had himself alone to consider, he would oppose it. The motion carried.

Mr. Thompson and Mr. Risser moved and seconded that

WHEREAS, The Toronto Mail newspaper has persistently misrepresented the aims, actions, and character of Secularists; has refused them the opportunity of replying to such falsifications demanded by common justice; and has carried the spirit of orthodox persecution so far as to decline the publication of advertisments of Secular gatherings; therefore be it

Resolved, That we recommend all Secularists throughout Canada to discontinue subscribing to or advertising in the Mail.

The resolution carried.

The treasurer's report, receipts and expenditures in detail, was read by the secretary. The totals are as follows:

Receipts, - - - - - - - -	$706.06
Expenditures, - - - - - - -	583.20
Balance, - - - - - - - -	122.86

The report was accepted.

Mr. Thompson and Mr. Risser moved and seconded the following resolution:

Resolved, That the conduct of the Customs Collectors of Toronto and Montreal in seizing the works of Thomas Paine, and other Secular publications, is contrary to every principle of free and enlightened government, and calculated to lower the standing of Canada in the eyes of the civilized world as a bigoted and non-progressiv community.

Carried unanimously.

The formal business of the convention was concluded. Many points were thoroughly discussed in committee and in private conversation during Saturday and Sunday that saved much discussion in convention; and nearly all the delegates were prepared to cast an intelligent vote on each question when put by the chair. Besides the business actually done, there was much done informally that does not appear in the minutes. The sentiment of many sections of Canada on important points was elicited that that will prove of great value to the Central Executiv in guiding their deliberations. There was a perfect unanimity of feeling manifested throughout. Each member of the convention seemed impressed with a depth of earnestness that created a mutual good impression. Many came from widely different sections of the country, who knew each other by name and reputation only, and who met each other face to face for the first time. The delegates separated on the adjournment of the business sessions, feeling that something had been done that would bear a rich harvest in the near future.

In the evening the convention closed by having a good social time generally. A concert and soiree was held at Albert Hall. The following was the program for the concert: Piano Solo, Miss Harrison; Quartet, Secular Glee Club; Reading, Mr. Piddington; Song, Mr. Hicks; Duet, Mrs. Morton and Mr. Strange; Song, Mrs. Miller; Quartet, Mrs. Miller, Miss Verral, Messrs. Edwards and Harrison; Third Act of Othello, Messrs. Watts and Harrison; Song, Mr. Edwards; Quartet, Secular Glee Club; Comedietta, "Morning Call, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Watts. –

The program was well received, and encores were frequently demanded. At eleven o'clock dancing was called. The manner in which the program of dance was gotten up was much admired, and created considerable amusement. A copy of the dance program has been sent to THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator, and no doubt it will be printed in their columns when the demand upon their space is not so great as it is at present. At twelve o'clock about one hundred and fifty marched into the supper-room and filled the inner man and woman with many of the substantials and delicacies of the season. After discussing dinner for about an hour, dancing was resumed, and on the completion of the program the party dispersed.

Thus ended the Toronto Convention, that will long be remembered by those who took part in its deliberations and its closing festivities. J. A. RISSER.

California Letter.

DEAR EUGENE: I am pleased to note the progress in raising funds for the Freethought campaign, and hope that our friends, Watts and Putnam, will find their way to this coast, and giv our people a new impulse in the cause of truth.

I am the only resident traveling speaker on this coast, where it has been our pleasure to battle against superstition for seventeen years past, and, we may be permitted to say, with some good degree of success, and, during all the past, hav never seen an idle hour for want of an appointment.

Of course we hav had many hard struggles to maintain ourselvs in the lecture field, but they who hav been for us hav been more than they who are against us. And as I compare the past with the present, I am glad to note the growth of Liberalism on the Pacific slope as also throughout our country.

When I began my work in California, our friend D. M. Bennett had not then espoused the cause of mental freedom, which afterwards found such excellence in his leadership, and audiences were not so easily obtained as to-day.

But now, as our apostles from the East will find, good audiences will greet them everywhere on the Pacific slope. And I would that my words might inspire the friends of Freethought to establish a permanent lecture bureau to help those who are fitted for the work to keep alive a constant fire upon the enemies of mental freedom Some people may be consoling themselvs with the happy thought that our cause is rapidly advancing, and that no effort is needed to hold up the hands of those who labor in the field. All such are ill-informed. The orthodox snake dies hard, and has yet a terrible hold upon the people, from the fact that it is so fashionable to wear the mark of the beast.

It is true that hypocrisy has taken the place of sincere belief in creeds and dogmas, and our fight to-day is not against honest belief, but against fashionable pretense of belief, and cruel shams, Thus Christianity has largely contributed to inaugurate an age of shoddy and sham, which has permeated society to its very core.

This is the status of society to-day, with no rainbow of promis for the removal of this fashionable deviltry, save in an educational development purely secular in character.

But I am glad to know that of late a better state of feeling prevails in our national and auxiliary Leagues, and most sincerely hope that Liberals everywhere will wake up to an activ interest in the cause of truth.

But what is truth? Truth is the right relation of things, or that which is capable of demonstration.

And I am made glad every day to know that there are truths quite sufficient for the complete development of mind and body in all normal directions, sufficient for the attainment of happiness, without soaring among the clouds in vain attempts to solve the problems of a future life, which seem to elude our grasp, and help to drive Liberals apart, rather than furnish a band of fellowship and co-operation.

Suppose that there is another life—and I admit the belief—what of it? I cannot liv that life until I reach it, and the attempt to liv in two worlds at one time must inevitiably result in the blunders of religion and mental disease.

If we could but know ourselvs, and the intricate workings of our own complex being, and the true import of mental phenomena, the supermundane might greatly diminish, and find less need of gods or ghosts to account for much that passes for proofs of departed spirits.

But ignorance of ourselvs is the rich soil in which credulity flourishes, and we go on, child-like, building castles in the air.

I do not speak for you, dear brother and sister, but for myself, twenty-five years of close observation and investigation hav driven me often to the work of revising the cargo, or else be hopelessly sunk in an unknown sea of conflicting theories and statements in regard to a class of phenomena which, as I believe, are but little understood, much less solved to the satisfaction of many thinking people.

Of course, curiosity and love of life lead us to investigate the proofs of continued life; and this is right to do so, and to reach out in every direction after truth; and years of experience hav taught me to leave a broad margin for science to shine in upon, and more fully solve these problems which many hav declared solved and count as closed questions.

It is true some questions need to be closed; but the question of future existence is not among the number.

Questions in sociology, which relate to my well-being and moral life here, should be settled. But of the hereafter, permit me to wait for more light before I assume a knowledge which has not as yet reached the high altitude of full demonstration. And we can safely hold this question an open one, as to my mind the elements of usefulness and happiness here do not depend on a belief or knowledge of another state of existence; and to indulge in hard feelings or words about the proofs of that life beyond, is folly.

It is true there are many people so organized as to find apparently great comfort in receiving communications from their dead, and, in fact, become morbid in that direction, To me such a state of mind is not normal and healthy; and to be always contemplating the state of the dead is like living in a graveyard; it more or less unfits us for the realities of this life and our cheerful duties to the living. And to be constantly on the stretch and strain after some medium to reassure us of the existence of the departed is productiv of but little good and much evil.

A swarm of frauds, shams, and self-deceived people, along with some genuin mediums, for the manifestation of these occult forces, hav come to the surface in response to and as the result of this undue anxiety to see and talk with our departed. And we hav on this coast our due proportion of these unwholesome graveyard tricksters, who trifle with the most sacred feelings of the human heart, feeding like ghouls upon the credulity of good and honest people, pretending to materialize the forms of the dead.

I hav children and friends on the other side, whom I hope to meet in another life. But far better is it that our departed should be hidden away, enshrined as a sacred memory in loving hearts, than to be dragged out by such mercenary, vandal hands, clad in pretended and questionable habiliments of mortality. And sometimes I hav thought that the ministration of the angels of which we are unconscious is far better than that of which we think we are conscious.

To my mind, a healthy hopefulness for the dead, and a helpfulness for the living, conjoined with a desire to make all and get all out of this life possible, is the true spirit.

Dear Eugene, and many friends and readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, it is with a degree of pain and reluctance that I bid you good-bye, and take up my line of march, on the 20th day of this month, for the—to me—unknown land of Australia. I shall carry with me many kindly recollections of you all, and will hope to meet you again. And in the mean time you shall hear from me through THE TRUTH SEEKER and Boston Investigator from time to time.

With many kind wishes for you and yours, I am
Yours for all truth, DR. J. L. YORK.

When Did Anno Domini Begin?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Your correspondent Mr. Sidelinger, in common with perhaps the majority of mankind, is mistaken in saying, "It was not the year 1 until the twelve months of the first year had actually passed away." The year 1 began with January 1st, seven days after the mythical birth of Jesus Christ, and ended with December 31st. Just so the nineteenth century in which we liv began with the first day of 1801 and will end with the last day of 1900. And just so we say that an infant died in the first year of his age; or, if you please, the 21st.

And here let me point out a universal chronological error in calculating backward from A.D. 1. In every table that I hav seen one year is omitted, namely, A D. 0, which ought to come in between A.D. 1 and 1 B.C.

To illustrate: The first year of our era corresponds with the year 753 A.U.C.—i.e., from the foundation of Rome. I now arrange a parallel table, as it should be, for a period of twenty years, beginning with 742 A.U.C.:

A.U.C.	B.C.	A.U.C.	A.D.
742	10	752	0
743	9	753	1
744	8	754	2
745	7	755	3
746	6	756	4
747	5	757	5
748	4	758	6
749	3	759	7
751	1	761	9

Here are two decades. From 742 A.U.C. to 761 inclusiv is twenty years; and from 10 B.C. to A.D. 9 inclusiv is twenty years. But if A.D. 0 is called 1 B.C., then 10 B.C. becomes 11 B.C. (as all the chronological tables hav it, except the astronomers); and you hav the absurdity of paralleling the figures thus:

A.U.C.	B.C.	A.U.C.	A.D.
743	10	753	1

And the practical result is that in reckoning from any given date B.C. to any given date A.D. you lose one year.

But where the period to be reckoned is all before or all after the beginning of the Christian era, there is no necessary error. Herod the Great died 4 B.C.—that is to say, in the fourth year before the beginning of A.D. 1. Augustus Cæsar died A.D. 14—that is, in the fourteenth year after the beginning of A.D. 1. He died August 19th, having reigned for a period of thirteen years, seven months, and eighteen days since the first day of A.D. 1. ANTIQUARY.

Mr. Wettstein—Mr. Watson.

Mr. Otto Wetstein tells us that "vast masses of humanity which hav lived and died in the past" are identical with "human beings not yet born," which is simply asserting in a roundabout way that "death ends all." But as this is the very thing in dispute, his assertion without proof goes for nothing. Again: "that which has a beginning must hav an end;" and "all objects of nature seem subject to this imperativ law." But this is hypothesis without proof, and will not do for a basis from which to demolish or annihilate anything whatever. An argument based on an assumption which may or may not be true is worth nothing at all. And this disposes of the first four paragraphs.

Next we are told that "no one is so bold as to assert the activity or consciousness now of non-existence or of the coming man" to be born in the year 5000. "Yet it would be no greater absurdity than to affirm the existence now of the dead." Simply another assertion without proof, which goes for nothing; and the fifth paragraph is disposed of.

Again: Mr. W. speaks of it as a "grand, startling, and overwhelming mystery how it can be possible that when a man is dead—when all and every particle which made him a man has assumed other forms, when his whole being is annihilated and he has vanished—the identical man is still alive!" But this is not Spiritualism at all, and would it not be a wiser course, when writing about Spiritualism, to write on the subject in controversy instead of telling us what a mystery it would be for a man to still liv after being annihilated?

Again: "If man after death can exist during all eternity without the wonderful and subtle organism which now makes him a man, what a waste of natural energy is it that this splendid form was produced at all!" Another false premis, for Spiritualists claim that it is the wonderful and subtle organism—the spiritual part—which still livs after the death of the body. And nature may hav wasted energy, but may it not be Brother Wettstein who is wasting the energy?

Conclusions drawn from false premises, assertions, or hypotheses not proved, or based upon misrepresentation, must all go for nothing; and when this common-sense rule is applied to Brother Wettstein's article, there is so little left that it is hard to find. The arguments of Spiritualists to prove continued life is not referred to at all. But we read of "miraculous organs." Spiritualists do not believe in anything being miraculous, but all natural from beginning to end. Man is dual, and the spiritual part (which is matter too, for there is nothing else) livs after the death of the body, and it is oftentimes seen and identified by its friends here in the body. There hav been seers in all the ages who could see spirits and hold converse with them, and in thousands of instances they hav given tangible and satisfactory proofs of their identity as friends or loved ones known here upon earth. And this evidence is cumulativ and overwhelming—sufficient to satisfy almost the entire world of mankind of the truth of the doctrin of immortality, or continued life.

In view of this fact, and in view of the gradations and changes in matter from the crude to the refined, its combinations and results, its unlimited capabilities and possibilities—even producing life and all other things in nature—there would not seem to be anything specially marvelous in the idea of a dual man—of a natural body and a spiritual body, as they put it 1800 years ago—and the repeated assertions of Mr. Wettstein do not make it appear even improbable. The spiritual phenomena would seem to prove it conclusivly. And then it seems to be in harmony with evolution and the theory of development, and altogether there is quite a preponderance of evidence in favor of the theory of Spiritualism.

It will not do to pronounce man's duality and the continued life of the spirit "the cunning device of avaricious priests and cranky visionaries" in the face of evidence which has been sufficient to satisfy millions of the truth of the theory.

And Brother Wettstein's knowledge of nature, its forces, attributes, and qualities, is rather too limited for him to decide the question dogmatically.

Lowellville, Dec. 19, 1874. WM. WATSON.

A CIRCULAR has been issued by the Liberation Society, which proposes that the disestablishment of the church of England be made the leading question in the coming elections. The circular was issued after a consultation with a number of Liberal members of Parliament.

Parallels Between Two Systems of Religion.

Confucianism and Christism are in many respects similar. Indeed, the newer religion follows the older so closely that capable students of religion hav insisted that it is largely a copy of its predecessor. And now it seems, by a letter from a missionary in China to the Missionary Herald, that the parallel extends to the attitude of the respectiv sectaries toward their ancestral religion. Confucianism is the state religion of China, professed chiefly by the upper classes, though exercising not a little influence upon the Buddhism of the common people. Christianity is the state religion of nearly all the western countries, and, though not formally adopted by all, is the religion of the majority of the people. That Christianity is changing gradually, is known and acknowledged by pretty nearly everybody. Growth comes through decay, and the theology piled around the Galilean reformer is growing less through the decay of the belief in its truth. If we may believe the letter of this missionary, the religion of China is suffering in the same way. "One of the heaviest weights to lift in China," says he, "is the indifference of the Chinese soul to spiritual things." How like this is to the cry of our preachers! The worldliness of the times is the one theme of our pulpiteers upon which all agree. Rolling up their eyes, they inform us that actually two-thirds of the people never read the Bible, never pray, never ask a blessing on the bread the Lord has provided, and, worse than all, never attend nor contribute to the church. Then, drawing down the corners of the mouth, they picture the crowded condition of the lower regions, and wonder where the devil will find room to put all the men folks bound his way. This persistent inattention to spiritual things is a great drawback to the spread of religion and consequent fattening of the ministers. Then, again, the Chinese are like us in another respect: "One has only to look at their attitude toward their own forms of religion to become convinced of this. How often one in traveling sees temples in dilapidation—sometimes enough of the walls has tumbled down to expose the mud-gods to a very severe sun-bath or to the rain." How close the parallel extends! The attitude of the Chinese mirrors the position of a great portion of the western world toward the religion of Christ. In China the temples are in dilapidation. Here the churches are nearly all mortgaged, and only that they are exempt from public burdens, a great many would hav to be sold to pay taxes. New churches are built, but the mortgage is on before the roof, and the traveler who should closely investigate the affairs of the church would find that it was only the money of some sinful bank or insurance company that kept the walls from tumbling down. And then the mud-gods of the Chinese are exposed to storms. So, too, are the mud-gods who preach in our joss-houses. Scarcely a day passes that a storm of indignation does not visit some mud-god who has proved more than ordinarily earthy, and dirtied with polluting touch some trusting female worshiper. And the worst of it is in China, as it is here, "that the people who support the priests, who patch up the temples and re-color the faded gods, do not stand up at all manfully for either priests or gods." How like, how very like the Christian! The men here who giv of their wealth to support the church leave the poor preachers to escape the toils of the police justices as best they can. How many poor defaulting deacons and Sunday-school superintendents hav been obliged to leave family and friends, and seek refuge in Canada, because the men who paid the preacher would not stand up and shield them from the sun-baths to be obtained in jail-yards or the rains that muddy the inside courts of state-prisons! They do not stand up at all manfully for them.

And then the faith of the two peoples—it seems to be very similar in its weakness. "You can make the Chinese angry enough," our missionary tells us, "if you take a proper subject; but that must be something else than the gods to whom they burn incense. They will often help you out in arguing against them, and laugh at the folly of thinking them to be anything. Why, then, do they go to the temples? you ask them. For two reasons. One is that they do not go very much, which is true; the other is that other people go, and it is the thing to do, especially on festival days, when you most want to join in the 'warm disturbance,' a thing very dear to the heart of the gregarious Chinaman. The fact is, they are insincere in their worship of these imputed gods, and they know it; but they hav been here so long that they think there must be something in it. 'Better to believe that these things are, and not to believe that they are not,' is one of their sayings. 'There is probably some good in believing.' And this is about as strong a faith as most of these people possess." The person who cannot see a parallel in this must be very blind. Our people do not go to church very much, either; in fact, it is a constant source of grief to our church authorities that so small a per centage of our population is found on Sunday in the sanctuaries of the cities. And those who do go, go on festival days, and because other people go. That there are insincere people in our churches, also, is a matter not in dispute.

> "There's nowhere found a house of prayer,
> But Satan builds an altar there."

We presume the Chinese Satan is very like his Christian brother, who fills the churches with cheating grocers, gambling brokers, shoddy dry-goods men, and horse-trading deacons. At least these men are in all our churches, and if the devil did not put them there, who did? And as to belief, the Chinamen are just like the Christians. The Chinese maxim, "Better to believe that these things are, and not to believe that they are not," is matched by the Christian saying, "It is better to believe, for if we are wrong, we are as well off as the Infidel, while if we are right, we are a great deal better off;" and the other heathen aphorism, "There is probably some good in believing," has its parallel in the concluding sentence of the Christian saying, "It is better to be on the safe side." "And this is about as strong a faith as these" Christians "possess."

And the pagan Chinamen also pray for rain. This the missionary states as though it were positiv proof of their heathenry. But one need not hav a very long memory to recollect when some of our rulers asked the priests to pray for rain, or to stay a grasshopper plague, and the refusal of one of England's ministers to order a day of prayer in answer to the solicitation of the Christians is well known.

Still another point of resemblance between the Chinese and one of the most powerful of our Christian sects is their conception of idolatry. "Talk with them about their idol-worship, and you will find not a few who claim that the idols of mud and wood are nothing but symbols of the gods. I noticed the other day that the old dragon-king who was being carried in procession—he being in likeness of an old man—was made so wretchedly that there was nothing to him but a paper front pasted upon a straw frame, which was quite open to the public behind him. I mentioned this to my teacher, asking how the people could make themselvs believe in such a shabby thing as a god. 'They know it is nothing,' he said, 'but a representativ, and that it has nothing to do with the god except to make the people think of him.' And I believe that such a statement has much truth in it." Talk with a Catholic on the same subject, and he will giv precisely the same answer. The Catholics, he will tell you, do not worship the little wooden and brass Jesuses that are profusely found in the churches and cathedrals, but only use them as a representation of their god Jesus. The carvings of the "Virgin" are not Mary nor are they idols, but symbols, representations—anything but what the spectator might suppose them to be. The statue is only to make people think of the mother of their god, and obtain her intercession with him for them. No more idolatry in it than in the heathenish worship of the degraded Chinaman!

There are many other instances in which the Chinese resemble the Christians. They talk much of virtue, but practice it not. Honesty is a cardinal tenet of Confucianism as well as of Christism, but both heathendom and Christendom are dotted with jails. The accepted code of morals of both systems is high; the precepts of Confucius are repeated by both Confucian and Christian with equal glibness, and with equal futility so far as any practical application of them is concerned. And for the life of us we can see in this letter of the missionary no more reason for his being in China than there is for a Buddhist or a Confucian priest to come here. The condition of religion is practically the same in both countries—dull, cold, dying. A mutual interchange of missionaries and experience in sustaining an effete theology might be profitable, perhaps, but the one-sided efforts of the Christians are a useless waste of money.

John Corwin.

The recent death of Mr. John Corwin, of Lansing, N. Y., has called to mind incidents in the life of that man which are of especial interest to Freethinkers. Mr. Corwin was born May 2, 1809, and, owing to the superstitious turn of mind of his mother, was baptized at a tender age in a Presbyterian church at Teetertown, now Lansingville. It is due to the memory of his mother to say that she afterward seceded from the church. Mr. Corwin married at the age of twenty-two, and shortly thereafter experienced a sort of subjectiv illumination which he mistook for religion, was re-baptized by immersion and received into the Presbyterian church, and soon became deacon. Mr. Corwin relates these facts in an autobiographical sketch, and then pauses to observe:

> "I wish here to record one fact that my later experience and observation hav developed, viz., that about all the benefit I ever derived from connection with the church was the facilities thereby afforded me for learning the nature and true character of organized ecclesiastical institutions. My spiritual aid and improvement hav always been the result of private meditations and devotion, outside of all churches, but in sympathy with the good of all humanity."

He then proceeds to giv the circumstances of a split which occurred in the church to which he belonged, and to tell how he was expelled therefrom and imprisoned for blasphemy. He says:

> "The first of the disturbance on Sunday was my 'reading and talking between two worships,' when the church was not serving God. Soon after I commenced, Deacon Lyon called loudly for order, that they might hav a prayer-meeting, whereupon one of the approved brotherhood put on his Sunday face and began to pray. But soon finding his prayer did not reach the ears of the people even, he got up again.
> "Next, when the deacons passed the bread, there was 'that disturber' in the midst of the communicants. When they passed me by unheeded, I arose and said, 'Brother Bower, I ask in the name of a disciple for a portion of that bread, wishing you to remember that as you giv it not to me, you giv it not to Christ.'
> "While making this remark, I was called to order by the 'consecrated' clergyman. I turned to him and said, 'Unless you deny that the church of Jesus Christ is sister to this church, I am invited to the table.' I then sat down, adding, 'See how fast Antichrist is being revealed.'
> "When the cup in like manner was passed to a brother in the next slip to me, I turned to him, saying, 'Brother Davis, you love me.' A watchful hand stood ready to take the cup from him in a hurry. After which I made only a few more quiet remarks."

For these mildly heretical utterances Mr. Corwin was, as he writes it, ruthlessly torn from the bosom of his family, "bound fast with cords, and dragged through the mud like a dead dog, taken before a wicked magistrate, pleaded against by an ungodly pettifogger, and sentenced to prison." The term of his sentence is not recorded. But he bore up bravely under the hardship, congratulating himself that, though surrounded by stone walls and iron bars, he still had more liberty than was accorded him by his Christian brethren. When at night he was locked in his solitary cell, he was reminded of the night of darkness and superstition that had shut itself down on the church. The returning light of day typified to his mind the dawn of truth and Freethought which must eventually break. When he heard the chains clanking on the limbs of his fellow-prisoners it caused him to remember those in bonds as bound with them. The stars twinkling through the window made him remember also one star above all others—the star of liberty. On his release from prison he was tendered an enthusiastic reception by a large concourse of the townspeople, by whom he was held in high esteem.

As to his accusers, Mr. Corwin saw them drop out of sight one by one. He particularizes thus:

"John C. Blakely, who swore out the warrant against me, is dead. He is reported to hav lain for several hours at the house of a neighbor too drunk to go home, only a year or two before he passed away. Caleb Lyon, Deacon Daniel Bower, Timothy Walker, and Milo Andrus, who swore against me, all died long ago. Samuel C. Lyon, a younger man than I, died several years ago with softening of the brain. The constable, a proud young man of some wealth and respect, though he is yet living, is a poor, broken-down wreck of his former self."

The six-thousand-dollar church building was sold at auction for two hundred and fifty dollars, and torn down.

Mr. Corwin was in later life a Spiritualist, dying in that belief at the age of seventy-five years. He was a man of superior intelligence, a weekly correspondent of the Ithacan newspaper, and universally respected and venerated. Because of his independence of thought, people said of him, "Old Uncle Corwin is queer," but they were constrained to add with emphasis, "He is honest." He was an ardent Abolitionist in the days of slavery, and that fact had not a little to do with embittering the minds of his then fellow-Christians against him. As the Ithacan puts it, "he has been gathered to his fathers," as he believed to their very presence. Leaving his belief aside as immaterial, he was one of the men who helped to make Freethought and liberty possible to-day, and he deserves well of his country.

"The Story Hour."

Every one who has seen "The Story Hour" says it is a beauty. Not only will it please, amuse, and instruct the children, but it is a pretty volume to hav around the house. As two thousand copies will hav to be sold to get back the money spent upon it, we hope there will be no unnecessary delay on the part of parents in ordering one or more copies.

Punished for Blasphemy!

Another tale for the marines is in print. This time the scene is laid in the United States, and Indiana is the state selected by the correspondent. The affair occurred last month, and the story runs in this wise: James Lyman recently moved into Lee township, Brown county. His family consists of a son and two daughters. In early years he was a seaman, and although he tells but little of his past history, it is believed, from relics and other souvenirs which he has in his possession, that his adventures on the ocean would make a volume of romance. It is said of him that when eleven years of age he ran away from his home in Boston and determined to adopt a sailor's life. He concealed himself in the hold of a ship about to weigh anchor, and was carried off to sea on board a vessel. Lyman soon learned to swear. As his years increased his profanity became more voluble. His ship touched many foreign shores, and by frequent association with the nativs he gradually acquired their manner of speech, and in time became the master of four different languages. In all of these he was an adept at swearing.

One day last month while superintending a force of hands in making a clearing, an accident threw Lyman into an excess of passion. Words more blasphemous than ever before uttered rolled from his fluent tongue, while he danced about in a perfect paroxysm. Suddenly the impious declarations ceased. Lyman fell face downward to the ground, and was unable to move a muscle. A genuin thunderbolt or a bullet through the heart could not hav paralyzed his senses quicker. Sight was destroyed, speech gone, and motion impossible. After thirty minutes' prostration, he recovered slightly, but was unable to regain his lost speech. His eyes were also dimmed. On the arms of two strong laborers he was borne to his house, where has has since been resting in a half-conscious condition.

There! if that is not an able story, then we never read one. It is romantic, heroic, and imaginativ. It is poetic and pathetic. It is musical as the strains of a lyre. In short, the only quality that it apparently lacks is—truth. However, if anyone can substantiate it, they will please communicate with the Christian Evidence Society of Washington, who will no doubt pay a large reward for the particular "cuss-word" that brought down the bolt of the Lord's avenging wrath with a view to inducing other Infidels to use it, and thereby demonstrate the unutterable glory and majesty of God.

The Latest Example of Christian Morality.

Comparativly few instances of conspicuous and persistent wickedness hav come to light in the history of contemporary morals which hav not involved in some degree a shining light in the Christian church. In the case which we are now brought to consider, however, there are two of them, not to say three. The affair has various more or less interesting aspects.

The Rev. Mr. Downs is the pastor of a church in a Long Island hamlet, and is, or was, possessed of a handsome and entertaining wife. Foremost among the deacons who attended to the temporal affairs of the church and led the congregation in prayer, was Deacon Michael Terry. Before Pastor and Mrs. Downs set up housekeeping for themselvs they boarded at the house of the deacon, who is a well-to-do farmer. Here sprung up between Mrs. Downs and Mr. Terry an affection for each other that outside of the church would be regarded as undue intimacy. As to the arrangements effected between Pastor Downs and his deacon's wife we are left in the dark, but it is considered an unseasonably cold day when a minister is distanced. Two years ago the pastor and his wife moved away from Deacon Terry's house. The ardor of the deacon arose superior to separation, and, according to Mrs. Downs, he has not since ceased to urge her to fly with him to a southern home, which he promised should be nothing short of an Eden.

A month ago Deacon Terry and Mrs. Downs eloped. They went South. For a time they seem to hav got along all right. Mrs. Downs waited patiently for the southern Eden to open to her, but it came not. Then the maternal instinct asserted itself and she wanted to see the children she had left. Through the instrumentality of a brother deacon, who procured the deserted Mrs. Terry's forgivness for her erring husband, the deacon returned to the bosom of his wife and family, representing himself as the victim of a wicked woman's wiles, and once more basked in the sunshine of home. On a recent evening the villagers assembled, some of them bearing upon their shoulders the deadly and diffusiv shot-gun, and treated him to a tin-pan concert, threatening, if he showed himself, to shoot him on sight. The deacon fled. Some of the aroused congregation are also, according to the latest advices, hunting the peace-making deacon with warlike weapons.

Pastor Downs refuses to be reconciled. Mrs. Downs puts on a bold front, and is gaining the support of the townspeople. In the first place she instances Deacon Terry's promis to giv her a beautiful home in the South. For his failure to do that she regards him as a deceiver. Added to this, she puts forward in her own defense his persistent endeavors, dating far back in the past, to lead her from the path of duty. She pleads also that for the last nine months Pastor Downs has been remiss in his conjugal obligations, and has not done toward her "as a Christian husband should." The precise nature of the offense implied in this charge is left undefined, but it has been so construed as to gain much sympathy for Mrs. Downs.

As the case now stands, Deacon Terry has skipped the town, as the saying is, between two nights, and has declared that he will never again be seen in the hamlet of Northville, which was erstwhile his home. He is regarded as a sly old fox. Mr. Luce, the interfering deacon, has had an interview with Preacher Downs with a view to his reconciliation with his wife, but nothing has been accomplished. As to the Rev. Mr. Downs, it is intimated that he is willing to "condone" his wife's misconduct for a monetary "consideration," but promises no other reciprocal favors.

The pastor and his wife appear to be a mercenary couple. She ran away from motivs having their rise in the hope of gain; he will take her back if Deacon Terry will gratify his desire for the dross of this world. Deacon Terry is probably a bold, bad man, who could be the object of naught but mistaken sympathy. His wife, however, who is the least conspicuous of the parties implicated, deserves to be treated with consideration. Apparently, she is the only victim. The whole affair, while disgraceful, is not altogether novel, but it is significant in so far as it goes to show how wide of the mark in their views are those who imagin that religion has any necessary connection with morality.

How One King Did It.

In the last edge of the Dark Ages, when the church held about all the property of the country, and so much money was sent from England to Rome that the government had none left wherewith to grease its own wheels, Edward I. found it imperativ to tax the churchmen and force them to divide. The priests resisted the order and refused to part with any of their revenues. Under advice of the lawyers, Edward commanded the judges of the realm to try no cases in which a priest was complainant, but to try all cases brought against the church, saying that as the church paid nothing toward the support of the government it should hav no protection from its courts.

This decisiv step brought the church to terms; the only revenge the pope was able to obtain being to denounce the lawyers, who, from their allying themselvs with the kings against the church in their struggles for a division of spoils, soon became known as allies of the devil, or at least guided by his Satanic Majesty.

How would the church of to-day like to hav the several state legislatures borrow a section from the orders of Edward I.?

Sunday Laws.

It was but a few weeks since that we were congratulating the people of this city upon having seen the last of the petty persecutions of the Sunday League. But we were too premature. Scarcely had the last victim forgotten the Sunday League before another crusade was begun, and the police calendars were crowded with cases of Sunday-law violations by small tradesmen who kept their stores open to accommodate the public and make a few dollars for themselvs. The crusade also pretended to extend to the saloons, but this last is a most absurd farce. The law locks the front doors; but the side doors, often not twenty-five feet away, apparently hav their hinges oiled by the League, for in and out of them go the crowd who on week days use the front entrance.

The Sunday Closing League should ask the legislature to change its name to "The Society for the Propagation of Lying, Deception, and Hypocrisy."

Watts and Putnam's Engagements.

Messrs. Watts and Putnam will be at Linesville, Pa., January 26th, 27th, 28th, and 29th; at Altoona, January 30th, 31st, and February 1st; at Pittsburgh, February 8th; at Alliance, Ohio, February 9th, and 10th; at Massilon, 12th and 13th; at Cleveland, February 15th; at Detroit, Mich., February 22d. Liberals residing in the vicinity of these places should get up lectures for unoccupied nights. For details write to Mr. Putnam, care of J. A. Risser, 9 Opera House Building, Toronto, Ont.

THE order of dances at the recent Freethought gathering in Toronto, Can., was something unique in its way. It was certainly original. Printed on heavy plate paper, two and one-half by three feet in dimensions, in handsome type, and with an ornate border running around it, the program is as follows:

BAL DES SECULARISTES ET AMIS.

1. Grand Marche d'Ingersoll.
2. Cercle des Secularistes.
3. Lanciere de Watts et Putnam.
4. Valse de Voltaire.
5. Schottische, Joie des Atheistes.
6. Bombay Lanciere de McDonnell et Pringle.
7. Polka a Pensee Libre.
8. Valse, Joie d'Agnostique.
9. Sir Roger de Remsburg.

PAUSE POUR LE DISCUSSION DU DINE.

21. Rockaway des Femmes Secularistes.
22. Polka, Vive les Scientifiques.
23. Valse Materialistique.
24. Old Dan Tucker—Au Revoir.

We judge that when they set out to hav a good time our Canadian friends do not meet with the experience technically known as getting left.

THE candidature of Miss Mary Page for the postmastership of Walla Walla causes a correspondent of the Walla Walla Weekly Journal to say that the women's vote, which proved so important in making the result of the late election, is entitled to recognition in the appointments, and that not only is Miss Page an exceptionally competent lady, and well qualified by ability and experience for the position to which she is said to aspire, but that her candidacy will meet the approbation of a majority of the voting women in this neighborhood. The ladies of Washington Territory are "looking up" in politics. It is said that the vote to tax the churches came largely from the female voters. If so, thanks, ladies.

Letters from Friends.

HOOD RIVER, OREGON, Dec. 8, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: As we see but very few letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER from this part of the world, we begin to think there are but few Liberals in this part of the country. We hav lived here a little over one year, and hav found very few; there are some Liberal-minded people here, but they don't like to speak out for fear it will hurt their business, or that Mrs. Grundy will point the finger of scorn at them; neither can they be persuaded to take a Liberal paper. So that we are pretty much alone here. We enjoy reading your paper very much, and intend to ride as long as the old ship of liberty continues to swim, and "don't you forget it." We hav two other tickets to ride on the Freethought vessel, and think we shall get there by and by, and would be very glad to hav more company; but if there is none to join the little company, we are going anyway, that is, myself and wife, so fire up the grand old ship. If there are any Liberals in this part of the country, we would be glad to hear from them through the paper.

Friend Macdonald, as I was a subscriber in a small way, I thought I would like to hav a look at the monument as it is in the lithograph. We hav a small town here, but neither God-house nor saloon, but plenty of the old, old superstition that cannot countenance Liberals, but we keep our Liberal papers handy, and hav a chance to throw a hot shot into the old orthordox camp occasionally, which we im prove.

Yours for the truth, SAMUEL CLARK.

OSBORNE, KAN., Dec. 24, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1 to apply on my subscription. Please giv Brother Winter all the room he wants. From his first to his last contribution to your paper, if there has been an article that did not abound in flings at Spiritualism, I hav failed to see it. He seems to feel badly hurt because all his effusions hav failed to find place in your journal. His paper wads which he is constantly firing at us hurt no one, and seem to do him so much good that we would like to gratify the old gentleman. I would also suggest that Mr. Gunther be allowed all the room he wants to giv vent to his feelings. Mr. Chainey was all right and a sound reasoner, and in the front ranks of Materialism, until he "dared to see a truth not recognized in creeds;" but now he must "die the death." We hav become so accustomed to slander and misrepresentation that it does not disturb us. We shall not stop THE TRUTH SEEKER because they say unkind and foolish things, and talk most of that they know the least about. When they shall hav learned more of life, when and where it began if it had a beginning, and where it terminates if it ever ends, when they hav fathomed the hight and depth of all life and all being, and determined when, where, and how intelligence and thought first became associated with unconscious matter, if there was a first, and when and where and how they will become eternally eliminated and alienated from it, if ever, they can form a more intelligent conclusion as to whether "death ends all," or ends anything, or is nature's passway to a higher form of life, co-existent with the eternity of matter.

Thanks to George Babcock for his excellent article on prohibition. As ever, yours, GEO. GAGE.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Dec. 23, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: A long time has passed since I hav communicated anything for your pages. Indeed, I hav found no necessity for so doing, as each week I find it well filled with most interesting matter. But to-day I ask space for an obituary to the memory of one of the most estimable women it was ever my happiness to know—Mrs. Mary D. Bonnell, wife of Henry Bonnell, of Waterloo. Mr. Bonnell has been a long-time subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, was a contributor to the Round-the-World Fund, and has been for these many years one of the leaders in the "Waterloo Yearly Meeting." The many scores of people who hav been most hospitably entertained at the beautiful home of these friends of human progress will mourn with me for the bereaved family. I wrote to Mr. Bonnell after the sad news reached me, telling him if he would send me an account of the death I would prepare an account for the paper. The paper which he sent me is so clear, so tender and truthful, that I feel I could not improve it. You will notice at the head of the obituary the beautiful words sung at the funeral of the late D. M. Bennett. How well I remember every word there spoken and sung. Surely his memory is precious. Please insert the obituary, closing with the lines, as Mr. Bonnell requests.

With the heartiest wishes for the prosperity of all the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I am, Yours, LUCY N. COLMAN.

A BRIEF SKETCH OF THE LIFE AND DEMISE OF MARY D., THE BELOVED WIFE OF HENRY BONNELL, WHO DEPARTED FROM LIFE NOV. 26, 1884.

She was one of the best of womankind, prudent, temperate, and in all things just, pursuing the even tenor of her way with such care that in looking back over life's journey, fifty-five years and two months (the time we had lived together), I do not remember one fault, nor yet a mistake. As a wife, loving, kind, and forgiving, or generous even to a fault; as a mother, in devotion to and care of her children, she had no peer. I think it due to say this much: She was a Liberal in the truest sense, entirely free from superstition and sectarian bias of all kinds. Her health had been poor some of the time for the last two or three years. She was taken very ill the 27th of October last with heart disease, which caused great depression of breath. It was a constant struggle for breath day and night for four weeks and five days, with the exception of a short time on Tuesday and Wednesday of the last week. She manifested great patience through all her suffering, never uttering a murmur. As the disease became more violent again, on Thursday morning she said to me, "Oh, dear, this has all got to be gone through again." This was the most like regret of anything I heard her utter. I think she had not the least hope of recovering from the first moment of the attack. In less than an hour from that time she told me I would hav to get along without her, as she could help me no longer. On Friday morning, at 4:30 o'clock, she quietly passed away, aged 73 years and 2 months. The funeral took place on Sunday A.M., November 30th, and was well attended. Sunderland P. Gardner gave the discourse. He is a Quaker with modern views.

When writing the above I had not thought about a caption, but will now propose this obituary:

A LOVED ONE DEPARTED.

"Cover her over with beautiful flowers,
Deck her with garlands this loved one of ours,
Lying so silent by night and by day,
Sleeping the years of her true worth away."

The sketch I hav given will bear any amount of extension. All the kindly acts of a lifetime may be imagined. After writing what may be appropriate, I would like to close with the following, unless you think of something better:

Sweet may she slumber
While the ages shall roll,
For no visions of horror
Can intrude or control.

But enfolded by nature,
In peace she will dwell;
While with hearts full of sorrow
We bid her farewell.

With many thanks for your kind greeting, I close.

Yours as ever, HENRY BONNELL.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Dec. 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: While reading the article "The Revenue Question Again" in THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dec. 20th, I feel so impressed with a desire to indorse some of J. G. Malcom's reasoning that I leave the article unfinished, and sit down to write.

So plainly has he pictured the just relation in which mankind stands to this planet, that I would not presume to add anything to his arguments.

Speaking of the ownership of land, he says: "Because one man is richer, wiser, stronger, more cunning, or more industrious than another, is no reason why he should receive a larger share of these things, because they do not depend on any quality which he possesses, or upon anything which he has done."

Good. Any person holding a surplus of land or other property while others are suffering and dying within that person's reach, should read a few numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER containing such valuable thoughts as set forth in Brother Malcom's last.

Will Joseph Le Clerc allow me to criticise, with the same sense of humility you speak of, a few of your statements in your article of Dec. 5th?

You don't seem satisfied with Frederic Harrison's explanations. Well, this last paper fits my mind better than anything bearing on religion I ever saw or heard.

You say: "We see apples fall to the ground; but who can picture to our consciousness what gravitation looks like?"

Again: "People who believe in that Energy (Spencer's Eternal), and who hav seen the childishness of giving form to it, can be counted by thousands."

As to gravitation, I fear many people are inclined to look on this and other forces as a literal something, independent and outside of the substances possessing it.

To my mind, gravitation, like all other forces—electricity, magnetism, wind, tide, expansion, contraction, and all—is the condition of substances in relation to each other; or chemical action, or vibration of atoms which is more natural and unavoidable to those atoms than for a duck to swim.

How "childish" it would be to try "to giv form" to such characteristics of matter!

You wish Mr. Harrison would giv a definition of religion. I don't know what he would giv, but a simple one of the Religion of Humanity would be to bind by the ties of Human Sympathy. Gr. religio—to bind.

If you want a better one, I refer you to our worthy editor, who, I believe, dances to the tune of Mr. Harrison's last paper, and I think I am in the same set.

Please send me "The Story Hour" and Remsburg's "False Claims." Find $1.35 inclosed. Am trying to organize an auxiliary here. Yours for enlightenment, W. P. BLYTHE.

HELENA, NEB., Dec. 24, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I wonder where God is to-day, who suffereth not a "sparrow to fall" without his notice. As I sit here in my office, with the mercury outside twenty degrees below zero, burning corn to keep me from freezing (because my patrons could furnish it to me cheaper than they could money or any other kind of fuel), thousands of poor mortals are suffering and starving for the want of the corn I am burning. To-morrow is the day, 'tis said, that the son of God came into the world to bring "joy and glad tidings unto all men." Do those who shiver, shake, and starve this cold day experience much joy, or do they realize any of the glad tidings? It is said that he (Christ) scourged the money changers (and I believe it is the only instance where he used corporal punishment), which shows, at least, that he had some idea that they (the money changers) were about the vilest of the vile. That is, they stood more in the way of all men experiencing that great joy than any other cause, and I believe the facts of history and our own experience will show that the financial and business failures, with all their fearful consequences of suffering, hard times, depression in prices, burning of corn and starvation, are directly traceable to the money changers of the world, and to the men who hav legislated the power into their hands. That greatest of political writers, Thomas Paine, declared that governments should giv to all equal rights. Has ours done this? Again, we hav declared that whenever the government fails to do this it should be overthrown, and a new one founded in its place, and to-day the people would be justified in rising in their might and hurling from place and power the political jobbers and scoundrels (money changers), who hav brought about this state of affairs by taking away from the people their rights. Abraham Lincoln, in his first message to the American People, warned them to beware of "returning despotism," and that by and through the money changers it would come. Who so blind that cannot see it coming? While the money changers and their pliant tools are sending out their editorials about the strikes and strikers, and drawing the people's attention from the real troubles, they, the schooled villains, are making the strikes that are driving the laborer to want and beggary. They strike and get higher interest; they strike and lower prices; they strike and make a shrinkage in the currency. They strike again for higher interest, and down goes the products of labor, business stops. Then some poor devil strikes for ten cents on his wages, and the infernal thieves will shriek and howl through their hired press, "The Commune is coming, and we must hav a stronger government." Oh, for another son of God to strike the last mother's son of the thieving scoundrels into eternity. Yours for justice to all,

W. P. BROOKS, M.D.

LEXINGTON, KY., Dec. 26, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: In his editorial on "machine sermons," Deacon Richard Smith, of the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette, says that "Jesus Christ, if on earth, now would drive a large portion of the ministers out of the pulpit as he whipped the money-changers out of the temple." If the "messiah" is endowed with infinit power, as theologians tells us he is, would he be forced to the necessity to descend from his heavenly throne to accomplish this feat? If machine sermons are a drawback to the diffusion of gospel knowledge, isn't it more than likely the "dear one" ere this would hav "fired" the repeaters? (The gentry known as "repeaters" are Cincinnati sky-steerers, and although Deacon Smith doesn't honor them with this high-sounding title, yet, to judge from his complimentary language, one would naturally suppose he meant it.) I respectfully submit the above nuts to the clergy, but more especially to Deacon Smith. From their standpoint I think it will puzzle their massiv intellects to crack them, but as Liberals and Spiritualists hav taken new grounds upon almost every subject, probably one amongst us can crack them, and only use the smallest tools at that; therefore, if any choose to, let them shoot. DAVID B. COZINE.

SALAMANCA, Dec. 28, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: As I sat reading your worthy and interesting paper Sunday eve, I came across a letter from D. N. Dopp, who says he is sixty-five years old, a cripple from childhood, broken in constitution, unable to earn his living, and he grieves to stop THE TRUTH SEEKER for want of means. This touched a tender spot; my sympathy went out to this poor old man, who must be deprived of this little comforter for want of means. I found I could not quiet my conscience without responding to his call. I never giv for Christ's sake, or to the heathen. Whatever I giv in a good cause I never miss. I hav strength given me to replace it with my own labor.

If you will continue to send this old gentleman THE TRUTH SEEKER for the next six months I will pay for the same. I may strike an oil well, or Mr. Dopp may find a gold mine in the next six months.

Hope is the bright star that keeps the heart from breaking, and in this uncertain world something is liable to turn over with the wheel of time that will help us out of dark plaees. Cast your bread upon the waters, and trust in luck and the fates. MINA SEYMOUR.

DOWAGIAC, MICH., Dec. 27, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER has just come, and on the first opening of it my eyes rested on "Mrs. Tillotson's Protest," and without waiting longer than to read and re-read it, I hasten to join with her, for I, too, hav this very day paid taxes on my little property—almost half was school-tax. When Almighty Man has so far progressed as to deal justly with the woman who bore him, then, and not till then, will he command my respect. Yours for equal justice, ABBIE KNAPP.

CAMDEN, ME., Dec. 29, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Your very able and valuable paper is coming to me yet, and as for discontinuing it, will say the last thing in this life will be to read THE TRUTH SEEKER and pay for it ahead for my representativ.

Am away from home most of the time, and for that reason I allow myself to fall behind with my subscription. Inclosed please find $5, for which set ahead two years and oblige. Whenever you get to want money in so good a cause as publishing the noble TRUTH SEEKER or any of its collaterals, just send on whether I am in arrears or not, and it shall be forthcoming.

When I am again at home and off the road, if I ever am, shall order a goodly number of your wicked works for my library.

I may be in New York some time this season; if so, will giv you a call and shake. F. F. PHILLIPS.

PORT HOPE, ONT., CAN., Dec. 26, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed herewith please find bank-draft for three dollars ($3.00) for a renewal of my subscription for the year 1885 to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I hav been a subscriber to this paper from its infancy—yes, from the first small sheet published in Illinois. I hav witnessed the improvements and enlargements from time to time, until now I hav no hesitation in saying that it is one of the best, if not the best, Freethought papers I hav met with.

WILLIAM SISSON.

STATE OF SUSPENSE, Jan. 1, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: How long is the irrepressible and interminable conflict between the Materialist and Spiritualist Liberals to be continued? The Spiritual forces hav occupied the field nearly forty years, and, whatever progress they may hav made in some sections, it is quite certain that in others they hav sadly fallen off.

Some twenty-six years ago, after what I then believed to be honest and earnest inquiry, I became an ardent Spiritualist. To-day I hav no fixed opinion on the subject. If I accept the doctrin of future existence, I certainly do not nor cannot believe in a future state for the individual, to be continued throughout the boundless ages of eternity.

I do not think Mr. Chainey a man to carry conviction to many of the truth of Spiritual claims and teachings. And I am quite sure that Mrs. Slenker is not the best qualified among Freethinkers to investigate the subject of spiritual intercourse.

B. S.

LOWELL, MASS., Dec. 19, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please stop sending your paper to me. I am really sorry that I feel it my duty to discontinue my subscription. I hav been a subscriber for a few years, for I thought it was doing great good in teaching science and freedom, also killing that monster, superstition, the which I hav tried to do from my early youth up. But I hav come to the conclusion that men like myself cannot be consistent by being in the ranks with Spiritualists and Prohibitionists. The first is a fraud; the slate-writing is a simple trick, which I think I can play as well as anyone. It is not so difficult as many tricks that I can play in broad daylight. You can easily substitute other slates. All good conjurers hav a large pocket in the back part of their pants, the top part about twelve inches across, which should bag out a little loose; also a little higher up, in the small part of the back, we hav one or two leather or thick cardboard shelves, rounded to fit the back, and made secure to the vest, so that by putting the left hand a little to your left side you can with great ease, and without fear of detection, take anything that you wish to show or make use of, even a large bowl of eggs or a glass globe of water with gold and silver fish swimming in it. In like manner you can change the slates—so that while we think we are shedding light and pulling down one myth, many of your subscribers are building up one as bad, or even worse.

Now for the second, the Prohibitionists. They ar e clamoring

For freedom of thought,
" " " press,
" " " speech,
And many other things.

Still these same men and women that say they are Liberals, and demand what they call liberty and justice, are the first to refuse others the same right. I hav read their reasons, which I hav no space to reply to. But what liberty would be left if all fanatics could pass their laws? Some say what we should do on Sunday; the Jew what we should do on Saturday; others what on Friday; others what we should eat in Lent; others how many children we should raise, or how we should dress, and what we should eat. I see that quite a strong party in London at their annual dinner declare that it is a sin to kill or eat any kind of meat or fowl. Some say that no food and drink should be taxed; others are in favor of making all spirituous drinks free, and place the tax on tea and coffee, and so keep the money from going to China, and encourage home industry by giving our farmers a chance to raise barley, hops, rye, and grapes. I think the last-named plan the best, as well as the only true Liberal one. If you prohibit because some hav done wrong or got hurt, then you would hav to stop all the great work of this great nation. I am for fighting the battle with true Liberals; then we will hav true liberty, and never till then.

Dear sir, I feel that these few lines are not all that I ought or should like to say, and it may appear to you to be insufficient cause to discontinue taking your paper, but I am quite discouraged. I hav always given my paper away, sometimes without reading it myself. Many that hav received it say that they like a great deal of its writings, but refuse to subscribe or hav anything to do with Spiritualists or Prohibitionists.

I am, dear sir, Yours respectfully, GEO. GRAY.

MR. MITCHELL TO MR. HILL.

Dear Brother: It is not pleasant to differ with anyone, especially a generous soul like you. But I wish to ask you a question or two. First let me say, with any difference you may hav with E. C. Walker, I hav nothing to say, for my friend Walker is fully able to speak for himself. That the evils of intemperance are fearful to contemplate no one will deny. But, my dear brother, in suppressing any evil by force-law, are we not sustaining that which we, as Liberals, are earnestly trying to abolish? To stop rum-selling by force we must keep in power the most gigantic fraud that ever cursed humanity—always excepting of course its twin fraud, Christianity—a government of brute force. Brother Hill, are not all governments of force in constant and continual warfare against the natural inalienable rights of man? Do you, an intelligent Freethinker, acknowledge the right of any power outside of yourself to dictate or set bounds to your actions in any way or manner whatsoever?

Please let us look into these governments of force, and see what they are doing and their cost.

According to statistics in the North American Review by John Roach, the yearly cost of the army and navy of ten leading nations is over three billions of dollars, and it would take at least seven billions of days' work to pay this vast sum. And that is not near the cost, probably not more than half the full cost of supporting this enormous army of non-producing peace-destroyers. Not only are these governments of force enormously costly, but they are fearfully demoralizing. All this vast cost and demoralization can be saved by a "Peace Commission." Go to the city of Washington, D. C., and see that vast pile of granit called "The War Department," costing countless millions of dollars, and not of the slightest use to any one but a lot of useless loafing scoundrels, too lazy to get an honest living at some productiv labor. Then look at all the forts and arsenals, costing other millions of dollars, and then tell me, Brother Hill, if you are willing to support this huge fraud, all for the pretense of stopping that which it never did stop, viz., crime, or "protecting" the people?

Do you not know that not a villainous deed has been done for five thousand years that has not been done in the name and under the authority of law? Will you and the noble army of Freethinkers submit to be ruled by an arbitrary power called legislators? Governments profess to be the protectors of the people. Protection with a vengeance! Chattel slavery continued in this country for two hundred and fifty years, and in no single instance did the government ever protect a black man in his right to liberty. When the "strikers" peaceably assemble to assert their rights, what are the hired assassins, called soldiers, called out for, to protect the workers or their oppressors? When did a government ever wage a war to protect the rights of the oppressed? Read the history of England for hundreds of years. Has she not almost made her dominions one vast graveyard? Go a little farther and take a look at Russia. And while you are on the way, go to Siberia and ask the starved and frozen men and women what they think of "government." Yes, Russia with its 780,000 of enlisted men; and France with 491,000; and Germany with 420,000; and Spain with 330,000; and Austria with 296,000; Italy 200,000; and Great Britain 192,000; and British India, nativs in British service, 123,862; and our own "government of the people" with 27,996 soldiers; then add to the above frightful list of armed murderers, 207,271 sailors; total armies and navies 2,976,109, with 1,551 ships of war, and you hav a partial or faint picture of what you are supporting to put a stop to crime, and let me ask you, in all kindness, are you stopping it?

Brother Hill, how about the prisons in this country, are they all tenantless? And the police force, are they all discharged? Are there any locks in your large cities? How much does it cost the people for bank-safes to keep out burglars? Brother Hill, how do you progress with your armed force in stopping crime? Your friend, SEWARD MITCHELL.

OAKLAND, CAL., Dec. 19, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find 25 cents for TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 285. Please giv Elmina my kind regards for her contribution to THE TRUTH SEEKER in the way of letters, and also for her investigation of spiritual phenomena. Tell her that her friend Joe Caffray and wife are now in San Francisco, and going through the same tricks here. I attended one of their seances some two weeks ago, with my wife. We think that will do us for some time to come. The performance was precisely the same as the account I sent you—a big fraud, though some said it was genuin; so we do not all see alike. It was rather dark to see very much. I will giv you and your readers a few lines just to show where I stand in reference to this God and spirit business, so here it goes: God is an evil; he is the evil under which earth has always been groaning; he is mystery and terror, gall and wormwood, hell and devil, to the children of men; he is the grand central horror round which all other horrors cling. A good God is a contradiction; any God dwarfs, enslaves, dehumanizes; a man and a God cannot liv in the same universe. There cannot be a universe with a God, for God must be everything, and everything else nothing. God is the annihilation of existence. God is the curse of curses. No God will be the world's millennium. Earth will be heaven when men no longer hav something to call them off from making it so. The golden age will be born when human beings can be themselvs. The reign of peace will commence with the reign of reason. Then will indeed be proclaimed that everlasting gospel, "Peace on earth, good will to man;" when all the dwellers of earth shall lift up their voice together and say with a shout, "God is dead and we are glad of it." And now, as to spirits, God was a spirit and human beings were going to liv on with him and so they had to be spirits with one such great spirit. It was a matter of course to hav ever so many little ones. There is no such great spirit and there are no little ones. They all go together and I say, Goodbye to them all.

Now, Brother Macdonald, I would like to take you by the hand some day as I did our friend D. M. Bennett, but I do not know whether I shall or not, but you hav my blessing resting on you and THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours for truth and mental liberty, A. H. SCHOU.

BISHOP CREEK, COL., Dec. 20, 284.

DEAR FRIENDS: On reading the friendly letters in the TRUTH SEEKER, I often feel a desire to write in reply to some of the remarks there made. But there are germinal ideas that are like seeds, better to be sown or discussed in darkness, away from the public gaze. Some reformatory ideas need testing before being presented for general acceptance, and should first hav the developing power of thought to form the nucleus of the ultimate sought to be evolved.

I would like to correspond with a few thinkers on the problems of a new social order, which has been partially unfolded by a few minds, but needs the combined powers of the best intellects of the age to perfect. The tidal wave of revolution is fast approaching that will sweep away many of the obstructions that hav hindered the upbuilding of the New Republic and a higher and better Social Order. I should be pleased to hav the views of such as hav thought upon this and kindred subjects. Yours fraternally, MRS. LUNA HUTCHINSON.

MILFORD, MASS., Dec. 20, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Hope you will excuse me for appearing before you again with my annual request to continue THE TRUTH SEEKER, for which find cashier's check; also to pay for two new subscribers, whose names and address I inclose. When offenses are repeated, penalties are increased, but you are very lenient for offenses of this kind.

I read Otto Wettstein's splendid article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 13th at a neighbor's. He said, "That's what's the matter." I enjoyed the reading of it again, as well as he did hearing it. Then I read your editorial on evolution to him. He said, "That goes to the bottom of the subject," and came across the room and gave me money to send THE TRUTH SEEKER. Who could read it, or hear it, and not hav their blood circulate better, tending to better health, better thoughts, and, as a result, less superstition, for thoughts are always contraband with that? A friend of mine takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and thinks so much of it that his acquaintances call it his Bible. Why not? It is an improvement on the old one, and, although making no claim to infallibility or immaculate conception, discounts the authorized version in its morals and truthfulness, which is the basis of all morality. It calls on men and women to stop working for imaginary beings, and bend their efforts on the present, knowing that it will be the best preparation for what the future may hav in store. In a letter from C. Fannie Allyn, she says, "Shall be glad to learn when men and women will do as much for their families as for any heavenly inhabitant." That is according to THE TRUTH SEEKER Bible, and if honestly carried out will entitle us to the epitaph of Burns to his friend:

"If there's another world, he livs in bliss,
If there is none, he made the best of this."

CHARLES C. JOHNSON.

LONGSTREET, GA., Dec. 22, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: What if I say, God, so-called, is the source of all life in the universe, the invisible, incomprehensible force, manifesting always and everywhere? Or if I say, eternal, persistent energy is the supreme, absolute intelligence, the invisible force, manifesting throughout the universe "in the whole of things?" Or if, again, I say, all nature is the body of God (so-called), i. e., the outward manifestation and expression of invisible force; supreme, absolute intelligence?

What then? Only this—I cannot conceive of, or attempt a comprehension of, the infinit, except through his manifestations and expressions in "the whole of things," according to Mr. Sunderland. Hence personality is relegated to the realm of the incomprehensible, the unknowable.

Is there any material difference in the above three propositions?

Nature's order is harmonious, uninterrupted, and works by evolution to betterment, to progress. Man, the highest in order of the infinit expression, has a high and noble destiny to work out for himself, for humanity, and also much, too, as in the schemes of development and evolution, in all departments of life, and will be sure whatever is best for this life is and will be best for another—if there is a life continued beyond this physical.

To say that man is not absolutely responsible for the part he plays in life; to say some one else (Jesus, it may be) suffers in our stead "from our sins," that we escape the consequence of wrong-doing, is to say what no one can reasonably and consistently believe. Such an idea cannot be reconciled with human consciousness and human reason, much less with any sensible view of an infinitly wise and just God (so-called).

Every man, every individual, who livs a right life, and does so simply because it is best, is a savior in the true sense of the word.

T. N. MASON.

SOMERVILLE, MASS., Dec. 22, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. O. K. Smith is at Helena, Montana, for the winter, or longer, and I was thinking she might do you and the people much good by introducing THE TRUTH SEEKER among her friends, and was wondering if it would not be well for you to send her not only a new paper each week, but a package of older ones for distribution. We each are as ever a friend to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and though she has retired to private life, yet she must and will do something in the cause of liberty, and I don't know of anything greater (all things considered) than to circulate THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am in Boston this month lecturing twice each Sunday in Horticultural Hall for the Spiritual Temple Society. Thus far my lectures hav been received with great approbation and applause. I lecture in Norwich, Connecticut, the Sundays of January; in Portland, Maine, the Sundays of Febuary; in Boston, at the same hall as now, the Sundays of March; in Springfield, Massachusetts, the Sundays of April. A change of circumstances has disengaged me for the month of May, making it open for engagements. The remainder of the season, up to the first Sunday of October, 1885, is engaged in western New England, and attending camp-meeting. I am this morning at Dr. Dillingham's, Indiana Place, Boston. Mr. Dillingham is one of the wisest men of America; is seventy-eight years old; sixty years of that time hav been lavishly used in the investigation of the unexplored facts which hav been, and still are, coming to the surface of life. His fields of thought and action hav not been confined to any one channel, but he has had the power of sweeping bigotry and superstition from the pathway of the credulous and less wise, till D.D. and M.D. fear his power or his presence to such an extent that they shun his contact in discussion as though they knew it would be death to their business. AMELIA H. COLBY.

GLEN HALL, PA., Dec. 27, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I was very much pleased to see in this week's issue that Washington Territory gave nearly three thousand majority in favor of taxing church property. That is the commencement of the fulfilment of the first Nine Demands. Now for the Second Demand—the dispensing of chaplains. If we cannot make a break on their present positions, I would be in favor of having them installed in houses of ill-fame and all low groggeries. If they hav any good influence, they may show it, for their present position is a tax without a virtue.

This theory of exempting church property from taxation is too great an imposition to be tolerated, if you will only convince people of the aggregate amount exempted; and in order to do so, please approximate the value of church property in the United States, and what the tax would amount to in case that kind of property paid its proportion. Inclose it in black lines, and keep it in your paper. Keep it before the people; let everyone get it by heart, for it is an imposition that few hav any idea of. Yours truly, R. J. LAMBORN.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Fault-Finding Tongue.

You may not be able to shine abroad;
Your talents the world may never applaud;
Nor hearts by your beauty ever be awed,
But then you can make home happy.

You'll hav to be patient and learn well to bear
A great many things, nor seem much to care,
And a cheerful aspect your own brow must wear,
If you wish to make home happy.

Avoid all disputes as you would the worst plague,
And ne'er be ashamed for pardon to beg,
Nor feel as if you had fallen a peg
If only you make home happy.

When you must reprove, you know there's a way
In kindness to speak what you hav to say,
Then pardon the fault without delay
If you will make home happy.

A fault-finding tongue will destroy the peace
Of the happiest household, and only increase
The faults you pick at; then why not cease,
And try to make home happy?

The Sun.

The sun is a good-natured fellow
Who dresses in clothing of gold;
Whose tints are always most mellow,
And never are like to grow old,

In the morning he rises up early,
And looks half over the world;
Liking, I fancy, most dearly,
To see the panorama unfurled.

And ocean, wide sea, and the river,
All aglow with his brilliancy show,
As his life beams shimmer and quiver,
And merrily glisten and glow.

The flowers he loves like a father,
And he kisses them o'er and o'er;
And the trees, it seems to me, rather
Enjoy his kissing the more

That they are stronger and taller
Than the dear little flowers may be,
Whose hearts, though finer and smaller,
Giv fragrance to you and to me.

Shine on, then, O sun, through the season
That sends the snow down to the earth;
In spring-time there'll surely be reason
To welcome again the glad birth.

Of the seconds and minutes and hours,
You'll merrily lead in the dance,
When nature, 'mid sunshine and showers,
Awakes from her long winter trance.

D. R. SHERIDAN,

A Strange Little Girl.

Away up in the northern part of Siam, in Asia (if you will look on your map you will find it between the 15th and 20th degrees of north latitude, and the 118th and 123d degrees of longitude), there dwell a lot of peculiar people. They liv by themselvs in a big, swampy forest, and in the thick foliage of the trees they twine and weave little nests of homes, like the birds.

"And are they real folk?" you ask.

They are just as real as you and those you see around you. They hav a language of their own, though it contains only some three hundred words in all, and those of one syllable. They eat wild rice, roots, fruits, and nuts. They hav fishing-nets made from the bark of trees, so that they sometimes go fishing, though they do not cook their fish, for they do not know anything about fire or its uses.

"What do they do for clothes?"

They are born with their clothes on, like the animals; that is, they hav a nice warm furry coat, with which they are covered from top to toe.

But I started to tell you about one of their number, which was brought to this country two or three years ago.

Kra-o—pronounced Krah-o—is her name, and a very strange little object she is. The country where her people liv is called La-os, and the word means unexplored or unknown.

Kra-o is eight years old, and is a bright, smart little girl. She has learned to read and write, and speaks both English and German, two languages besides her nativ tongue, an accomplishment that not many children possess. Since she has been in our country she has been dressed the same as children are here, and now she would not like to go without clothing, as her people do in the land where she came from. She likes to play with dolls and toys, and is loving and affectionate. She is fond of candy and other sweetmeats, just the same as other little girls.

She is a funny-looking object for a girl, with her great black eyes as bright as buttons, with long, black hair growing all over her head and down her spine, almost like a mane. Her whole face, as well as all the rest of her body, is covered with soft, silky hair.

She is a very happy little girl, and does not wish to go back to her parents. Some one asked her why she did not wish to go back to her mamma, and she answered:

"Because there are no pretty dresses there."

You would like to know if Kra-o ever goes to meeting or to Sunday-school.

I do not think she ever does. Of her own accord, Kra-o would hav no inclination or desire to go, for she has no religious ideas whatever. The race to which she belongs has no religion. If you talk to the people of her country about deity, or immortality, or religious matters, they would not know what you meant. There are no religious ideas in their minds, and they hav not been educated to hav any. They know nothing of worship of God, and hav no fear of any evil spirits, nor can they comprehend anything of them. They are simply natural folk, or people in a state of nature, and Kra-o, one of their number, is living in our land, among civilized beings. Before Mr. Farini, the gentleman who brought her here, was allowed to take her away from her people, the king of Siam required him to adopt her as his own little daughter to insure that she would be treated well.

Kra-o is very bright and interesting to talk with. A little playmate said to her one day:

"Krao, you are a very ugly, hairy creature!"

"Well," said Kra-o, immediately, "if you were in my country, you would be ugly-looking, too; for you are not hairy at all."

Scientific people claim that all the races of the earth hav one common origin, that the different races, of which Kra-o is a representativ of one, are like the branches of a tree, changed by their surroundings, the climate in which they liv, etc. Says a late writer in a medical journal: "Man is the summit of the great tree of animal creation. He does not spring from the lower races (branches), but his origin is common with them (the trunk). Monkeys grew out in the direction of hair and bones; man in the direction of brain. Kra-o is near enough the summit to be considered in the genus homo," that is, she belongs to the species of man.

The world in which we liv is a great book. It invites our study, and the more we learn the more we see of the broad stretches of knowledge of which we are still ignorant.

Kra-o illustrates a page in the book of human species hitherto unknown. She is a living declaration of the ignorance of those who hav thought they knew all there was worth knowing.

EASY CHARADE FOR WEE ONES

Two little twins, with their mother between,
Exactly alike in their features and mien;
Not little Tom Thumbs, as you might suppose,
Though one may be Tommy, they are both of them toes.
Their home is so sweet, like the nest of a dove,
They are known far and near as "the apples of love."

TEUTONIC ADVERTISMENT.

Make room! the greatest show on earth,
E'er this ne'er seen in the land of mirth,
Now comes. The tent is full; I only say
A man is bound to go at once, and pay.
Great cages will be around the ring.
Each schoolma'am, others, too, should bring
Relativs and children on a German call.
You'll see eight beasts so wild—catch all.

ANSWERS TO PUZZLES IN CHILDREN'S CORNER, DEC. 20, 1884.

1. A wheel.
   1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15.
2. QUADRAGENA R I O U S.
3. En-dog-en.
4. Hah-neman-n, founder of the Homeopathic school of medicin.

ANSWER TO "ESPRIT FORT'S" "QUOD HOC SIBI VULT."

What does this mean?
An acrostic, and twelve hidden birds—
A "bird-cage full"—is seen.
And I'll giv you their names in words:
The heron, the eagle, and swan,
The dodo, crow, kingfisher, hawk,
The sparrow, wren, plover, come on;
Dove, piper, will finish the talk—
Unless, by some occult bird-culture,
Our "hoc vult" becomes a "hawk vulture."

Correspondence.

A correspondent writes: "The puzzle column of your Corner is exceptionally fine. I congratulate you on the quality and originality of your puzzles. I see none superior in any paper." This very fine compliment from a teacher and literary friend is flattering, and we are grateful that our puzzlers are thus appreciated. Puzzles constitute one method of education, inasmuch as they awaken, develop, and train the thinking powers, cultivate the memory, and teach the definition and use of words by leading one to consult the dictionary. We consider ourselvs fortunate in having so fine an array of high talent in our Puzzle Box. We thank our puzzlers kindly for their aid in the past, and respectfully solicit their continued help for the coming year.—ED. C. C.

Mrs. Elvira Wheelock writes: "You conduct your department in THE TRUTH SEEKER admirably. Your stories are good, healthy tales for the young, and I hope you will continue in your good work." Such words of commendation inspire us to continue in the good work we feel that we are doing for our children with the aid of many kind friends.—ED.

DIGHTON (via TUSTIN, OSCEOLA CO.), MICH.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write you a letter, as I read the Children's Corner. I like to read THE TRUTH SEEKER, especially the Children's Corner. I got a piece out of the Corner to speak in school, entitled, "This Life Is What We Make It." I think you are doing a good work; it is a good thing for the children. I am thirteen years old, and I never went to school only three weeks in all my life, yet I read in the Fifth Reader. I would like to correspond with the girls that write for the Children's Corner. I was born in this township, and always lived here. I hav two brothers, Willie and Marion. I liv eighty rods from the post-office, and four and a half miles from Tustin. My father is a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I always read that first. I don't know much about writing for a paper, but I thought I would try. If this is printed, I will try again.

Yours in friendship, MARTHA ANNA ROOT.

[Martha writes a nice little letter, and shows that her mind is improved, if she does not go to school. We hope to hear from her again, and advise all who wish to make her acquaintance to write to her address. Of such is the Liberal kingdom.—ED.]

LAWRENCE, KAN., Dec. 27, 1884.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My parents take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hav taken it from the beginning. It is a splendid paper. The Children's Corner is the best of the whole paper. I was born on December twenty-third, the same day the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER was born. We liv near a large windmill. My father owns it. Our house is on a large hill; it is a three-story stone house. Mamma is going to send for a couple of copies of the "Story Hour." My mamma has a picture of Miss Wixon in her album. She would be delighted to see Miss Wixon in person. My mother was a great admirer of Mr. Bennett. She has one picture of him in her album, and one large one on the wall, and a picture of Mr. Bennett's monument. I hope THE TRUTH SEEKER will last many hundred years yet. I am in the sixth grade in school. The tenth grade is the highest in our schools. My teacher is Miss Emma Beckwith. Mamma sends her love to Miss Wixon

Yours truly, BLENDA E. PALM.

[Thanks, Blenda, for your very nice letter, and for your kind wishes. We are glad you are pleased with the Children's Corner, and we feel quite sure you will be delighted with the "Story Hour." It is a good omen that you were born on the same day of the month as the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER (though the day of one's birth, no matter when it comes, should be always considered a good day, and a good omen), and we trust you will liv to be as wise and brave as was he, and as true. We hope you will write again.—ED. C. C.]

LAWRENCE, KAN., Dec. 27, 1884.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I am having a vacation, and a good deal of time to myself, I thought I would write you a letter. I did not get many Christmas presents, because mamma did not want to celebrate the birth of Christ, but expect to get more for New Year's. Among the Christmas presents we had was a silver penholder that came from Europe. I will be eleven the sixteenth of Feburary. I am in the fifth grade, and hav not been tardy or absent since I began to go to school. My brother William is in the junior grade, and has passed every year since he started to school—junior or ninth. I was invited to Enterprise to a Christmas tree, but could not go. It has been snowing here, but to-day it is melting.

Yours truly, ANNETTA C. PALM.

P.S.—Please tell me if there are any mistakes in my letter. Do you think I hav a good future before me? Excuse all mistakes.

A. C. P.

[This is another good letter, and well written, with only a few errors. There is every reason to think there is a good and beautiful future before you, Annetta, and Blenda also. You are blessed with a nice home and kind parents, who endeavor to train you in the correct way. Your dear mamma is without superstition, and if you follow her teaching and example you will become a good and useful woman, without doubt. We shall always be pleased to hear from you, and to know how you are getting on in school. Kind regards and a "happy new year" to your mamma, papa, and all the members of the household, and to all the readers of the Children's Corner as well.—ED. C. C.]

THIRD EDITION.

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR

Parallels in Other Religions

Being a Comparison of the Old and New estament Myths and Miracles with those of heathen nations of Antiquity, Considering also their Origin and Meaning. With numerous illustrations.

The object of the work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning.

"It has long been acknowledged by the most eminent biblical students that the Hebrew scriptures contain a large mythical element; but, so far as we know, the present is the first complete and scholarly atttempt to trace these myths to their source, and ascertain their original signification."—Boston Courier.

"Never before has there been given a volume to the reading world that shows the research for the origin of these myths as does this one just published by J. W. Bouton, of New York."—Boston Times.

"It is unquestionably true that the results of a rationalistic study of the Christian scriptures are nowhere else so accessible as they are now made in the work before us.—N. Y. Sun.

Poetry.

What I Think.

The following thoughts are respectfully dedicated to my esteemed friend, J. L. W.—EL. D. LOUIE.

I think
That nature to mankind the power has given
An inclination to resist, and that
Our acts depend upon the will, which forms
Them great and good, or weak and ill. Each one
Must work from deeds of self-approving conscience,
Outborn of inmost virtue, brave and strong.
For then, perchance, if climb to heaven we must,
We'll be with calm serenity prepared
To bide our time, and take our proper place
On either side of the dividing line.

I think
That which is known by name of piety
Too oft leads men astray, and sure I am
It apes those senseless laws, wherein no power
Could change or alter a decree once made,
So thickly is it crammed with definitions,
All born of old, and loathsome bigotry.
Too long we hav admired the doctrin taught
By knavish priests—which they will teach so long
As interest leads, and the swayed crowds believe—
That some one else beside themselvs must bear
The very sins their own depravity
And selfishness hav set upon their souls;
And till the time when all the world shall learn
That Christianism is but a selfish scheme,
Or vain pretense of outward grace; a name
Made up of pride, wish to control, and rule,
And tyrannize, o'er both the body and soul—
Might will be right.

I think
That Christian grace—so-called—which ever was Begot of form and fear, and so perforce
By stern hereditary law, brought forth
Rapine, sword, fire, and ax, and dungeon drear,
Has had her day, and by degrees, as truth
And light prevail, will yield her tyrant sway.
The drooping head and tottering step of poor
Old Mother Church, the pallid crone, at last
Proclaims aloud to all her near decease.
But he who silences his sacred reason
For fear his faith in Christian grace might waver,
Were he to spread his wings, and soar aloft,
Is like a ship at sea, with rudder, masts,
And compass lost, hard driven by the storm
Against the rocks upon the barren shore.

I think
Hypocrisy—which ever hopes unseen
To be—was, from of old, by ignorance
Retained to act as her sole counselor
And legatee, and by established forms
Of customs hoar and usage long has been
In ages past, and is to-day, and so
Will be for years to come, the leading mode.
And meditating thus, I dare affirm
That, as a rule, the man who prates the most
About divine religion, and the gods,
Is always to be pitied—not abhorred.
It was this vain pretender's sin whose pardon
First of all sins was signed. And yet, in truth,
She'll ever wear, as she has ever worn,
Her tattered livery frock of mean disguise,
Made up of countless ignominious acts.
She can be false, and wise, and vain, and proud,
And therewithal dissemble and command.
Her garb is but the badge of servitude,
Whose wearer is of reason's light devoid;
Yet not like one of gladsome light bereft,
His seeing all forgot, but like one in Whose eyes sweet day had dawned—by Fate
Bereft; who in his blindness feels a joy.

I think
Advice should only on occasions rare
Be tendered to another. It matters not
How kindly it is meant; 'twill surely be
Sore misconstrued. One wastes not only breath,
But counsel, too. Oh, more than treasure golden
The friend who changeth not from former days,
Nor e'er grows strange and cold, as life's dim scroll
Unfolds before us, and by logic clear,
There dawns a new belief—another faith—
And stronger, loosening all the rusty clasps
Which erst had held in place the antique cloak,
The motley wear of theologic creed,
And fills our longing souls with purposes
Of higher life, till they are full and calm,
And true as rhythm sweet of some grand song.

I think,
Of all the ills dispersed by Eve, the first,
By name, Pandora, elsewhere called, and by
The gods intended to crush out, destroy,
The innate goodness of mankind, none more
Contemptible than garrulous Suspicion,
Who never boldly walks in open day,
But, linked in arm with dastard Jealousy,
His brother twin, low skulks with rolling eyes,
Behind a mask all thickly coated o'er
With feeble fancies and fantastic fears,
Reflectiv of his vengeful inner self,
As on imagined wrongs he gluts his greed,
Like crawling worms on clay—cold, moldering, cheeks.

I think
Affection is the rarest plant that blooms
Within the human breast, that every word
Of tender tone, and every gentle touch
Giv more to make our trusts more sure, our aims
More strong, our lives more fruitful, and our ways
More beautiful and good than aught in all
The world beside. Oh, may this boon supreme,
Whatever else be lost, may this be mine;
Mine throughout life, and in death's gurgle, mine.
And through whatever eons I may drift
In the mystic future, mine—forever mine!

I think,
Whether at home, or e'er so foreign far,
Humanity may not itself defraud;
Its claims unaltering, or ever the same,
In holy Mecca, or ancient Hydrabad;
In Yucatan, or isle of Singapore;
In Orkney bleak, or Bembroke ever green;
In Timbuctoo, or some sacred Amretsir,*
In Arkansas, or gleesome Galilee,
Despite ecclesiastic pedantry,
There's neither priest, nor God, nor oath, nor vow,
To superstition blind, a soul from hell
Can save. 'Tis by a true and earnest life,
Replete with loving deeds, and kindly ways;
Instinct with noble, pure, and lofty aims!
Watchful with care of self, that health, and strength,
And length of days, may be for other's good
Conserved. By helping bless the human race
Our souls are saved, regenerate, redeemed,
And not by churchly faiths, and pueril creeds.
No! human hopes hav root in human needs.

PROSE POEMS

And Selections,

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued.

It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author.

The work is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it.

In the more elegant styles of binding, this volume is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

In workmanship the volume is a masterpiece. The type is large and beautiful; the paper heavy and richly tinted; the presswork faultless; and the binding, as perfect as the best materials and skill can produce. The book is quarto in size, and contains 248 pages. No item of expense has been spared to make the work worthy of author and public.

PRICES:

Silk-cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side,	$2 50
Half-calf, mottled edges, elegant library style,	4 50
Full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitely fine,	7 50

DR. R. P. FELLOWS

is a regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful as his practice will prove. He has for twenty years treated exclusively all diseases of the Sexual Organs, in the cures of which he stands preeminent. SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in maturer years, causing night emissions by dreams, loss of sexual power, rendering marriage improper and unhappy, etc., are cured permanently by an outside application in sixty days NO STOMACH MEDICIN USED. It is one of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries, which is entirely unknown to the medical profession. Send five 2-cent stamps for his "Private Counselor," giving full information. Address Dr. R. P. Fellows, Vineland, N. J., and say where you saw this advertisment.

Something for Invalids to read and study over—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

And but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would not submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we hav treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all form of chronic invalidism.

Gems of Thought.

It is in the nature of things that some should be treacherous and false, and that while they claim for themselvs great purity and respectability they should seek to stab you in the dark. Think not strange if sometimes these things occur. Fear not misrepresentation and defamation. Be not dismayed though some should seek to asperse you and call you uncultured and impure, and denounce you as the off-scouring of the earth, even the rag tag and bob tails of society. Such epithets will harm you little, and more those who use them. Verily they shall hav their reward.—D. M. Bennett.

WHO can explain the heart of man, or account for these strange salvos and excuses with which people satisfy themselvs when they follow their inclinations in opposition to their religious duty? This is well understood in the world, and none but fools ever repose less trust in a man because they hear that, for study and philosophy he has entertained some speculativ doubts with regard to theological subjects. And when we hav to do with a man who makes a great profession of religion and devotion, has this any other effect upon several, who pass for prudent, than to put them on their guard, lest they be cheated and deceived by him?—Hume's Essays.

THOU makest darkness, and it is night: wherein all the beasts of the forest do creep forth. The sun ariseth, they gather themselvs together, and lay them down in their dens. Man goeth forth unto his work and to his labor until the evening.—Psalms civ, 20–23.

THE sire of gods and men, with hard decrees,
Forbids our plenty to be bright with ease,
And wills that mortal man, unused to toil,
Should exercise with pains the grading soil;
Himself invented first the shining share,
And whetted human industry by care;
Himself did handicraft and art ordain,
Nor suffered sloth to rust his activ brain.
—Dryden's Virgil.

A RICH man died, and another man, asking the question usually asked concerning a man's estate said, "How much did he leave?" The gentleman replied: "He left everything he had; he did not take a cent with him." So, sooner or later, we hav got to leave everything we hav.—M. J. Savage.

IF Communism be only possible and safe when all men are molded in Christ's image, and permeated by his spirit, and is noxious and fatal to the best interests of humanity under all other conditions—then, if a community of goods be implied in a Christian life, that life indisputably is not practicable now. It is found in actual fact, and has been found in all lands and in all times, that the institution of private property, with all the selfishness it involves, and all the selfishness it fosters, is alone capable of drawing forth, from our imperfect natures, that strenuous and enduring exertion from which all progress springs. And this experience is the one sufficing, and perhaps the only unanswerable, justification of that often assailed and questioned institution.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

GENERALLY, it is to be foreseen that the population of a kingdom (especially if it be not mown down by wars) do not exceed the stock of the kingdom which should maintain them; neither is the population to be reckoned by number, for a smaller number, that spend more and earn less, do wear out an estate sooner than a greater number, that liv lower, and gather more; therefore the multiplying of nobility, and other degrees of quality, in an overproportion to the common people, doth speedily bring a state to necessity; and so doth likewise an overgrown clergy [he that hath ears to hear, let him hear], for they bring nothing to the stock; and, in like manner, when more are bred scholars than preferments can take off.—Bacon's Essays.

ONCE more I say, tell my children it was my counsel that they should be tender and affectionate one to another. For their learning, be liberal. Spare no cost; for by such parsimony all is lost that is saved; but let it be useful knowledge, such as is consistent with truth and godliness, not cherishing a vain conversation or idle mind; but ingenuity mixed with industry is good for the body and the mind too. I commend the useful parts of mathematics, as building houses or ships, measuring, surveying, dialing, navigation; but agriculture is especially in my eye; let my children be husbandmen and housewives; it is industrious, healthy, honest, and of good example.—William Penn's Letter to his Wife.

TIME flies; it is his melancholy task
To bring, and bear away, delusiv hopes,
And reproduce the troubles he destroys;
But while his blindness thus is occupied,
Discerning mortal! do thou serve the will
Of time's eternal master, and that peace
Which the world want, shall be for thee confirmed.
—Wordsworth.

IN no country in the world had women less liberty than in the Holy Land, and no monarch held in less esteem the rights of wives and mothers than Jehovah of the Jews. The position of woman was far better in Egypt than in Palestine. Before the pyramids were built, the sacred songs of Isis were sung by women, and women with pure hands had offered sacrifices to the gods. Before Moses was born, women had sat upon the Egyptian throne. Upon ancient tombs the husband and wife are represented as seated in the same chair. In Persia women were priests, and in some of the oldest civilizations they "were reverenced on earth, and worshiped afterward as goddesses in heaven." At the advent of Christianity, in all pagan countries women officiated at the sacred altars. They guarded the eternal fire. They kept the sacred books. From their lips came the oracles of fate. Under the domination of the Christian church, woman became the merest slave for at least a thousand years. It was claimed that through woman the race had fallen, and that her loving kiss had poisoned all the springs of life. Christian priests asserted that but for her crime the world would hav been an Eden still. The ancient fathers exhausted their eloquence in the denunciation of woman, and repeated again and again the slander of St. Paul. The condition of woman has improved just in proportion that man has lost confidence in the inspiration of the Bible.—R. G. Ingersoll in the Christian Religion.

The political aim of THE TRUTH SEEKER is to enforce the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

In philosophy, THE TRUTH SEEKER advocates the upbuilding of a rational system that shall lead to better lives on the part of the people, and that shall yield to its adherents all the social and emotional enjoyments of the churches, without any mixture of superstition, or the use of rites and ceremonies degrading to manhood and womanhood. This philosophy must be a growth, an evolution from lower forms, and this growth THE TRUTH SEEKER hopefully fosters. It is, therefore, both destructive and constructive.

Among the contributors to THE TRUTH SEEKER are the most eminent men and brilliant writers in the Liberal ranks of the United States, including Courtlandt Palmer, Charles Watts, T. B. Wakeman, S. P. Andrews, T. C. Leland, C. B. Reynolds, S. P. Putnam, J. E. Remsburg, W. S. Bush, Elliott Preston, John Peck, J. L. York, Susan H. Wixon, Helen Gardener, Mrs. Slenker, and many other able men and women. THE TRUTH SEEKER also makes a feature of reprinting the ablest English essayists and philosophers, and during 1884 has given its readers several papers from the pens of Frederic Harrison and Herbert Spencer. The home contributors are legion, and the communications embrace the widest possible range of subjects—religious, philosophic, Anarchistic, Socialistic, land reform, tariff and political reform.

EVERY LIBERAL IN THE COUNTRY WANTS THE TRUTH SEEKER.

DEPARTMENTS:

In the League Department is recorded the news of the National Liberal League, furnished to our columns by the secretary, and other officers of the National and auxiliary Leagues.

We also have an able correspondent in Canada, who furnishes weekly news of the Freethought movement in that dominion.

Our Children's Department is edited by one of the best and most successful writers for children in the United States. Miss Susan H. Wixon is widely known, not only in the Freethought ranks, but as a writer for popular papers and magazines. We have from all sides the strongest testimonials to the efficiency of her work in THE TRUTH SEEKER. She will continue the Department through 1885.

Through the department of "Letters from Friends" hundreds of subscribers have made pleasant acquaintances and lasting friendships. Its two pages are a place for exchange of thoughts, relation of experiences, and whatever the friends of Freethought find occasion to say. This department is a "talk together" of great and varied interest.

TERMS FOR 1885:

Single subscription,	$3 00	One subscription with three new subscribers, in one remittance,	$8 50
One subscription two years, in advance,	5 00	One subscription with four new subscribers, in one remittance,	10 00
Two new subscribers,	5 00	Any number over five at the same rate, invariably with one remittance.
One subscription with one new subscriber, in one remittance,	5 00
One subscription with two new subscribers, in one remittance,	7 00

It is thus seen that any of our friends who will take the trouble to get a new subscriber at the regular rate ($3), will get his own for $2; by getting two new subscribers he will get his own paper for $1; by getting three new subscribers he will not only get his own free, but will have fifty cents left to pay cost of money order; by getting four new subscribers he will have his own free and gain $2.

This makes THE TRUTH SEEKER, with its sixteen large pages, cheaper than any other Liberal paper. If anyone chooses, or if by so doing he can easier secure partners in taking the paper, he can share with them the advantages of the club rates.

Notes and Clippings.

TALMAGE said last Sunday that a religious "awakening" was needed. If he had attended Col. Ingersoll's lecture he would hav seen one.

THE University of Heidelberg declines a gift of $35,000 offered by an unknown benefactor on condition that women be allowed to enter the classes.

IT is said that Gov. Cleveland has recently declined the proffered gift of a demijohn of whisky. This ought to allay the fears of those who suspect Cleveland of being a Catholic

THE French Catholics of Fall River, Mass., are still in revolt against their Hibernian pastor. They can obey an Italian pope, and worship a Jew for a God, but an Irish priest sticks in their crop.

THE Rev. Mr. Burchard was talked of in Congress last week for minister to England. His friends are evidently willing to send him anywhere to get him and his rum, Romanism, and rebellion out of the country.

"I RETURN the inclosed manuscript," wrote the editor of a religious weekly, "simply because I am so full at present." The contributor replied that when the editor's toot was over he would be glad to submit the manuscript again.

A CHICAGO man who stole $6,000 fled to Canada, and was, of course, perfectly safe from arrest. But unluckily for him he swore out loud one day and he was promptly jugged. Those Canadians will not tolerate any immoral practices.

IT is rumored that Parson Newman, unable to withstand the pressure against him, has resigned his charge in the Madison avenue church. The opposition say they do not expect to see him again, and earnestly pray that they never may.

ARTHUR WILLIAMSON, an English evangelist, about to join Moody in Chicago, landed in New York the other day with only twenty-five cents n his pocket, having lost all his money in playing draw-poker in the smoking room of the steamer. A man who cannot play poker better than that will never rise high in the church.

A RELIGIOUS paper states that there is no monument to Calvin in any part of the world, but that the American Presbyterians propose to erect one at Washington. If this is done, says the Wanganui (N. Z.) Review, we would suggest to the American Freethinkers that they should also erect a monument in Washington to the martyr Servetus.

AN Atheistical witness in the Swaim Court-Martial, who declined to take the customary oath, was yesterday excluded from the witness stand. This demonstrates that the army—whatever else may be said of it—is still true to its early pious teachings.—World. It has been noticed before that piety will endure without appearing lonesome when all sense of justice and decency is gone.

"FATHER," asked the young son of Deacon Squibbs; "what is the difference between a man that dyes woolen lambs and a religious editor?" "Well, now, really, my son," beaming benignly on his offspring; "I am not prepared to state. What is the difference?" "Why, pa, one is a lamb dyer and the other a—" "What! what! my son!" "Religious editor," continued the youth, rolling his tongue around in his cheek.

IN Churchill county, Nevada, according to the Virginia Enterprise, there is a queer sand-hill which possesses the power of moving. It is nearly four miles long, about a mile wide, from 100 to 400 feet high, and must obviously contain millions of tons of sand. In it it is impossible to find a particle of sand larger than a pin's head. The hill is not stationary, but rolls slowly eastward, the wind gathering it up on the west end, bearing it along the ridge, and then depositing it again at the east end. This wandering habit is so decided that in the course of several years the hill had moved more than a mile.

DR. MARY WALKER, who occasionally strolls into THE TRUTH SEEKER office, is a somewhat marked character. She attires herself in habiliments similar to those worn by the human male, and, with the addition of a high silk hat, presents the appearance of a well-dressed gentleman. Mrs. Walker is accredited with saying to a Washington interviewer that she would wear trousers or nothing. It is better to let the doctor hav her way.

CHAPLAIN HOUTS, of the Chester penitentiary, is authority for saying that there is only one Infidel among all the criminals there. The parson observes that "it seems very strange that out of 629 convicts only one avowed blank Infidelity." This is certainly a favorable showing for Infidels as against the number of 246 professing the various forms of religion, and it opens up the interesting inquiry as to how far a religious belief operates as a preventiv of crime.—Du Quoin, Ill., Press.

ONE of the many amusing stories in which "Prince" John Van Buren figures as hero turns on a droll feat of his own misquotation. The Prince once accepted an invitation to address a large gathering of Sunday-school children, and in the course of his remarks undertook to entertain them with the story of Jacob and Esau. Midway in the narrativ he was aware that his coat-tails were being vigorously pulled, and half turning his head to find out the trouble, he was met by this exhortation from his friend in the rear: "For goodness' sake, John, cut it short and sit down; you're getting the hair on the wrong man."

JIMMY MULCAHY, the newsboy, was easily induced to attend Sunday-school on a late Sabbath, having in mind the near approach of Christmas. The Bible lesson was the Lord's feeding of the multitude with five loaves and two fishes. His teacher amplified the lesson, explaining its significance after the usual manner. He asked all the scholars in the class their opinion of the greatness of the man who could perform such a feat, but Jimmy was not satisfied with their replies. He squirmed nervously in his seat, and could hardly wait his turn. Finally the teacher said: "And now, Jimmy, how do you explain the Lord's ability to feed a multitude with five loaves and two fishes?" "'Cause dem two fishes was whales, mum," replied Jimmy, triumphantly."

DR. WASHINGTON MATTHEWS has shown that the American Indians, and especially the Navajos, are, in many respects superior in their knowledge of natural history to all white men who hav not made the subject a special study. They are keen observers, not only of the animals and plants which contribute to their sustenance and other needs, but also of those which are unused, rare, and inconspicuous. The Navajos hav a name for every mammal, bird, and reptil in their country, and for nearly every plant and all the larger insects; and their knowledge of the several species is usually minute. They hav made many divisions into groups which are identical with those recognized by the Caucasian naturalist; and this sometimes occurs when it seems incredible that the Indians could hav discovered the characters on which the white naturalist bases his classification.

IN a paper on Madagascar, says the Melbourne Daily News, contributed to the May number of Mission Life, Mr. R. Needham Cust put forth some astounding but apparently well-authenticated statements regarding the countenance openly given to slavery in Madagascar by Christian missionaries. The married nativ students in the Church of England College are in each case provided, we are told, with an upstair room for their slaves, and the domestics of the missionary and the mission are also slaves. It is also alleged that "the stoutest champions of slavery in the island" are the nativ pastors of the Nonconformist churches; that some of those pastors are even slaves themselvs, and hence that a portion of their stipend collected under the influence of prayer in their churches and chapels finds its way to the stores of the slaveowner. The Roman Catholic missionary is stated to go a step further, and to purchase slave boys and girls who are kidnapped from their parents, with a view to forming so-called "orphanages" all over Africa. Mr. Cust records the almost incredible fact that a Quaker missionary having ventured to denounce the practice of slavery in an assembly of the different nativ churches, a vote of censure was passed upon him by the other missionaries.

AMRITA LAL ROY, in condoling with John Swinton over the prospect of John Swinton's Paper suspending publication for lack of support, makes this remark: "In these days of insincerity and hypocrisy, I tell you it is no small consolation—is more than friendly service to many a one—to hav the truth told at least one day in the week; ay, on Sunday, too, when all over the land ministers of a religion of forms (I am a Hindoo and a heathen) are telling fabulous stories and falsifying the facts of the world, while they blow on the fat consciences of their fatter clients with drowsy sermons, mostly stolen." John Swinton's Paper could be engaged in no better work than laying utterances like this before the people, in conjunction with its advocacy of the workingman's cause. Industrial liberty will be of little use to mental slaves. Labor and Liberalism must strike hands in this country, as they are doing in England. The Hindoo, Lal Roy, whose letter contains more important truths than were ever preached from the orthodox pulpit, is the representativ of a people among whom the American workingmen pays his money to send missionaries.

THE New York correspondent of the San Francisco Argonaut winds up his letter to that paper with this anecdote: I made the usual proper-improper visit with a lady to the Hoffman House to see the bar and its insidious "fixin's." The lady hesitated, of course, at first, but I quoted, "When you are in Rome," etc., and marched her into the gilded palace of fashionable vice, and met old Chadwick, who kept Willard's, in Washington, during and after war, and who is chief day-clerk of the Hoffman, I think. Chad. took us all over the Oriental-like caravansary, and, lo! when we reached the new parlors we came across a score or more young ladies, who were holding a fair for the benefit of the Church of the Divine Paternity. My lady breathed freer, and said, "I thought this was Stokes's house?" "Yes." "Isn't he the one that murdered Fisk?" "Yes." "On account of a woman?" "Yes." "And was sent to the penitentiary for his offense?" "Yes." "Well, this is funny, this church fair, in such a place, isn't it?" I thought it was devilish funny, and I said, "Yes," and made some quotations favorable to the church, which I considered the correct thing under the circumstances.

A WRITER in the Thames Star, Auckland, N. Z., chronicling a few of the pranks of his fellow churchmen, laments: "Though I am a member of the 'auld kirk' established by John Knox, I must candidly admit that during the past few months I hav had occasion to blush for not a few of my co-religionists in this colony. First a Dunedin parson writes to an Otago newspaper editor, telling him not to send any more reporters to his church as he only preached 'to those who would be saved.' Then a New Plymouth clergyman 'cuts up rough,' and defies his superiors, and when deprived of his charge locks up the church, and keeps the key, and the church burns down. The next malefactor is a long-robed saint at Christ church, whose screw of £700 per annum has no doubt something to do with the difficulty his reverence found in mortifying the lusts of the flesh. This wolf in lamb's clothing, with a penchant for other men's wives, carried on his nefarious little practices until bowled out, and his scandalous amours hav led to him being clad with the garment yclept the sack. And now there is a 'muss' at our very doors. The Rev. McLeod of the North Shore is a curer of bodies as well as of souls, and it appears that while making pastoral visits he pursued the profession of sawbones, and charged for these visits. Mr. McLeod is charged by his parishioners with looking too closely after the bawbees, and a disgraceful scene took place in the church last Sunday, McLeod attempted to address the meeting, and was accused of being 'a hypocrit' and 'a liar.' I really trust that Presbyterianism is not going mad."

GEN. BUTLER has brought suit for libel against the Boston Herald. The suit is based on an accusation printed in the Herald that Butler, through ignorance and high-handed conduct, wrecked the transport Mississippi on the night of Feb. 26, 1862, by running her upon the Frying Pan Shoals instead of putting in at Hatteras. The general lays the damages at $25,000. He says he does not care for political slanders, but is sensitiv on the subject of his war record.

The Rostrum.

"Which Way?"

A NEW LECTURE BY COL. INGERSOLL.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: The great question now agitating the world, the great question asked by all thoughtful men and thoughtful women, is, "How are we to govern mankind?" "How shall we protect life, liberty, property, and reputation?" In other words, how shall we house, and feed, and clothe, and educate, and civilize mankind? These are the questions, how can this be done? The question is not "How can we save our souls?" but how can we take care of our bodies? The question is not "What will we do in some other world?" We will wait until we get there before we ask that. The business we will now attend to is, how are we to civilize the world? What church should I ask? What oracle can I consult? At what shrine must I bow? What priest can I question? What sacred book can I read, and find out what ought to be done? In the first place, I am met by the theological world. Hav I the right to inquire? They say, "Certainly; it is your duty to inquire." Each church has a recipe for the salvation of this world, but not while you are in this world —afterwards. They treat time as a kind of pier—a kind of dock running out into the great ocean of eternity—and they treat us all as though we were waiting there, sitting on our trunks, for the Gospel ship.

I want to know what to do here. Hav I the right to inquire? Yes. If I hav the right to inquire, then I hav the right to investigate. If I hav the right to investigate, I hav the right to accept. If I hav the right to accept, I hav the right to reject; and what religion hav I the right to reject? That which does not conform with my reason, with my standard of truth, with my standard of common sense. Millions of men hav been endeavoring to govern this world by means of the supernatural. Thousands upon thousands of churches exist, thousands of cathedrals and temples hav been built, millions of men hav been engaged to preach this gospel, and what has been the result in this world? Will one church hav any sympathy with another? Does the religion of one country hav any respect for that of another? Or does not each religion claim to be the only one? And does not the priest of every religion, with infinit impudence, consign the disciples of all others to eternal fire?

Why is it that the churches hav failed to civilize this world? Why is it that the Christian countries are no better than other countries? Why is it that Christian men are no better than other men? Why is it that ministers, as a class, are no better than doctors, or lawyers, or merchants, or mechanics, or locomotiv engineers?—and a locomotiv engineer is a thousand times more useful. Giv me a good engineer and a bad preacher to go through this world with, rather than a bad engineer and a good preacher.

There is another trouble with the supernatural: It has no honesty; it is consumed by egotism; it does not think, it knows; consequently it has no patience with the honest doubter. And how has the church treated the honest doubter? He has been answered by force, by authority, by popes, by cardinals, and bishops, and councils, and, above all, by mobs. In that way the honest doubter has been answered. There is this difference between the minister, the church, the clergy and the men who believe in this world—I might as well answer the question; I may go further than you—the real question is this: Are we to be governed by a supernatural being, or are we to govern ourselvs? That is the question. Is God the source of power, or does all authority spring, in governing, from the consent of the governed? That is the question. In other words, is the universe a monarchy, a despotism, or a democracy? I take the democratic side—not in a political sense. The question is whether this world should be governed by God or by man, and when I say "God," I mean the being that these gentlemen hav created and enthroned upon the ignorance of mankind.

Now, let us admit, for the sake of argument, that the Bible is true. Let us admit, for the sake of argument, that God once governed the world—not that he did, but let us admit it; and I intend to speak of no god but our God, because we all insist that of all the gods, ours is the best, and if he is not good, we need not trouble ourselvs about the others. Let them take care of themselvs.

Now, the first question is, whether this world shall be governed by God or man. Admitting that the being spoken of in the Bible is God, he governed this world once. There is a theocracy at the start. That was the first government of the world. Now, how do you judge of a man? The best test of a man is, how does he use his power? That is the supreme test of manhood. How does he treat those within his control? The greater the man, the grander the man, the more careful he is in the use of his power —the tenderer he is, the nearer just; the greater, the more merciful; the grander, the more charitable. Tell me how a man treats his wife or his children, his poor debtors, his servants, and I will tell you what manner of man he be. That, I say, is the supreme test, and we know to-night how a good and great man treats his inferiors. We know that; and a man endeavoring to raise his fellow-men higher in the scale of civilization, what will that man appeal to? Will he appeal to the lowest or to the highest that is in man? Let us be honest. Will he appeal to prejudice—prejudice, the fortress, the armor, the sword and shield of ignorance? Will he appeal to credulity, the ring in the nose by which priests leads stupidity? Will he appeal to the cowardly man? Will he play upon his fears—fear, the capital stock of imposture, the lever and fulcrum of hypocrisy? Will he appeal to the selfishness and all the slimy serpents that crawl in the den of savagery, or will he appeal to reason, the torch of the mind? Will he appeal to justice? Will he appeal to charity, which is justice in blossom? Will he appeal to liberty and love? These are the questions. What will he do? What did our God do? Let us see. The first thing we know of him is in the Garden of Eden. How did he endeavor to make his children great, and strong, and good, and free? Did he say anything to Adam and Eve about the sacred relation of marriage? Did he say anything to them about loving children? Did he say anything to them about learning anything under heaven? Did he say one word about intellectual liberty? Did he say one word about reason or about justice? Did he make the slightest efforts to improve them? All that he did in the world was to giv them one poor, little, miserable, barren command, "Thou shalt not eat of a certain fruit." That's all that amounted to anything; and when they had sinned, did this great God take them in the arms of his love and endeavor to reform them? No; he simply put upon them a curse. When they were expelled he said to the woman: "I will greatly multiply thy sorrow. In sorrow shalt thou bring forth children. Thy husband shall rule over thee." God made every mother a criminal, and placed a perpetual penalty of pain upon human love. Our God made wives slaves—slaves of their husbands. Our God corrupted the marriage relation, and paralyzed the firesides of this world. That is what our God did. And what did he say to poor Adam? "Cursed be the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life; thorns and thistles shall it bring forth to thee, and thou shalt eat the herb of the field, and in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." Did he say one word calculated to make him a better man? Did he put in the horizon of the future one star of hope? Let us be honest, and see what this God did, and we will judge of him simply by ordinary common sense.

After awhile Cain murdered his brother, and he was detected by this God. And what did this God say to him? Did he say one word of the crime of shedding human blood? Not a word. Did he say one word calculated to excite in the breast of Cain the slightest real sorrow for his deed? Not the slightest. Did he tell him anything about where Abel was? Nothing. Did he endeavor to make him a better man? Not a bit. What had he ever taught him before on that subject? Nothing. And so Cain went out to the other sons and daughters of Adam, according to the Bible, and they multiplied and increased until they covered the earth. God gave them no code of laws. God never built them a schoolhouse. God never sent a teacher. God never said a word to them about a future state. God never held up before their gaze that dazzling reward of heaven; never spoke about the lurid gulfs of hell; kept divine punishment a perfect secret, and, without having given them the slightest opportunity, simply drowned the world! Splendid administration! Cleveland will do better than that. And after the waters had gone away, then he gave them some commandments. I suppose he saw by that time that they needed guidance.

And here are the commandments:

1. You may eat all kinds of birds, beasts, and fishes.

2. You must not eat blood; if you do, I will kill you.

3. Whosoever sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed.

Nothing more. No good advice; not a word about government; not a word about the rights of man, or woman, or children; not a word about any law of nature; not a word about any science—nothing, not even arithmetic.

Nothing. And so he let them go on; and in in a little while they came to the same old state and began building the tower of Babel, and he went there and confounded, as they said, their languages — never said a word to them; never told them how foolish it was to try and reach heaven that way. And the next we find him talking to Abraham, and with Abraham he makes a contract. And how did he do it? "I will bless them that bless thee, and curse them that curse thee." Fine contract for a God! And thereupon he made certain promises to Abraham—promised to giv him the whole world, all the nations round about, and that his seed should be as the sands of the sea. Never kept one of his promises—not one. Yet he made the same promises to Isaac, and broke every one. Then he made them all over to Jacob, and broke every one; made them again to Moses, and broke them all. Never said a word about anybody behaving themselvs—not a word. Finally, these people whom he had taken under his special care became slaves in the land of Egypt. How ashamed God must hav been! Finally he made up his mind to rescue them from that servitude, and he sent Moses and Aaron. He never said a word to Moses or Aaron that Pharaoh was wrong. He never said a word to them about how the women felt when their male children were taken and destroyed. He simply sent Moses before Pharaoh with a cane in his hand, that he could turn into a serpent, and when Pharaoh called in magicians and they did the same, Pharaoh laughed. And then they made frogs, and Pharaoh sent for his magicians and they did the same, and Pharaoh still laughed. And this God had infinit power, but Pharaoh defeated him at every point.

It puts me in mind of the story that a Fenian told when there was great excitement about Ireland: An Irishman was telling about the condition of Ireland. He said: "We hav got in Ireland now over 300,000 soldiers, all equipped. Every man of them has got a musket and ammunition. They are ready to march at a minute's notice." "Then," said the other man, "why don't they march?" "Why," said the man, "the police won't let them." How admirable! Imagin the infinit God endeavoring to liberate the Hebrews, and prevented by a king who would not let the children of Israel go until he had done some little miracles with sticks! Think of it! "But, oh," say Christians, "you must wait a little while if you wish to find the foundation of law."

Christians now assert that from Sinai came to this world all knowledge of right and wrong, and that from its flaming top we received the first ideas of law and justice. Let us look at those Ten Commandments. Which of those Ten Commandments were new, and which of those Ten Commandments were old? "Thou shalt not kill." That was as old as life." Murder has been a crime, also, because men object to being murdered. If you will read the same Bible you will find that Moses, seeing an Israelite and an Egyptian contending together, smote the Egyptian, and hid his body in the sand. After he had committed that crime, Moses fled from the land. Why? Simply because there was a law against murder. That is all. "Honor thy father and thy mother." That is as old as birth. "Thou shalt not commit adultery." That is as old as sex. "Thou shalt not steal." That is as old as work, and as old as property. "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor." That is as old as the earth. Never was there a nation, never was there a tribe on the earth, that did not hav substantially those commandments. What, then, were new? First, "Thou shalt hav no other God." Why? "Because I am a jealous God." Second, "Thou shalt not make any graven image." Third, "Thou shalt not take my name in vain." Fourth, "Thou shalt not work on the Sabbath day." What use were these commandments? None; not the slightest. How much better would it hav been if God from Sinai, instead of the commandments, had said: "Thou shalt not enslave thy fellow man; no human being is entitled to the results of another's labor." Suppose he had said, "Thou shalt not persecute for opinion's sake; thought and speech must be forever free." Suppose he had said, instead of "Thou shalt not work on the Sabbath day," "A man shall hav but one wife; a woman shall hav but one husband; husbands shall love their wives; wives shall love their husbands and their children with all their hearts, and as themselvs," how much better it would hav been for this world.

Long before Moses was born the Egyptians taught one god, but afterwards, I believe, in their weakness, they degenerated into a belief in the trinity. They taught the divine origin of the soul, and taught judgment after death. They taught, as a reward for belief in their doctrin, eternal joy, and as a punishment for non-belief, eternal pain. Egypt, as a matter of fact, was far better governed than Palestine. The laws of Egypt were better than the laws of God. In Egypt woman was equal with man. Long before Moses was born there were queens upon the Egyptian throne. Long before Moses was born they had a written code of laws, and their laws were administered by courts and judges. They had rules of evidence. They understood the philosophy of damages. Long before Moses was born they had asylums for the insane, and hospitals for the sick. Long before God appeared on Sinai there were schools in Egypt, and the highest office next to the throne was opened to the successful scholar. The Egyptian married but one wife. His wife was called the lady of the house. Women were not secluded; and above all, and over all, the people of Egypt were not divided into castes, and were infinitly better governed than God ever thought of. I am speaking of the God of this Bible. If Moses had remembered more of what he saw in Egypt, his government would hav been far better than it was. Long before these commandments were given, Zoroaster taught the Hindoos that there was one infinit and supreme God. They had a code of laws, and their laws were administered by judges in their courts. By those laws, at the death of a father, the unmarried daughter received twice as much of his property as his son. Compare those laws with the laws of Moses.

So, too, the Romans had their code of laws. The Romans were the greatest lawyers the world produced. The Romans had a code of civil laws, and that code to-day is the foundation of all law in the civilized world. The Romans built temples to truth, to faith, to valor, to concord, to modesty, to charity, and to chastity. And so with the Grecians. And yet you will find Christian ministers of to-day contending that all ideas of law, of justice, and of right came from Sinai, from the Ten Commandments, from the Mosaic laws. No lawyer who understands his profession will claim that it is so. No lawyer who has studied the history of law will claim it. No man who knows history itself will claim it. No man will claim it but an ignorant zealot.

Let us go another step. Let us compare the ideas of this God with the ideas of uninspired men. I am making this preface because I want to get it out of your minds that the Bible is inspired.

Now let us go along a little and see what is God's opinion of liberty. Nothing is of more value in this world to-day than liberty—liberty of body and liberty of mind. Without liberty the universe would be as a dungeon into which human beings are flung like poor and miserable convicts. Intellectual liberty is the air of the soul, the sunshine of the mind. Without it we should be in darkness. Now, Jehovah commanded the Jewish people to take captivs the strangers and adjourners amonst them, and ordered that they and their children should be bondmen and bondwomen forever.

Now let us compare Jehovah to Epictetus, a man to whom no revelation was ever made, a man to whom this God did not appear. Let us listen to him: "Remember your servants are to be treated as your own brothers—children of the same God." On the subject of liberty is not Epictetus a better authority than Jehovah, who told the Jews to make bondmen and bondwomen of the heathen round about? And he said they were to make them their bondmen and bondwomen forever. Why? Because they were heathens; why? because they were not children of the Jews. He was the God of the Jews, and not the rest of mankind. So he said to his chosen people: "Pillage upon the enemy and destroy the people of other gods. Buy the heathen round about." Yet Cicero, a poor pagan lawyer, said this—and he had not even read the Old Testament—had not even had the advantage of being enlightened by the prophets: "They also say that we should love our fellow-citizens, and not foreigners; destroy the universal brotherhood of mankind, and with it benevolence and justice would perish forever." Is not Cicero greater than Jehovah? The Bible, inspired by Jehovah, says: "If a man smite his servant with a rod and he die under his hand, he shall be punished. If he continue a day or two and then die he shall not be punished." Zeno, the founder of the Stoics, who had never heard of Jehovah, and never read a word of Moses, said this: "No man can be the owner of another, and the title is bad, whether the slave became a slave by conquest or by purchase; the title is bad." Let us come and see whether Jehovah has any humanity in him. Jehovah ordered the Jewish general to make war, and this was the order: "And when the Lord thy God shall deliver them before thee, thou shalt smite them and utterly destroy them, thou shall make no covenant with them, nor show mercy unto them." And yet Epictetus, whom I hav already quoted, said: "Treat those in thy power as thou would'st hav thy superiors treat thee."

I am on the side of the pagan. Is it possible that a being of infinit goodness said: "I will heap mischief upon them; I will send my arrows upon them. They shall be burnt with hunger; they shall be devoured with burning heat and with bitter destruction. I will also send the teeth of beasts upon them, with the poisonous serpent of the desert. The sound without and the terror within shall destroy both the young men and the virgins, the suckling, also, and the men with gray hairs?" While Seneca, a poor, uninspired Roman, said: "A wise man will not pardon any crime that ought to be punished, but will accomplish in another way all that is sought. He will spare some; he will pardon and watch over some because of their youth; he will pardon these on account of their ignorance. His clemency will not fail what is sought by justice, but this clemency will fulfil justice." That was said by Seneca. Can we believe that this Jehovah said: "Let his children be fatherless and his wife a widow. Let his children be continually vagabonds and beg. Let them seek their bread out of the desolate places. Let the extortioner catch all that he hath, and let the stranger spoil his labor. Let not one extend mercy unto them, neither let any favor his fatherless children?" Did Jehovah say this? Surely, he had never heard this line—this plaintiv music from the Hindoo: "Sweet is the lute to those who hav not heard the voices of their own children." Let us see the generosity of Jehovah. Out of the cloud of darkness on Mt. Sinai, he said to the Jews: "Thou shalt hav no other God before me. Thou shalt not bow down to any other gods, for the Lord thy God is a jealous God, visiting the iniquities of the fathers upon the children to the third and fourth generation of them that hate me." Just think of God saying to people: "If you do not love me, I will damn you." Contrast this with the words put by the Hindoo poet into the mouth of Brahma: "I am the same to all mankind. They who honestly worship other gods involuntarily worship me. I am he that partaketh of all worship. I am to reward worship." How perfectly sublime! Let me read it to you again: "I am the same to all mankind. They who honestly worship other gods involuntarily worship me. I am he that partaketh of all worship. I am the reward of worship." Compare these passages. The first is a dungeon which crude hands hav digged covered with jealous slime. The other is like the dome of the firmament inlaid with constellations. Is it possible God ever said: "If a prophet deceive when he hath spoken a thing, I the Lord hav deceived that prophet." Compare that passage with the poet, a pagan: "Better remain silent the remainder of life than speak falsely." Can we believe a being of infinit mercy gave this command: "Put every man his sword by his side; go from the gate throughout the camp and slay every man his brother, every man his companion, and every man his neighbor. Consecrate yourselvs this day. Let every man lay his sword even upon his son, upon his brother, that he bestow blessing upon me this day?" Surely that was not the outcome of a great, magnanimous spirit like that of the Roman emperor who declared: "I had rather keep a single Roman citizen alive than slay a thousand enemies." Compare the last command given to the children of Israel with the words of Marcus Aurelius: "I hav formed an ideal of the state in which there is the same law for all, and equal rights and equal liberty of speech established for all—an empire where nothing is honored so much as the freedom of the citizens." I am on the side of the Roman emperor.

The speaker here quoted some other similar passage and said, Is there anything more beautiful than the old story from Sufi? There was a man who for seven years did every act of good, every kind of charity, and at the end of the seven years he mounted the steps to the gate of heaven and knocked. A voice cried, "Who is there?" He cried, "Thy servant, O Lord," and the gate was shut. Seven other years he did every other good work, and again mounted the three steps to heaven and knocked. The voice cried, "Who is there?" He answered, "Thy slave, O God," and the gates were shut. Seven other years he did every good deed, and again mounted the steps to heaven and the voice said: "Who is there?" He replied, "Thyself, O God," and the gates wide open flew. Is there anything in our religion so warm or so beautiful as that? Compare that story from a pagan with the Presbyterian religion.

Take this story of Endesthora, who was a king of Egypt, and started for the place where the horizon touched the earth, where he was to meet God. With him followed Argune and Bemis and Traubation. They were taught that when any man started after God in that way, if he hsd been guilty of any crime he would fall by the way. Endesthora walked at the head, and suddenly he missed Argune. He said he was not always merciful in the hour of victory. A little while after he missed Bemis, and said, "He fought not so much for the rights of men as for his own glory." A little further on he missed Traubation. He said, "My god, I know no reason for his failing to reach the place where the horizon touches the earth." And the god Ram appeared to him, and opening the curtains of the sky said to him, "Enter." And Endesthora said: "But where are my brethren? Where is Argune, and Bemis, and Traubation?" And the god said, "They sinned in their time, and they are condemned to suffer below." Then said Endesthora: "I do not wish to enter into your heaven without my friends. If they are below, then I will join them." But the god said: "They are here before you. I simply said this to try your soul." Endesthora then turned and said, "But what of my dog?" The god said: "Thou knowest that if the shadow of a dog fall upon the sacrifice it is unclean. How, then, can a dog enter heaven?" And Endesthora replies: "I know that, and I know another thing, that ingratitude is the blackest of crimes, whether it be to man or beast. That dog has been my faithful friend. He has followed me, and I will not desert even him." And the god said, "Let the dog follow." Compare that with the Bible stories.

Long before the advent of Christ, Aristotle said, "We should conduct ourselvs toward others as we would hav them conduct themselvs toward us." Seneca said, "Do not to your neighbor what you would not hav your neighbor do to you." Socrates said: "Act toward others as you would hav others act toward you. Forgiv your enemies, render good for evil, and kiss even the hand that is upraised to smite." Krishna said: "Cease to do evil; aim to do well; love your enemies. It is the law of love that virtue is the only thing that has strength." Poor, miserable pagans! Did you ever hear anything like this? Is it possible that one of the authors of this New Testament was inspired when he said that man was not created for woman, but woman for man? Epictetus said, "What is more delightful than to be so dear to your wife as to be on her account dearer even to yourself?" Compare that with St. Paul: "But I would hav you know that the head of every man is Christ, and the head of the woman is the man, and the head of Christ is God. Wives, submit yourselvs unto your husbands as unto the Lord." That was inspiration. This was written by a poor, despised heathen: "In whatever house the husband is contented with the wife and the wife with the husband, in that house will fortune dwell. In the house where the woman is not honored, let the curse be pronounced. Where the wife is honored, there God is truly worshiped." I wish Jehovah had said something like that from Sinai. Is there anything as beautiful as this in the New Testament? "Shall I tell you where nature is most blest and fair? It is where those we love abide. Though the space be small, it is ample as earth; though it be a desert, through it run the rivers of paradise." Compare these things with the curses pronounced in the Old Testament, where you read of the heathen being given over to butchery and death, and the women and babes to destruction, and after you hav read them, read the chapters of horror in the New Testament threatening eternal fire and flame, and then read this, the greatest thought uttered by the greatest of human beings:

"The quality of mercy is not strained;
It droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven,
Upon the place beneath. It is twice blessed;
It blesseth him that givs and him that takes;
'Tis mightiest in the mightiest. It becomes
The throned monarch better than his crown."

Compare that with your doctrin of the New Testament! If Jehovah was an infinit God and knew things from the beginning, he knew that his Bible would be a breastwork behind which tyranny and hypocrisy would crouch, and knew his Bible would be the auction-block on which the mother would stand while her babe was sold from her, because he knew his Bible would be quoted by tyrants; that it would be quoted in defense of robbers called kings, and by hypocrits called priests. He knew he had taught the Jewish people; he knew that he had found them free and left them slaves; he knew that he had broken every single promis made to them; he knew that while other nations advanced in knowledge, in art, in science, his chosen people were subjects still. He promised them the world; he gave them a desert. He promised them liberty, and made them slaves. He promised them power; he gave them exile—and anyone who reads the Old Testament is compelled to say that nothing could add to their misery. Let us be honest. How do you account for this religion? This world, where did it come from? You hear every minister say man is a religious animal; that religion is natural. While man is an ignorant animal man will be a theological animal, and no longer. Where did we get this religion? The savage knew but little of nature, but thought that everything happened in reference to him. He thought his sins caused earthquakes, and that his virtues made the sun shine.

Nothing is so egotistic as ignorance. You know, and so do I, that if no human being existed the sun would shine, and that tempests would now and then devastate the earth; violets would spread their velvety bosoms to the sun, daisies would grow, roses would fill the air with perfume, and now and then volcanoes would illuminate the horizon with their lurid glare; the grass would grow, the waters would run, and so far as nature is concerned, everything would be as joyous as though the earth were filled with happy homes. We know the barbarian savage thinks that all this was on his account. He thinks that there dwelt two very powerful deties; that there was a good one, because he knows good things happen to him, and that there was a bad one, because he knows bad things happen to him. Behind the evil influence he puts a devil, and behind the good an intention or a god, and then he imagins both these beings are in opposition, and that, between them, they struggle for the possession of his ignorant soul. He also thinks that the place where the good deity livs is heaven, and that the place where the other deity keeps himself is a place of torture and punishment. And about that time other barbarians hav chosen to keep the ignorant ones in subjection by means of the doctrin of fear and punishment.

There is no reforming power in fear. You can scare a man, may be, so bad that he won't do a thing; but you can't scare him so bad he won't want to do it. There is no reforming power in punishment or brute force, but our barbarian fathers imagined that every being would punish in accordance with his power and his dignity, and that God would subject them to torture in the same way as those who made him angry. They knew the king would inflict torments upon one in his power, and they supposed that God would inflict torture ac-

The Liberal Club.

Probably a man might liv a century and not see a finer day in January than Friday, the 9th, and as its evening fulfilled the promis of its noon, a number of persons sufficient to fill the hall came out to attend the 361st regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club. It was a brilliant assemblage that had gathered there, and the chairman's countenance glowed with a look of cheerful satisfaction as he arose to survey it. While the glow still lingered, this writer entered the hall and secured a seat beside the Rev. Mr. Samson, of Brooklyn, who occasionally attends. Mr. Wakeman called the earnest attention of all present to THE TRUTH SEEKER, containing the report of the Canadian Convention. He also held up to their admiring gaze a copy of the "Story Hour," and paid a handsome compliment to the book and to Miss Wixon, the author. Then he took the pleasure and honor of introducing the lecturer of the evening, Mr. Justus O. Woods, a prominent officer of a large sewing-machine company, who was to speak upon the question, "Is Our Civilization Just to the Workingman?"

Mr. Woods is in appearance a typical capitalist or solid man. He had just broke ground in his lecture when John Swinton was seen passing up the room, which was a signal for an outburst of applause. This is the first time Mr. Swinton has visited the club within the recollection of this writer. Mr. Woods then proceeded with his remarks. He said that in a civilization where hundreds of thousands of adult persons are unable to read or write, where art and science languish, where religion holds its place only by allying itself with mammon, and where men, willing and anxious to work, cannot earn the means to keep the wolf from the door, it seems almost a sarcasm to ask if our civilization is just to the workingman. The speaker held that in so far as civilization was not just to every inhabitant of earth, it was not civilization. At first might had ruled the earth, and the weakest peoples were destroyed by the more powerful or became their slaves. Then finally dawned in the mind of man a sentiment of right, and that was the beginning of civilization. This sentiment of right had been the basis of all revolutions and the mainspring of progress. Mr. Woods advocated some system of co-operation—either that of M. Godin, of France, or of the Rochdale stores in England. It was apathy, not anarchy, that boded most evil. Wage slavery had all the evils of chattel slavery, and none of its virtues. When wage slavery was abolished, crises, strikes, lock-outs, stagnation, and bankruptcy would be no more, and we should wonder how capital tyrannized so blindly and so long. Mr. Woods's speech was received with generous applause.

At the suggestion of Mr. Palmer, John Swinton was invited to speak, and took the platform. Mr. Swinton is a man of striking appearance, somewhere in the vicinity of fifty-five years of age. He is robust and florid, with a spherical head surmounted by scanty gray hairs. His rather diffident and distrait behavior would impress a stranger with the idea that this was his first appearance upon the public rostrum, instead of perhaps the thousandth. After edging along the stage to the table and pouring out a glass of water which he did not taste, Mr. Swinton began his remarks in a hoarse and strident voice that would become a prophet predicting the downfall and desolation of the world. His words are well-chosen, his periods brief, and his utterances sententious. He is probably one of the most impressiv of living orators. A person who does not know what it is to be electrified and warned to flee from the wrath to come has never listened to Mr. John Swinton. "It was once observed by Mr. Bismarck," said he, "that when he played chess, he played with the pieces on the board." There is wisdom, he continued, in that remark. And so in dealing with the hordes of labor, we must use the representativs that are now upon earth, and employ the means that are within our grasp. Co-operation was not fitted for all, and we must look to government for redress. The power that ruled capital and regulated rates of interest must rule labor and regulate wages. Mr. Swinton alluded to the Reagan bill, governing rates of freight and passenger transportation, which has just passed the House of Representativs at Washington, as a measure of terrific importance. He referred to the Senate as a House of Millionaires. Out of twenty-one candidates for the Senate in the different states, seven belonged to the millionaire class. He believed as good a system as the present one would be one which should hav a property qualification for the United States Senate, and then change its name to the House of Millionaires, after the fashion of the English House of Lords.

Dr. Eccles, of Brooklyn, followed in an address of twenty minutes' length, in which he reviewed the address of Mr. Woods in a rather harsh manner, characterizing the major portion of it as "simply nonsense." He believed our present civilization was an immense institution compared with that which existed when there were no men and women on earth. He believed in competition, because under that system the laboring man has wages and freedom of movement. In communal life he had neither. Workingmen did themselvs wrong by uniting in trades union, because they thereby offended their best friend, which was capital. An auditor suggested that Dr. Eccles was joking, but he asseverated with much earnestness that it was no joke. He was several times interrupted by some ill-behaved people in the hall who are always ripe for a disturbance, and who should be gathered by a policeman. Dr. Eccles, who is a religious person, concluded that we must hav a "change of heart."

Madam Delescluze set about replying to Dr. Eccles. This she effected in a manner which the audience deemed quite adequate.

Mr. Courtlandt Palmer, in one of his best speeches (and he never makes any but good ones), struck the nail on the head, drove it home, and clinched it. He said that there would be no equality in this world while people believed that part of mankind were destined to be exalted above the rest in the next world. Mental and industrial liberty must come together, and there would be no republic of man while we continued to look forward to a kingdom of heaven. Reform must be begun and worked out on the basis of the Nine Demands of the National Liberal League. Mr. Palmer's remarks were especially well received.

Mr. Huhn expressed his sympathy with Dr. Eccles for the way Madam Delescluze had used him up. He thought it scarcely fair for an able-bodied woman like her to jump on such a small man as Dr. Eccles in that way. The workingmen's hope was from the government.

Mr. King had no faith in co-operation because it started in at the place where it designed to end, and assumed the existence of the very virtues which are its object to bring about. Trades unions were the natural and democratic association of workingmen, and workingmen must begin with them.

Mr. Woods closed by saying that all who had criticised him had been well answered by those who agreed with him. Trades unions had their uses as primary schools. The competitiv system was the system that led to results like the French Revolution. He thanked the audience for their kind attention, and said it had been to him a most delightful evening.

Friday, the 16th, Mrs. Brigham will speak, it is announced, under spirit control, her subject to be provided by the chairman upon her taking the floor. For everything desirable both as to instruction and amusement there is no place in New York like the Liberal Club.

Excitement at Montezuma, N. Y.

Mr. Edward Ross, the enterprising merchant and supervisor of the town, ever zealous for the improvement of the village and the advancement of the best interests of the people, engaged the services of Mr. J. E. Remsburg to deliver his two great lectures, "Bible Morals" and "False Claims." With a population of about 400, there are four churches. It is not to be wondered at that Mr. Ross should be earnestly desirous of helping to release his fellow-townsmen from the dominion of priesthood and rescue them from the deep quagmire of superstition.

But Mr. Ross has become fully convinced that while science has made wonderful advances, Christianity has remained stationary, holding fast to its spirit of bigotry and bitter opposition to all intellectual culture. The announcement of the lectures of "Remsburg, the Liberal," aroused the most fierce and bitter opposition. Not alone extra-double power, long, loud series of prayers, but, still louder, fierce denunciations and savage threats were made.

Undismayed, yet with prudential wisdom, determined not to be thwarted in his philanthropic purpose to enlighten and help the people, Mr. Ross determined to fortify against the enemy on every side, and telegraphed to the chairman of the Executiv Committee of the National Liberal League to come to his aid. He secured the use of the Rechabite Hall, and, lest influence should be brought to close the hall, made sure of use of the school-house, and, as a dernier resort, prepared rooms over his store; so that by no possibility should the enemy prevent the lecture being delivered. (How he did wish he could hav a 60x90 tent pitched right in the center of the village!)

Parsons, deacons, exhorters, members, waited on him and urged him to abandon his purpose. He was assured his bringing a Liberal lecturer to the village would result in the destruction of his business—none of the Christians would trade with him. (He suggested if they first paid what they owed him it would be to his advantage.) They threatened him with loss of popularity, the death of all political influence, and all this resulted only in his more thoroughly advertising the lectures. Some asserted he must be crazy. If this is so, we hope he will make a tour of the states and bite a goodly number of our Liberal friends, that they be inoculated with the same self-sacrificing zeal.

Despite reports that Remsburg, in answer to the agonized prayer of the saints, had been converted to Christ on the way here, at 9:30 A.M. on Thursday morning, Mr. Ross and his able and faithful coadjutor, Mr. Charles Travers, drove through the village with Mr. John E. Remsburg and the Ex.-Rev. C. B. Reynolds. The excitement was intense, and was raised to fever heat by the arrival of the itinerant preacher, the Rev. Daniel Hull, who issued proclamations that he had come to meet the terrible serpent and defend the "blessed old book."

The stores were crowded. The lecture was the one theme of all-absorbing interest. The mighty ones of Israel rushed from house to house, threatening, cajoling, entreating all to stay away. But it resulted in the men flocking to the stores, and the women crowding to the windows to gaze upon those wonderful Infidels, Messrs. Remsburg and Reynolds. There was much wonder expressed at their appearance. Outwardly they seemed to be genial, courteous gentlemen. But it was whispered Reynolds had concealed his hideous horns under his plug hat, and that Remsburg's scales and forked caudal appendage were concealed beneath his graceful-fitting overcoat.

An alarm of fire about sundown changed the current of excitement, and possibly saved an exhibition of Christian love. The devout shouted, "Hallelujah! the Lord has sent fire to destroy the wicked Infidels." But the fire, like the Lord's help, fizzled out—amounted to nothing.

At 7:30 the hall was crowded despite the frantic efforts of the Christian authorities to enforce the stay-away argument. Mr. De Witt Griswold, the fearless champion of Freethought from Auburn, occupied a seat on the rostrum alongside of the indomitable Ex-Rev. Reynolds.

Mr. Ross presided, and Mr. Remsburg delivered his grand analytical lecture entitled "Bible Morals." Over one hundred and fifty persons, of all shades of opinion, listened with wrapt attention to every word uttered. At the close of the lecture, Mr. Ross announced the platform was free for the use of any minister who wished to attempt to answer, or make rebuttal of the grievous charges proved from the Bible itself, that the Bible was not an infallible moral guide. Then rushed upon the rostrum the great Knoxite Daniel—truly a Daniel come to judgment. He said he was Daniel Hull (and a very piratical old hull he looked). He turned with fierce savagery on the gentle Remsburg and imperiously demanded Remsburg should look him in the eyes. "Face me, sir; keep your eyes on mine." Now, as the erratic Daniel Hull kept one eye closed, this discomforted poor Remsburg worse than the most subtle sophism, or clever argument could possibly hav done. His tender gentleness of heart forbade his alluding to what seemed a deformity, and yet how to look into a man's eyes when he only seemed to hav one, was to much for Remsburg. He gasped, then rallied, and mildly suggested he would let Mr. Hull hav use of his ears. This set the froth foaming from the lips of our Christian Daniel, whose ears being of more than ordinary mule proportions, he regarded Remsburg's offer as a personal reflection.

Mr. Reynolds, as in duty bound, came to the rescue, and suggested that Mr. Remsburg take a seat in the auditorium so as to face his opponent. Thus peace was restored, for after this the great Daniel failed to even keep one eye on Mr. Remsburg.

Hull declared all the texts that Mr. Remsburg had quoted (about one hundred) "were of no consequence—none whatever;" that Mr. Remsburg had more faith than he, for instead of admitting there were many good things in the Bible, if he believed there was one contradiction in it, he would toss it into the fire. It was no wonder such impious, foolish persons as Remsburg, who had no more morality than the devil, could not understand the Bible. It was not given to all to understand. It could only be discovered by aid of spirit. (He failed to name the brand he used, but he certainly takes oil of vitriol in his.) In regard to Adam, God made him very good. Make a tree good, and all the fruit must be good. He then exhibited a little toy snake, and explained all about how the devil tempted Eve, showing a most intimate acquaintance with all the hopes, fears, and wishes of his satanic majesty.

Mr. Reynolds asked how it could be, if Adam was made very good, and if a good tree could only bring forth good fruit, that Adam could sin so dreadfully. Daniel was wroth, and declared Reynolds was morally dead, and of course could not see clearly the plan of the fall, or the beauty of Bible morality. And Mr. Reynolds quietly admitted that was true. The Rev. Hull then steered wild, and got far away from the subject. It was vain for the chair to call him to order or request him to speak to the subject. He had talked over an hour. Mr. Remsburg had only spoken forty-five minutes. Yet Daniel declared he could annihilate Ingersoll, Beecher, Lambert, Reynolds, the Baptist ministers of Syracuse, and Remsburg, too, if we only gave him time.

Mr. Remsburg quietly called attention to the harsh domineering spirit evinced, despite all the courtesy and favor shown the reverend gentlemen, and lamented, but was not surprised, that belief of the Bible had made the Rev. Daniel Hull what he was. Mr. Hull insisted he could prove Liberalism all wrong, if we would giv him a chance, and asked for opportunity to discuss the atonement on to-morrow afternoon at three o'clock. This was agreed to, and Mr. Reynolds chosen to debate the subject.

Afternoon, Friday.—The excitement is boiling. The advent of Remsburg and Reynolds has done what never before could be done. All the four denominations, so bitter in their hate of each other heretofore, hav become dearest friends. Catholics, Baptists, Methodists, and Free Methodists are all united, all excited, and vie with each other in bitter invectiv on these Liberals and encomiums on each other. It threatens rain—this may cool the hot zeal and frantic hate and wild excitement. Nothing even in the wildest political times ever compared with the present. Will they attack the hall, or commit violence on Remsburg and Reynolds? Close to catch the mail. Will telegraph if anything serious occurs.

News and Notes from the Field.

On Sunday, January 4th, afternoon and evening, Charles Watts lectured to full houses at Hamilton, Ont. Mrs. Watts was with him and gave recitations, and met with a splendid reception. There was some discussion, but Christians begin to fight shy of Mr. Watts's keen blade. From Hamilton Mr. Watts went on to Welland, Dunnville, and Thorold and gave a series of lectures. On Sunday, January 11th, he lectured again in Toronto.

On the 4th I lectured myself in Toronto. The following report in the Toronto Daily World will giv some idea of what was done:

"Two lectures were delivered at Albert Hall yesterday, under the auspices of the Secular Society, by S. P. Putnam, of New York. His subject in the afternoon was, 'The Coming Religious Demands.' In the evening he spoke on 'The Glory of Infidelity,' contending that the spirit of questioning and doubting conventionally received opinions alone prevented intellectual stagnation and stimulated research, invention, and progress. The Infidelity of Ingersoll and other assailants of orthodoxy had done much to promote mental activity among Christians and rouse all their energies in its defense. The system owed whatever intellectual brilliancy it possessed to the stimulus of doubt and discussion. The lecturer then considered the effect of Infidelity, or a departure from the recognized formulas and systems upon art, poetry, and literature, instancing Shakspere, Voltaire, Victor Hugo, Byron, Shelley, Walt Whitman, Wagner, and others, as leader of thought, who, by boldly undertaking new departures and setting established canons of thought and expression at defiance, had achieved imperishable renown. Mr. Putnam's lectures were thoughtful and felicitously worded, and displayed literary research."

Mr. George Piddington, one of the prominent members of the Toronto Society, has suffered a severe affliction in the loss of his daughter, Mrs. Miller, who sang in our late convention; and so her life has passed away almost in a breath of music whose melody will not soon be forgotten; that life has passed not to nothingness, but to beautiful memory and sweet hope. It flows still in the stream of humanity, making bright the to-morrow in whose golden harvest no deed shall be lost.

Tuesday evening was dark and stormy, but nevertheless I found a good audience waiting for me at the Town Hall of Gananoque, Ont., where I gave my lecture on the "Coming Religious Demands." There was quite a lively discussion after it, and no doubt people were set to thinking, and that we know is bad for orthodoxy. Mr. Henry Smith, Mr. Wright, and others are doing pioneer work for our cause in this place.

On Wednesday evening I gave the first Freethought lecture ever delivered at Morrisburg, Ont. Some of the good citizens of the place thought that the devil himself was coming. However, I found a fine audience of intelligent ladies and gentlemen who gave me a most attentiv hearing, and most of them seemed to think I was about right. There was a little sparkle of a discussion after the lecture. A prominent physician, a member of Parliament and of the Methodist church, asked me what I should hav to say to Jesus if I really met him at the judgment seat and found that I was mistaken. I answered that I should simply tell Jesus or God that I did the best I knew how, and on that rock I stand. He asked what consolation I could giv at the hour of death. I answered that science would giv more consolation than theology, for it would remove disease and the so-called "dispensations of providence" in the taking away of the fair and the young, and giv healthful conditions, a thing which theology has never yet accomplished. In other words, the doctor would bring a great deal more comfort than the minister. My replies seemed quite satisfactory to the audience.

Mr. J. M. Watson, Mr. Holt, Mr. Algie, and others, men of ability and influence, are our co-workers in this field, and no doubt there will be a successful organization of Liberals in this thriving and beautiful village.

On Thursday and Friday evenings I lectured before the Freethought Club of Montreal. Ample reports of both lectures were published in the leading daily papers of the city. This shows that the press is realizing the importance of our movement, and that as an item of news our meetings and what we say are of interest to the majority of their readers.

My visit at Montreal was indeed delightful. It is like no other city on the continent. The Middle Ages and the Nineteenth century blend together with a sort of quaint magnificence. There is here the largest church building on the continent—so large that its stones would build four hundred ordinary cottages. It is the Notre Dame. I went into it, and seemed to be in a world of candle-lights, and crucifixes, and gorgeous ornaments, centuries removed from the warm, glowing present. I went also into the Bonsecours chapel, curiously flanked by the great Bonsecours market-place, where the French population do congregate in garb and features all their own. This chapel is the oldest religious edifice in the country, and I felt as ancient almost as Adam as I stood within its shadowy precincts. I also visited the church of the Jesuits, which is the most elegant and tasteful of all. I went also into the Grey nunnery, and traversed every part of that huge structure, from kitchen to parlor, and witnessed a blending of humbug and charity that was quite interesting and, as Mark Twain would say, "paralyzing." I saw old men and old women lame and decrepit, without a friend in the world, well taken care of, and there were hosts of little ones, from the baby up, receiving care and instruction. I saw some playing cards, and I thought this was quite sensible until I found that the cards were marked with religious devices, and that the game was something after the fashion of "Presbyterian billiards." It was not by any means the good old game that unbelievers are so fond of. Well, I couldn't help feeling a little bit of gratitude to the Catholic church for being thus charitable, but I thought how much better and sweeter all this would be in the light of science. As I witnessed the solemn procession of the nuns coming and going to worship, I said to myself: "This is beautiful, but beautiful as an icicle. There is no warmth or glory of humanity in it. It is a crystallization of dead thought. It is a marching in grave clothes—spotless, indeed, but grave clothes still."

While at Montreal I rejoiced in the generous hospitality of Capt. R. C. Adams, well known to Liberals as one of our bravest and brightest leaders. He is thoroughly in earnest in whatever he undertakes, and was once a shining light in the orthodox churches. That same intensity of life that made him such a worker there will no doubt make him one of our most inspiring helpers. He is a clear thinker, of superior literary ability, a vigorous writer, an entertaining speaker, and a level-headed man of action. He is indeed a valuable addition to the host of Freethinkers. He is now president of the Montreal Freethought Club. This Club is doing excellent service. It has its reading-room, open daily; its library; its hall, with lectures and meetings every Sunday afternoon. Some of the best citizens of Montreal are connected with it, and it is acknowledged to be a power in the community. It is a practical demonstration of the value of Secular principles. Mr. C. S. Stevens, its efficient secretary, Mr. Boas, Mr. Wilson, and Mr. George Martin, its honorary president, are well-known co-laborers in this genuin church of the future. There are now eighty members of this club. Over a thousand dollars hav been expended this year in refitting its room, and its success is undoubted.

Of course I could not leave Montreal without having a toboggan ride—I believe that is the way they spell it—and so, under the guidance of a couple of bright little Canadians, Indian fashion I went speeding down the slippery elevation with the delight of a boy; and I don't wonder that this has become a famous sport in this Northern clime where one can speed like lightning over the glittering snows.

As I write these last words, I am flying along the bright fields of the Green Mountain State. Along the route are the sparkling waters of Lake Champlain, and the high, grand, rugged hills stretch away in the blue distance, and the sky bends over filled with the shapes of a thousand wandering clouds; and this smiling and superb scenery fills my heart with hope, for it is this joy of nature that I would translate into humanity in the place of the cold and skeleton deity of the past, that would make all this fresh and mighty world but a shadow and a dream.

At Turner's Falls, Mass., in Colle's Opera House, on Sunday afternoon and evening, Jan. 11th, I delivered the first Infidel lecture ever given in this place. In the afternoon about two hundred were present, and in the evening four hundred—a larger number than all the Protestant churches in the village could gather together. Both lectures were well received. Ample reports of them will be published in the Greenfield Reformer, which has a circulation of many thousands in eastern Massachusetts, and thus the seed will be scattered far and wide.

There is a chance for a good organization at Turner's Falls. Some of its most prominent citizens are avowedly Liberal. Such men as George E. Hartley, Richard O'Brien, Fred Colle, proprietor of the Opera House, O. H. Smith, and others, will make an efficient nucleus for a Liberal League. An effort will at once be made to secure the services of C. B. Reynolds, chairman of the executiv committee, to lecture in this place, and gather together its promising material.

George E. Hartley is one of those men who can be depended upon every time. He has splendid enthusiasm, together with a level head. He has been all over the world, and has acquired knowledge by hard knocks and a varied experience. He was formerly a sailor, and has a medal from the Liverpool Shipwreck and Humane Society for saving seven lives amid a stormy and dangerous sea. By this we can know what kind of a stanch Liberal he is, and that what he takes hold of will go ahead. He is one of the most enterprising citizens in the place, coming a few years ago when it was but a swamp, and building himself from fifteen to twenty houses. The orthodox ministers hav labored assiduously to convert him, but the result has been that their own faith has been pretty well unsettled.

Mrs. Hartley herself, whose hospitality I enjoyed, and her sister are among those fortunate ones who were born Liberals, and hav never had to go through those mental tortures that some of us, alas! hav had to endure. Their father, Mr. Follett Temple, was a life-long Infidel, and, strange to say, his mother, in those days when all seemed orthodox, was a worshiper of nature, and hated the church. So the fruit is coming of what that noble woman, amid harsh surroundings, thought so many years ago, more intellectual and bold than even our own fathers. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Tent.

James Field & Son, of Rochester, N. Y., the best and most experienced tent-makers in the state, will furnish a 60x90-tent of 8-oz. duck, mildew-proof, with 8-foot wall poles, 2 jointed center poles, rings, pulleys, hard-wood stakes, double bags for casing everything of the very best and most serviceable kind, for $330. The price is $375. But they will proceed to make the tent at once and store it ready for shipment on our order, if the order is given within three weeks. Send in your contributions to Courtlandt Palmer, treasurer of National Liberal League, 850 Broadway, New York City. Remember every place the tent is pitched it will insure an immense circulation of the right Liberal literature, the increase of the circulation of our best poriodicals, and establishing a large, efficient working League.

Secularism is not sectional; if good is done in any section, it benefits all. We know no North, South, East, or West, but the greatest good to the greatest number, and the success of the tent next summer will insure at least three more the next year.

Let us, realizing it is hard times, do what we can, prove by our acts the truth of our profession. Directly the $330 is subscribed, the tent can be ordered. The entire expense will not exceed $500. Who will giv $100, and hav their name and memory perpetuated as the starters of the most effectiv means of popularizing Liberalism? Who $50?—$25? Let none think small efforts will not be appreciated. Rich or poor, do what you can, and feel the sweet satisfaction of right to rejoice in the good work that shall be accomplished. Send at once.

CHAS. B. REYNOLDS, Ch. Ex. Com. N. L. L.

Mr. Charles Watts was very activ last week in Ontario. He gave two lectures in Hamilton, and one in Welland, in Dunnville, and in Thorold, and then he returned to speak twice in Toronto on Sunday, January 11th. The audiences were good in every place, but in Thorold the Odd Fellow's Hall was crowded to the very doors, all standing room being occupied. This was the first Freethought lecture that had been given in that city, and the many Christians present listened with profound attention. After the lecture a reverend gentleman opposed, and a warm discussion was kept up till after eleven o'clock, which appeared to please Mr. Watts, that gentleman being never more at home than when debating with the ministers of the gospel. There was one drawback to the proceedings; members of the Salvation Army did their best to break up the meeting by surrounding the door and playing their "music" with a big drum and shouting. Finding they could not succeed in their object, they gave up in dispair. The Thorold Post of Friday, Jan. 9th, says:

"Last night the celebrated Secularist lecturer, Mr. Charles Watts, of London, England, delivered his lecture 'Wherein is Secularism Superior to Christianity,' to a crowded audience in the Odd Fellow's Hall, Thorold. Mr. R. B. McPherson officiated as chairman. While very many in the hall differed from the speaker in what he said, and knew that he was making statements which were totally at variance with their own knowledge, yet few would not admit but that Mr. Watts is a clever debater, a thorough master of the subject he handles, and possesses to a high degree the faculty of making 'the worse appear the better reason.' It would be difficult to justify the Salvation Army in pursuing the tactics they did in disturbing the meeting by singing, shouting, and playing their band to an extraordinary extent immediately in front of the hall for a considerable time during the early part of the lecture"

C. B. REYNOLDS'S lecture engagements are as follows: January 14th and 15th, at Clara, Pa.; on the 16th and 17th, at Bingham Center; 18th and 19th, at Roulette. We expect to hear good results from Potter county, in which these towns are located.

Paine's Birthday.

The 29th day of the present month will mark the 148th anniversary of Thomas Paine's birthday. The Liberals of New York are making preparations to celebrate the event in an appropriate manner. The Liberals of Boston will hav a celebration, also. To provide means to make the occasion there a happy one, Mr. Walter C. Wright, of Medford, Mass., has sent the following to the Investigator:

January 1, 1885.

MY DEAR MENDUM: I inclose you a postal order to-day for ten dollars for the use of the Paine Celebration Committee. Wishing you and yours a Happy New Year,

Yours cordially, WALTER C. WRIGHT.

The New York Paine Celebration Committee will appreciate any encouragement of this kind that friends here in the city wish to attend. Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., 120 Lexington ave., is at the head of the committee. THE TRUTH SEEKER is also interested in the celebration, and will be glad to take charge of any sums devoted to that purpose. There will be speeches, songs, recitations, and other attractiv exercises. A good array of talent has already been secured.

"John E. Remsburg's 'Bible Morals,' is the most terrible arraignment, in the fewest words, that I hav ever seen. I fancy that no clerical advocate of the inspired morality theory will hasten to accept the challenge to reply to it, unless he is a man who wholly lacks the brain power to understand the force of words, or else is one who pines for annihilation and recognizes, in such an attempt, the shortest road to the goal of his ambition. To the former class I now, and herein, extend my sympathy. Of the latter I can only say I am sure that this one prayer will receive prompt attention and be answered by return mail. HELEN H. GARDENER."

cording to his power. They knew that the worst torture was a slow, burning fire, and added to it the idea of eternity, and hell was produced. That was their idea. All meanness, revenge, selfishness, cruelty, and hatred, of which men are capable, burst into blossom and bore fruit in that one word, hell.

In this way a God of infinit wisdom experimented with man, keeping him between an outstretched abyss beneath and a heaven above; and in time the man came to believe that he could please God by having read a few sacred books, could count beads, could sprinkle water, eat little square pieces of bread, and that he could shut his eyes and say words to the clouds, but the moment he left this world nothing remained except to damn him. He was to be kept miserable one day in seven, and he could slander and persecute other men all the other days in the week. That was the chance God gave a man here, but the moment he left this world—that settled it. He would go to eternal pain or else to eternal joy. That was the way that the supernatural governed this world—through fear, through terror, through eternity of punishment—and that government, I say to-night, has failed. How has it been kept alive so long? It was born in ignorance.

Let me tell you, whoever attacks a creed will be confronted with a list of great men who hav believed in it. Probably their belief in that creed was the only weakness they had. But he will be asked: "So you know more than all the great men that hav taught and all the respectable men who hav believed in that faith?" For the church is always going about to get a certificate from some governors, or even perhaps members of the legislature, and you are told because so-and-so believed all these things, and you hav no more talents than they, that you should believe the same thing. But I contend, as against this argument, that you should not take the testimony of these men unless you are willing to take at the same time all their beliefs on other subjects. Then, again, they tell you that the rich people are all on their side, and I say so, too. The churches to-day seek the rich, and poverty unwillingly seeks them. Light thrown from diamonds adorns the repentant here. We are told that the rich, the fortunate, and the holders of place, are Christians now, and yet ministers grow eloquent over the poverty of Christ, who was born in a manger, and say that the Holy Ghost passed the titled ladies of the world and selected the wife of a poor mechanic for the mother of God. Such is the difference between theory and practice. The church condemns the men of Jerusalem who held positions and who held the pretensions of the savior in contempt. They admit that he was so little known that they had to bribe a man to point him out to the soldiers. They assert that he performed miracles, yet he remained absolutely unknown, hidden in the depths of obscurity. No one knew him, and one of his disciples had to be bribed to point him out. Surely he and his disciples could hav met the arguments which were urged against their religion at that time.

So long as the church honored philosophers she kept her great men in the majority. How is it now? I say to-night that no man of genius in the world is in the orthodox pulpit, so far as I know. Where are they? Where are the orthodox great men? I challenge the Christian church to produce a man like Alexander Humboldt. I challenge the church to produce a naturalist like Haeckel. I challenge the Christian world to produce a man like Darwin. Where in the ranks of orthodoxy are historians like Draper and Buckle? Where are the naturalists like Tyndall, philosophers like Mill and Spencer, and women like George Eliot and Harriet Martineau? You may get tired of the great men argument, but the names of the great thinkers, the naturalists and scientists of our time, cannot be matched by the supernatural world. What is the next argument they will bring forward? The father and mother argument. "You must not disgrace your parents." How did Christ come to leave the religion of his mother? That argument proves too much. There is one way every man can honor his mother—that is by finding out more than she knew. There is one way a man can honor his father—by correcting the old man's errors.

Many people imagin that the creed we hav came from the brain and heart of Christ. They hav no idea how it was made. They think that it was all made at one time. They don't understand that it was slow growth. They don't understand that theology is a science made up of mistakes, prejudices, and falsehoods. Let me tell you a few facts. The Emperor Constantine, who lifted the Christian religion into power, murdered his wife and his oldest son the very year that he convened the Council of Nice to decide whether Jesus Christ was man or God, and that was not decided till the year of grace 325. Then Theodosius called a council at Constantinople in 381, and this council decided that the Holy Ghost proceeded from the father. You see there was a little doubt on that question before this was done. Then another council was called later to determin who the Virgin Mary really was, and it was solemnly decided that she was the mother of Christ. In 431, and then in 451, a council was held at Chalcedon by the Emperor Marcion, and that decided that Christ had two natures—a human and a divine. In 680 another council was held at Constantinople, and in 1274, at Lyons, it was decided that the Holy Ghost proceeded not only from the father, but from the son, and when you take into consideration the fact that a belief in the Trinity is absolutely essential to salvation, you see how important it was that those doctrins should hav been established in 1274, when millions of people had dropped into hell in the interim solely because they had forgotten that question.

At last we know how religions are made. We know how miracles are manufactured. We know the history of relics, and bones, and pieces of the true cross. And at last we understand apostolic succession. At last we hav examined other religions, and we find them all the same, and we are beginning to suspect that ours is like the rest. I think we understand it. I read a little story a short time ago from the Japanese that throws light upon the question. There was an old priest at a monastery. This monastery was built over the bones of what he called a saint, and people came there and were cured of many diseases. This priest had an assistant. After the assistant grew up and got quite to understand his bnsiness, the old priest gave him a little donkey and told him that henceforth he was to take care of himself. The young priest started out with his little donkey, and asked alms of those he met. Few gave to him. Finally he got very poor. He could not raise money enough to feed the donkey. Finally the donkey died; he was about to bury it when a thought occurred to him. He buried the donkey and sat down on the grave, and to the next stranger that passed he said, "Will you not giv a little money to erect a shrine over the bones of a sinless one?" Thereupon a man gave some money. Others followed his example. A shrine was raised, and in a little while a monastery was built over the bones of the sinless one. Down in the grave the young priest made an orifice, so that persons afflicted with any disease could reach down and touch the bones of the sinless one. Hundreds were thus cured, and persons left their crutches as testimonials to the miraculous power of the bones of the sinless one. Finally the priest became so rich that he thought he would visit his old master. He went to the old monastery with a fine retinue. His old master asked him how he became so rich and prosperous. He replied, "Old age is stupid, but youth has thought." Later on he explained to the old priest how the donkey had died, and how he had raised a monastery over the bones of the sinless one, and again reminded him that old age is stupid, but youth has thought. The old priest exclaimed: "Not quite so fast, young man, not quite so fast. Don't imagin you worked out anything new. This shrine of mine is built over the bones of the mother of your little donkey."

We hav now reached a point in the history of the world when we know that theocracy as a form of government is a failure, and we see that theology as a foundation of government is an absolute failure. We can see that theocracy and theology created not liberty, but despotism. We know enough of the history of the churches in this world to know that they never can civilize mankind; that they are not imbued with the spirit of progress, that they are not imbued with the spirit of justice and mercy. What I ask you to-night is, What has the church done to civilize mankind? What has the church done for us? How has it added to the prosperity of this world? Has it ever produced anything? Nothing. Why, they say it has been charitable. How can a beggar be charitable? A beggar produces nothing. The church has been an eternal and everlasting pauper. It is not charitable. It is an object of charity, and yet it claims to be charitable. The giver is the charitable one. Somebody who has made something, he alone can be charitable. Somebody who by his labor has produced something, he alone can be charitable. And let me say another thing. The church is always upon the wrong side.

Let us take, first, the Episcopal church—if you call that a church. Let me tell you one thing about that church. You know what is called the rebellion in England in 1688. Do you know what caused it? I will tell you. King James was a Catholic, and notwithstanding that fact he issued an edict of toleration for the Dissenters and Catholics. And what next did he do? He ordered all the bishops to hav this edict of toleration read in the Episcopal churches. They refused to do it—most of them. You recollect that trial of the seven bishops? That is what it was all about; they would not read the edict of toleration. Then what happened? A strange thing to say, and it is one of the miracles of this world: The Dissenters in whose favor that edict was issued joined hands with the Episcopalians and raised the rebellion against the king, because he wanted to giv the Dissenters liberty, and these Dissenters and these Episcopalians, on account of that act of toleration, drove King James into exile. That is the history of the first rebellion the Church of England ever raised against the king simply because he issued an edict of toleration, and the poor, miserable wretches in whose favor the edict was issued joined hands with their oppressors. What is the next thing? I want to show you how much the Church of England has done for England. I get it from good authority. Let me read it to you to show how little influence the Christian church, the Church of England, had with the government of our country. Let me tell you that up to the reign of George I., there were in this country sixty-seven offenses punishable with death. There is not a lawyer in this city who can think of those offenses and write them down in one day. Think of it! Sixty-seven offenses punishable with death! Now, between the accession of George I. and the termination of the reign of George III., there were added one hundred and fifty-six new crimes punishable with death, making in all two hundred and twenty-three crimes in England punishable with death. There is no lawyer in this state who can think of that many crimes in a week. Now, during all those years our government was becoming more and more cruel, more and more barbarous, and we do not find, and we hav not found, that the Church of England, with its fifteen or twenty thousand ministers, with its more than a score of bishops and its House of Lords, ever raised its voice or perfected any organization in favor of a more merciful code, or in condemnation of the enormous cruelty which our laws were continually inflicting. And was not Voltaire justified in saying that the English were a people who murdered by law? Now, that is an extract from a speech made by John Bright in May, 1883; that shows what the Church of England did. Two hundred and twenty-three offenses in England punishable with death, and no minister, no bishop, no church organization raising his or its voice against the monstrous cruelty. And why? Even then it was better than the law of Jehovah.

And the Protestants were as bad as the Catholics. You remember the time of Henry IV. in France, when the edict of Nantes was issued simply to giv the Protestants the right to worship God according to the dictates of their conscience, and just as soon as that edict was issued, the Protestants themselvs in the cities where they had power prevented the Catholics from worshiping their God according to the dictates of their conscience, and it was on account of the refusal of those Protestants to allow the Catholics to worship God as they desired that there was a civil war lasting for seven years in France. Richelieu came into authority about the second or third year of that war. He made no difference between Protestants and Catholics, and it was owing to Richelieu that the Thirty Years' War Terminated. It was owing to Richelieu that the peace of Westphalia was made in 1643, although I believe he had been dead a year before that time; but it was owing to him, and it was the first peace ever made between nations on a secular basis with everything religious left out, and it was the last great religious war.

I want you to know another thing, that neither Protestants nor Catholics are fit to govern this world. They are not fit to govern themselvs. How could you elect a minister of any religion president of the United States? Could you elect a bishop of the Catholic church, or Methodist bishop, or Episcopal minister, or one of the elders? No. And why? We are afraid of the ecclesiastic spirit. We are afraid to trust the liberties of men in the hands of people who acknowledge that they are bound by a standard different from that of the welfare of mankind,

In conclusion, the colonel said the history of Italy, France, Spain and Portugal, Cuba and Brazil, all showed that slavery now existed where Catholicism was a power. He then paid his respects to the Puritan fathers, suggested an education that would rule theology out of the government and teach people to rely more on themselvs and less on providence. There are too ways of living, the broad way of life lived for others and the narrow theological way. It was wise to liv so that death could be serenely faced, and then if there was another world the best way to prepare for it was to make the best of this, and if there be no other world the best was to so liv as to be happy and make everybody else happy.

"The Social Revolution."—Rectification.

In the translation from Proudhon under this title, TRUTH SEEKER Dec. 20th, the sense of ¶11th is spoiled by some omission which we cannot indicate precisely, not having been able to obtain the favor of correcting our own proofs, for intellectual liberty among the Liberals is subject to the printer's caprice or negligence, just as civil liberty at the constitution of our "free republic," hob nobbed with chattel and wage slavery at the caprice of capitalism. These signalize an abuse no less serious than general in the newspaper management of the United States, that intellectual qualification is disregarded in the function of correcting press-work. Left to a merely mechanical routine, as soon as attention flags, the sense goes to pie. Were a proper demand made for it, without paying higher wages, there are plenty of scholars who would execute such tasks conscientiously. If the fault lay in the MSS., they would keep back the article until its sense was made clear. At present an author never surrenders his work to the machinery of publication without painful forebodings of the muss that is likely to be made of it by unintelligent and careless hands.

[We are grieved at any trouble the printers giv a correspondent, and invoke for him the commiseration of all readers. At the same time the printers deserve a modicum of sympathy in consideration of the trouble he sometimes causes them.—Ed. T. S.]

In behalf of Proudhon, who seldom writes nonsense, we here substitute his phrases in their original order. (The parentheses are mine): "We must (1) arrest the disorganizing tendency resulting from the French Revolution of '98, and by the aid of the new principle (reciprocity, or personal contracts, instead of governmental authority) proceed to the liquidation of established interests (notably, to the emancipation of labor from the burdens of rent and of interest in perpetual bondage to capital). This will be only abounding in the sense of the Constituent Assembly of August 4, '89. (2) To organize, still reciprocally, the economic forces and fix the constitution of property. (3) To fuse, immerse, and transform the political or governmental into the economic system, reducing, simplifying, decentralizing, suppressing one after another, the wheels and gearings of that great machine called the state or government.

"Suppose the people to hav stated its aims as in '89, and saying to its delegates: 'I wish the revolution pacific, but prompt, decisiv, and complete. To the actual system of oppression and misery let an order of prosperity and of liberty succeed. For a constitution of political powers substitute an organization of economic forces. Let the citizen, instead of belonging to society by his subordination and obedience, be bound only by his free personal contract. Employ, for the realization of my desires, those very institutions whose abolition I entrust to you, and the principles of ethics which you must complete in such sort that the new society shall appear as the spontaneous, natural, necessary development of the old, and that the Revolution, while abrogating the old order of affairs, shall still be its progress.

"Suppose the people, once enlightened concerning its true interests, declaring its will not to reform government, but to revolutionize society; in this case, without prejudice to any better plan, I submit the following suggestions for the action of our representativs.

"I attach the first importance to the question of a bank of discount, based upon the civil right of producers to reciprocal exchange of their products in fulfilment of contracts, which may be repeated without limit.

"Protectiv union stores, butcheries, bakeries, and many other branches of commerce hav been established on this principle, with mutual insurance of just prices and good qualities. By one more step in this line of progress, citizens hav the right to found a bank with the view of obtaining at a cheap rate the currency they need for business, and by which they compete with the previously privileged establishments. For such a foundation, simple contract suffices."—P. J. Proudhon.

I do not enter farther upon this special operation of the liquidation of debts and mortgages, but with the editor's permission will resume the subject in a future issue. Edgeworth.

Honor to Bruno in Rome.

Rome, Dec. 24, 1884.—Pope Leo XIII. is indignant over the proposal to erect in Rome a splendid bronze statue of Giordano Bruno, the Italian philosopher, and the father of Pantheism, who, after being imprisoned in Rome for two years, was burnt as a heretic in 1600. He is revered as a martyr by Atheists all over the world, and a committee has just been formed in the University of Rome to raise the proposed monument to his memory. A site has already been secured in the Piazza Campo Difloria, and the subscriptions in Rome amount to 10,000 lire. Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, the English Freethinker, has issued an appeal to Atheists throughout Great Britain to subscribe to the cost of the statue. The proposal, however, to honor the great Pantheist in the very citadel of the Roman Catholic church, has horrified his holiness, and he expressed himself with unusual vehemence in a speech which he made at the Vatican to-day upon the subject.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Seeing the above in the Boston Daily Journal of to-day, and feeling a strong desire to do something in aid of this most praiseworthy object, I hereby subscribe a dollar for the statue, and earnestly hope that all Freethinkers in the United States and Canada will do the same, or better, if they can afford it.

And I would suggest that Mr. T. B. Wakeman, of Nassau street, New York city, be the custodian of this proposed Bruno Statue Fund in North America, for the reason that he was the person who first suggested the Bruno Calendar Monument, now so happily founded all over the world in the minds and hearts of Liberals, and which is named and is now dating Year of Science (a.s.) 284. I take the liberty of asking Mr. Wakeman to head this proposed subscription list, and I hav no doubt he will gladly receive and account for all sums that may be sent to him. Sincerely yours, George N. Hill.

Boston, Dec. 25, a.s. 284.

REPLY BY MR. WAKEMAN.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: By a card in the Boston Investigator, approved by that paper, Mr. George N. Hill has called upon me to take charge of a subscribtion to aid in the erection in Rome "of a splendid bronze statue of Giordano Bruno, the Italian philosopher, and the father of Pantheism, who, after being imprisoned in Rome, was burnt there as a heretic in 1600."

It seems that this proposed statue is being prepared, and will, before long, be a fact in the "Eternal City." The Liberals of Europe, under the recommendation of Mr. Bradlaugh and other leaders, are forwarding their contributions.

The names of the contributors will be published, and probably be placed under the monument.

Shall not America, by the names of her sons and daughters, be well represented on that roll of honor?

There are reasons which would make it a national disgrace if Americans are made remarkable there only by their absence.

America has been, and ought to be, the representativ of liberty, science, and progress the world over. Others do not forget this fact, which our history and position hav made prominent to the world, and that fact calls upon Americans to honor the memory of the great typical martyr of liberty and science.

But still further it should be remembered that this statue was urged, if not first proposed, by the distinguished American savant and Liberal, Professor John W. Draper, in his noble work, "The Conflict of Religion [meaning theology] and Science," which has enlightened millions in both hemispheres, and endeared the name of Bruno to them.

In America, too, has sprung up the practice of dating the era of the world, the era of liberty, science, and humanity, from 1600, the year of this martyrdom of Bruno, making the year beginning to-day the year 285. The reasons for the recognition of this new era I hav explained at length elsewhere. The life of Bruno is connected with them all in an emphatic and representativ matter.

As a great public teacher he made Freethought and liberty a fact as far as his voice, pen, and influence could reach. He also made known the new astronomy of Copernicus, Galileo, and Kepler, and thus really founded modern science. He also first grasped the immense consequences of this world-changing discovery, viz. that the "infinity of space and of worlds," at once logically changed Theism and Pantheism, making the modern conception of God one of the infinit world and law, instead of a limited wilful person.

Finally, his labors were limited to no one country, but were spread over the whole of Europe, and in sympathy over the whole race of man, which was then (in 1600) first found to be a grand international organism encircling the earth, so that collectiv man, or humanity, became then first recognized. These are the grand facts which gave mankind a new heaven, a new earth, and a new era—a new existence!

Bruno was the representativ of all these facts, and became a martyr of and for them. No American who reads the touching story of his wonderful heroism in the extreme of torture and death by fire, as Professor Draper has described it, can hesitate to recognize Bruno as the typical martyr of the new era, nor resist the impulse to glorify his memory.

I will cheerfully take charge of any sums which may be sent to me for this statue, and see that they are acknowledged in our Liberal papers, and sent, with the names of the donors, to the proper committee at Rome, whose receipt will be also published.

Yours sincerely,
T. B. Wakeman,
93 Nassau st., N. Y. City.

In the New Era (of Liberty, Science, and Man), 285.
Era of the Supposed Christ, 1885.

Our London Letter.

A perusal of the list of Sunday lectures given in London alone is highly gratifying to the friends of progress and reform, and proportionately the reverse to those who still cling to the gross superstitions connected with supernaturalism. The halls are steadily increasing in numbers, and while churches and chapels are gradually falling into disuse, and the vast majority of them would comfortably contain double the average attendance, those places where interesting and instructiv subjects are discussed are generally well filled, and often crowded to excess, so that it is found necessary to increase their size where possible, or their numbers in the same locality when this cannot be done. As quickly as the demand for able lectures is shown, the supply is forthcoming, and it is well to compare the discourses of the Freethought lecturers with those of the sky-pilots, to show the vast superiority of intelligence and knowledge of the former over the latter. The former are in most instances men who hav to work hard six days out of the seven for the means of supplying themselvs with the necessities of life, and hav but little time for the preparation of one, two, or three lectures on the Sunday, and yet are able to delight and instruct an audience, while the college-taught man, who has spent two or three years in theological training, and has all the week at his disposal to make his preparations for his one day's work, only succeeds in boring his listeners with stale platitudes and wretched speculations as to the existence of a life after death, and with all his efforts can only picture a very insipid state of being for which all true believers are destined, so that it is not wonderful that the rising generation is not particularly charmed with the inducements held out by the priests, who are scarcely so wily as they once were, and prefer those places where they are able to hear more of this present world than speculations as to a problematical future one.

Great consternation has been caused in the Christian camp by the purchase of chapels to be turned into Freethought halls, but as the chapels are often failures, and do not pay the expenses incurred, the buildings hav to be sold to those who will giv the most money for them. I know of several places here which just manage to struggle along, and call one to mind at the present moment where a charge of one pound ten shillings per annum is made for a sitting, and collections are taken up at every service, and yet the concern is anything but a paying one. It is being found out that you can't get salvation for nothing nowadays, but that it is an expensiv article; so many are falling away in their attendance, and amuse themselvs at home, or enjoying country walks, or paying visits to the various Secular halls scattered in all parts of London. I understand from friends living in the country districts, that such is the case there also, and this spirit of the age is not confined to large towns only, but is seen in the villages. If it were not for the endowments attached to the state churches, the probabilities are the whole thing would collapse like a house of cards, and it is not to be wondered at that disestablishment is so stoutly resisted. Those among the state paid clergy who favor the scheme rely on their own oratorical powers, and the superstition still prevalent, due to the results of early education, to keep their congregations together, and make a good living for themselvs, caring nothing for those who may succeed them, and would only be too glad to see the weakly one weeded out, as it would increase their funds; as, if the churches were closed in a proportionately greater extent than the decrease of the faithful, those that were left would be better filled, and this result the sharp-sighted clergy clearly apprehend.

When a Freethinker speaks of the decline of religion, the believer triumphantly points to the fact that the Tabernacle and the Temple, with one or two other places, are always well filled. But this is only owing to the fact that those leading lights, Spurgeon and Parker, are buffoons, and unless their successors can as successfully act the fool, these places will be howling wildernesses in a few years' time. It is strange that either of these two men can get together so many ardent admirers, seeing that while they continually advocate faith in their deity, Parker finds it necessary to take a long vacation annually, and Spurgeon is just on the point of starting for Mentone, his winter resort, because the Lord is not able to get at his rheumatism in this country during the most inclement part of the year, and can only operate on his champion by the shores of the Mediterranean. May be the Lord livs there during the winter, as by this time he is getting rather ancient, and feels acutely the vicissitudes of the English climate, which is rather trying to old people. At all events, with all his preaching and enjoining the necessity of faith upon his blind followers, he himself has more faith in good living and a genial climate than in all the gods in the Pantheon of either Christendom or heathendom.

On Sunday I heard a lecture by G. W. Foote on "The Star of Bethlehem," selected, no doubt, as being appropriate to the season. He is a clever lecturer, and fairly original, a very well-read man, and thoroughly conversant with the subject he handles. His dry humor is at times perfectly irresistible, and regularly brings down the house. For my own part, I like him quite as well as any Freethought lecturer I hav heard, and think he will before long take a far more prominent place than he has hitherto done. He certainly works hard, and is honestly entitled to whatever reward he gets in a monetary sense, but I do not suppose it will overpower him with its immensity. I hav not yet heard of any instance of a Freethought leader acquiring a very large fortune in this country, though it is reported and really believed by a few that Bradlaugh derives an enormous income of I don't know how many thousand a year from his lectures. No doubt it is true, and by and by he will buy up the whole of the aristocracy and landed interests, and run the entire country on his own lines. When that time comes, I hope he won't object to renting me a few acres at a low rental, so that I may grow enough produce to supply my humble wants.

Wishing you and your numerous readers a very happy and prosperous new year, and a continued success to the efforts for the propagation of thought, I am, Fraternally yours, J. D.

Judicial Outrage in Washington.

The defense in the Swaim court-martial now going on at Washington introduced a witness named De Akers. The judge-advocate objected to his testimony on the ground that he was an Atheist. Judge Aulson, of counsel for the defense, said this objection was a relic of barbarism, invoked by the prosecution for the purpose of reaching certain ends desired by them; it is an appeal to a rule that long pervaded in the common law on this subject, but which the advance of civilization and enlightenment is fast brushing away.

Judge Shellabarger followed for the defense. He contended that in order to exclude the testimony of this witness, the prosecution must not only show that he (the witness) does not believe in the existence of a God—a supreme being—but must make it appear that he does not stand under a sense of moral responsibility to tell the truth. He said it is a question whether this sort of objection does not fall within that prohibition of the Federal Constitution which forbids tests of religious belief.

The witness, De Akers, was called and interrogated by the court, and was asked: "What is your understanding of the obligation of an oath?" and replied: "I understand the court represents the majesty of the Republic, and any oath it may choose to prescribe for me I shall recognize, whether it be by supreme being, by mumbo-jumbo, or any one else. I do not know that I can answer the question any more intelligently." In reply to further questioning he said: "I understand that I am here to tell the truth;" and when asked what penalty he would incur by disregard of the truth, said: "The contempt of honest men; the knowledge that I hav failed to discharge my duty to society and, of course, to the government." Without consultation the court decided that his testimony was inadmissible.

And yet it appears by what the defense intended to establish by De Akers's testimony that he is about the most honest man in the case. He is a telegraph operator, and worked for the firm now accusing Swaim, and by whom he was ordered to post false quotations of the market prices for stocks, and that declining to take part in such deceptions he resigned his position.

What a commentary is this upon the prevailing religion! The testimony of a cheating Christian can be taken, but not that of an honest Atheist. The state of Denmark is very rotten.

Colonel Ingersoll's Lecture.

Through the courtesy of Colonel Ingersoll, last Sunday night the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER had a seat in the Academy of Music. The immense building was crammed to the ridgepole with people who paid all the way from fifty cents to three dollars for admission, and applauded the speaker as though they agreed with him. The lecture, "Which Way?" was, perhaps, the most radical of all the colonel's platform utterances. What we print of "Which Way?" in another place is not more than half the lecture, and contains some inaccuracies. It is as inadequate to convey a full idea of what Colonel Ingersoll said as any praise of his oratory that we could write would be to describe how he said it.

There is, of course, but one greatest of living orators. There may be a greater one than Colonel Ingersoll, but he has up to this date failed to make himself known.

Christian Philosophy.

There is at Balham, in South Wales, a body of eccentric persons, who hav formed themselvs into the Christian Philosophical Institute. This institute was founded for the purpose of proving from "revealed" truth the falsity of alleged facts that hav enjoyed only the benefit of demonstration. Through a circular forwarded from the Christian Philosophical Institute to a New York daily, we learn that Sir Isaac Newton's theories are denounced as "solar fictions" and "baseless superstitions." It is the object of the Christian philosophers to throw the light of the scriptures upon the facts of science, and to ultimately demolish them. The prevalent philosophy is to be crushed. They say that "the Almighty will bring confusion upon it all, and the whole world will be compelled to confess that the senseless devices of philosophers, falsely so-called, are nothing better than the lowing and braying of the ox and the ass." The refinement of the manner in which these Christian geniuses allude to their opponents, it will be observed, is marked.

A prominent fallacy of the Newtonians, according to these biblical astronomers, is the notion that the earth is a planet. That is one of the greatest mistakes of this enlightened age, because "all the planets are said to be worlds, so that the two systems of terrestrial and celestial physics, which by the Creator himself were kept as distinct and separate as words could make them, hav been mixed up by these modern improvers, till the words geography and astronomy are used as synonymous terms." The fact is, the earth is the earth, the stars are stars. They are so called in Genesis, and that settles it.

One of the most preposterous of the claims of modern science the Christians of the Philosophical Institute see in the absurd notion that the earth is round. They say:

"Because the sun, and the moon, and the stars are thought to be round or spherical, therefore the earth must be so too, whether the facts confirmed the idea or not! But the pretended curvature has never been detected on any part of the earth or ocean since the world was made! It seems to be, indeed, the one only shape the Almighty never has created! Hills, and valleys, and plains of every size and extent; but any approach to a curvature, such as the globe theorists require, has never been met with during all the most careful measurements which hav been made, during the last half century and upward, in the construction of thousands of miles of railways. What is absurdly called the 'dip of the horizon' at sea is no 'dip' at all! All distant objects of the same size gradually diminish, according to distance, on any flat surface. But the apparent decrease in size has nothing to do with any variation from a true level. The higher the observer ascends the further can he see. But his line of vision is always at right angles or a tangent to his perpendicular. If he goes to the top of a real elevation, he has to look down or deflect his telescope. This is never the case when looking at the horizon even from the car of a balloon, or the top of the highest mountain he can reach. So that the so-called 'dip' is a fraud and falsehood, as is every other phrase connected with the subject."

Of course. This lucid argument of the Christian philosophers explains away the four following facts upon which deluded astronomers hav heretofore relied to prove that this terrestrial body is a sphere: 1. In proceeding from the south northward, the North Star is gradually elevated. This might be accounted for, however, on the theory that the North Star climbs up into the sky to see who is coming. 2. As a ship moves from the shore, the sea is seen, as the distance increases, to round up between the observer and the vessel, until she is "hull down," and then her masts gradually sink from view. This "rounding" of the ocean surface occurs in all directions. The Christian philosophers may hold either that the vessels upon which these observations were made did actually sink, or that a protuberant sea-serpent interposed himself between the would-be scientists and the ship. Thus another fallacy goes by the board, so to speak, and sailors will, of course, cease to send the glass to the masthead, since the lookout may be kept with the same facility from the deck. 3. In lunar eclipses the earth, intervening between the sun and the moon, casts a round shadow upon the face of her satellite. In this instance the biblical scientists will probably say that the shadow is not that of the earth at all, but of a tin pan or some other circular object, held between the sun and the moon by scheming so-called scientists to deceive the multitude. 4. The fact that the earth has been sailed around does not count. In any case, science must go.

But the Bible philosophers do not stop here. They go on thus, alluding to the earth's supposed motion:

"First of all, its axial motion or revolution round its own axis, at a rate of 1,000 miles an hour; and the still more astounding and inconceivable orbital motion round the sun, at a speed of over 1,100 miles a minute! This is three or four times quicker than a flash of lightning, and twenty times quicker than the flight of a cannon ball! It is also said it carries the atmosphere with it; but we often see the wind blowing in a directly contrary direction. And birds and butterflies can all keep up with it, and the smoke from our chimneys ascends as leisurely as if no movement existed. What are the grounds of this extraordinary device? Has anybody ever felt or had any reason to imagin for a moment that two such violent and terrific motions could possibly exist without their being in any way sensible of it?"

No facts demonstrated by science can stand for a moment against reasoning like this. It is worthy of Father Lambert. To the closing query, the existence of the unsusceptible Christian philosophers would appear to furnish an affirmativ answer.

Solar attraction, as a hypothesis, must likewise fall into desuetude, because, since "the sun do move," that sort of attraction would disarrange everything. And since all earthly objects are on top of the earth, and it would be absurd for them to leave it by ascending into the atmosphere, the attraction of gravitation is seen to be useless either as a theory or as a natural phenomenon. These philosophers are prepared to show that "solid bodies will not float unsupported in space. The sun has never been proved to be capable of attracting anything. The silly question, 'On what, then, does the earth rest?' can only be answered by saying we hav never been told, nor where space ended above us or beyond us. Such knowledge is unnecessary, especially to the brainless simpletons who hav not intelligence enough to understand facts that are already as clear as daylight." They giv us nothing to take the place of the theories which they expect to render effete, saying that knowledge on the subject is "unnecessary." The additional words, "to brainless simpletons," may explain their lack of information. They hav also doubts about the astronomers believing their own theories, since these misguided and misguiding persons "often build strong granit pillars on which to fix their telescopes, and use every precaution to avoid the slightest disturbance while taking their observations. What would be the use of going through this elaborate farce if they knew they were lodged on a globe spinning through space four times quicker than a flash of lightning?" These Christian philosophers should devote themselvs to the solution of the cognate question why water in a pail retains a level surface when swung steadily in a circle through the air, instead of running out, as it ought to do.

As a final and decisiv blow at Newton, a philosopher of this institute named Hampden says this:

"No such fraud has ever before or since been conceived by man. Satan himself must hav devised it, in order to bring discredit and contempt on the idspired volume; and most successful hav his efforts hitherto been. . . . The Newtonian theory is not partly true and partly false, but I affirm there is not one particle of truth in it, from the first line to the last! It is the most stupendous and most pernicious lie that ever came from the bottomless pit, without one redeeming discovery to mitigate the intensity of the fraud!"

We hav no doubt that Mr. Hampden and his associate Christian philosophers are cranks.

Figures That Continue to Lie.

We advise Frank Pixley, when next he writes about the Catholics and Methodists, to read up upon the subject, and consult such official documents as can be obtained from the publishers of that literature. Mr. Pixley has, heretofore, made his Argonaut a very strong bulwark against Catholicism on the Pacific coast, and we hav found in it much to reprint with commendation. And even in his last screeching diatribe against Catholicism he pictures truly the dangerous tendency of that church. The mistakes he makes are (1) that Catholicism is not to be feared, and (2) that Protestantism has no evil leanings.

In reckoning the comparativ strength of Romanism and Methodism Mr. Pixley uses the very figures we showed by official statistics to be incorrect. He quotes Methodism as numbering fifteen millions. In our last criticism we used the figures of the Methodist Year Book of 1884. Since then Phillips and Hunt hav published a Year Book for 1885. The figures are now, at the close of 1884, of members and ministers resident in the United States, 3,891,033. Surely Mr. Pixley cannot ask his conclusions upon Protestantism to be accepted by rational people when he knows so little of the actual state of the church he offsets against his pope's Irish.

His second slip is that in this country, ruled by Protestants, "there is no connection between church and state, no enforced religious observances, no sectarianism permitted in the system of an education that is free to all." We would like to inquire of Mr. Pixley if the granting of enormous sums of money to church institutions, if the employment (and payment from the public treasury) of chaplains in our army and navy, in Congress, and in nearly all the state legislatures, do not form a connection between church and state? And if the reading of the Bible in our public schools, supported by government, and the daily prayers in legislatures and Congress, at military posts and on national vessels—if all these are not enforced religious observances? And is there no sectarianism in our schools? What is daily reading from the New Testament but Christian sectarianism? To be sure it is not Methodist nor Presbyterian particularly, but it is Protestantism versus Catholicism, and, worse than that, is Christian as against all systems of religion. A Freethinker, a Jew, or a believer in some religion antagonistic to Christianity does not wish his children poisoned with the superstition and thaumaturgy of the four gospels, the crude philosophy and harsh sermonizing of the epistles, or the crazy vaporing of the revelators. Such is worse than sectarianism—it is the teaching of barbarism.

Canada Moving.

One of the questions voted on in Toronto last week was, "Shall existing tax exemptions be abolished?" The Toronto Globe of the 16th givs a partial return from the parishes. The vote, as will be seen, was overwhelmingly in favor of abolition:

It Was Christian, Not Infidel Ethics.

The Times of this city complains that at Col. Ingersoll's lecture last Sunday night the boys in the lobby sold "Orthodoxy" as "the lecture of the evening," and adds these insulting words:

"What is there in Colonel Bob's ethics to forbid a man who wants bread for his beloved wife and his prattling, innocent babes to obtain ten cents from a man who can perfectly well spare it by selling him an old lecture instead of a new one? The Christian religion, or any other comparativly decent religion, would condemn the act, but Col. 'Bob' does not believe in any religion, and if there is a God who objects to swindling, Col. Bob is not on such terms with him as would permit him to attach any weight to God's wishes. To attend the preaching of Col. 'Bob' and at the same time to object to those who practice in the lobby what is preached in the hall would be an act of unreasoning inconsistency."

The books were purchased from THE TRUTH SEEKER by the man who sells opera librettos, and his boys were the offenders. They are all good Christians, but not averse to selling heresy for cash, and, it seems, willing to lie that they might make a little more. The Times will please make a note of this.

Editorial Notes.

THE pastor of the Rochford, Ill., First Baptist church, was presented with an elegantly engrossed copy of the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That in view of the existing and unhappy circumstances, which must necessarily impede all successful church advancement, we believe it would not only be for the interest of the church, but that of the pastor, for him to resign his pastoral relations with the church, and that the clerk be instructed to so notify the pastor, Rev. G. Anderson, of this action of the church, and present him with a copy of these resolutions."

Mr. Anderson feels that the congregation "do him proud." He is in Leavenworth, Kan., looking for a situation. The name of the woman is not mentioned.

A MAN out in Malden, Mo., we learn through the Investigator, recently stated in the Cleveland Herald that Col. Ingersoll had copied his lecture on "The Mistakes of Moses" from another author. The colonel replied as follows:

"CLEVELAND, O., Dec. 11, 1884.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE HERALD: In your paper this morning is an article entitled, 'Ingersoll's Mistake,' in which it is charged that I copied my lecture upon 'Mistakes of Moses' from a work by Hittell, and palmed it off as my own. And the writer of the article says that he has compared my lecture with the book and finds it is the same, word for word.

"I will giv $1,000 reward to anyone who will produce any book, published before my lecture was delivered, in which my lecture can be found.

"The charge made in the article is simply a stupid falsehood.

"The malice of those who love their enemies is simply amusing. Yours truly, R. G. INGERSOLL."

MUCH is being said in the papers about Abe Buzzard and the Welsh Mountain banditti. Buzzard, when he was a boy, used to attend the Methodist church, and took part in prayer and song. But he soon became a criminal, and was sentenced for thirteen years to prison. In May, 1882, he got out, and soon entered upon a wild career, which he is now running. He and his confederates hav kept up a reign of terror in their vicinity for some time. A Philadelphia paper publishes a letter from a correspondent in the neighborhood, stating that "many pious people remember Abe . . . when he used to pray in the meetings," and adds: "These are the people who, it is believed, secretly sympathize with this bold buccaneer, and in a great measure hav contributed to the unsuccessful attempts of the officers in running him down." Dr. Buckley says this is a mean slander upon the Methodists.

ISAAC B. RICH, business manager of the Banner of Light, has met with a great loss in the death of his wife, who passed away on the evening of Dec. 31st. Mrs. Rich, says the Banner, "was a lady possessing many estimable qualities, and leaves behind her a large circle of friends to mourn her sudden departure from their midst. Her husband has been called upon to part with one who was ever the radiant center, the beacon-light of his home. The deceased passed through some two weeks of extreme suffering ere her release came from her stricken form, during which time all was accomplished, though in vain, which affection and love could suggest, or medical skill of the highest order could avail. She was born at Greenville, Me., at the foot of Moosehead Lake, and had attained the age, at the time of her decease, of 32 years, 8 months, 14 days. Her father, two sisters, and three brothers are still living; and she leaves as a sacred legacy to the charge of parental affection one little daughter, Maude Leanor, aged six years." The funeral was from the parlors of the Revere House, where Mr. and Mrs. Rich resided, and was attended by hundreds of sympathizing friends. The services were conducted by Minot J. Savage and Miss M. T. Shellhamer. Mr. Rich has the warm sympathy of the Liberal as well as Spiritualistic public in his bereavement.

THE question of church property being exempted from taxation is assuming a healthy position in Canada. Throughout the Dominion the Anti-Exemption Society is gaining strength and influence. Not only are many of the more liberal clergy in favor of the churches paying their fair share of taxation, but the leading newspapers write boldly in the same direction. The following is from the Hamilton Spectator, and appears to us to be very much to the point: "The argument has already been made that the savior of mankind paid his taxes; and we hav every reason to suppose that had he been possessed of a church he would hav paid taxes on that too. The servant of these later days is above his Lord in having a fine house in which to preach; he should not be behind his Lord in rendering to Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's. The argument that the exemption is small has no force. We are contending for a principle. If it is wrong, it is equally wrong whether the sum involved is a dollar or a million dollars. The sum is not so very insignificant: it amounts to about $14,500 a year. If the money were paid out of the city treasury we fancy there would be a fine to do about it. It is only kept out; it is exactly the same. A Christian very zealous for his religion will not put an argument into the mouth of his opponent by accepting this publicly. We do not know that Mr. Charles Watts is a resident of Hamilton or a taxpayer in it; but there are followers of Mr. Charles Watts who can say—and who do say—that Christians wrong them of their money because Christians are in the majority. They can say—and do say—that they do not need churches. They deny that the churches hav any effect in reducing public expenditure for the preservation of the peace. They are undoubtedly wrong; but an argument is placed in their hands which they are not slow to use. 'Why,' asks one of those Agnostics, 'should I be compelled to pay money to support a church which I never enter, and a religion in which I do not believe?' The arguments with which he will be met are precisely the arguments with which Dr. Hunter's co-religionists hav been met in Britain, when they argued that the Methodist, the Baptist, and the Independent should not be required to pay for the support of the Church of England."

THE Palladium of Labor calls Moody a pious fraud, and says that "while admitting Mr. Moody's power and influence in his chosen sphere of work, it is difficult to believe in his sincerity, or in that of the average revivalist. Moody is reported—and the report has gone undenied—to be excessivly well provided for in this world's goods. He takes very good care to line his pockets well while professing to despise 'the fleeting things of earth.' He commenced with nothing, and now owns a splendid mansion at Northfield, Mass., where he livs in grand style, driving fast trotting horses and otherwise enjoying himself after the fashion of an ordinary sinner. In Mr. Moody's own state of Massachusetts," continues the Palladium, there are "tens of thousands of workingmen out of employment and suffering from the exactions of a heartless capitalism and landlordism, and there are very many more whose existence is a perpetual struggle, and who, despite their industry, are unable to assure themselvs of subsistence in the future. Has Mr. Moody in the course of his long ministrations ever said one word in condemnation of the oppressions of the competitiv system under which labor is crushed? Has he ever shown the least sympathy with or understanding of the social teachings of the great labor reformer whose example he professes to follow? Not he. Had he done so, had he told his rich and comfortable supporters, the well-to-do stock gamblers, bankers, profit-mongers, land-speculators, and capitalistic exploiters of various sorts that their luxuries and religious donations came from the robbery of the poor, and that this being so their prayers were a profanation and their gifts an abomination to the Lord, instead of being handsomely paid and housed like a prince, he would be like his alleged 'master,' without a place where to lay his head. He is not honest. Aside from all questions as to the inspiration or authenticity of scripture, the Bible, which he pretends to believe as it stands, plainly and distinctly condemns the heaping up of riches by usury, land-stealing, fraud, or the oppression of labor. The commercial religionism of the day, which is the only popular or fashionable kind of religion, is diametrically opposed to the spirit and letter of Christ's teaching. Mr. Moody, as a close Bible student, must know this, but he is shrewd enough to see on which side his bread is buttered and to act accordingly."

FURTHER evidence that Washington was not a Christian, but a Deist, comes to light every now and then. In a late number of the Episcopal Recorder, the Rev. E. D. Neill writes: "As I read, a few days ago, of the death of the Rev. Richard M. Abercrombie, rector of St. Matthew's Protestant Episcopal church in Jersey City, memories of my boyhood arose. He was born not far from my father's house, in Philadelphia, and was the son of the Rev. James Abercrombie, a fine scholar and preacher, who had in early life corresponded with the great lexicographer, Samuel Johnson, and in later years was the assistant minister of Christ's and St. Peter's churches, in Philadelphia, where my maternal ancestors had worshiped for more than one generation. One day, after the father had reached four score years, the lately deceased son took me into the study of the aged man, and showed me a letter which President George Washington had written to his father, thanking him for the loan of one of his manuscript sermons. Washington and his wife were regular attendants upon his ministry while residing in Philadelphia. The president was not a communicant, notwithstanding all the pretty stories to the contrary, and after the close of the sermon on sacramental Sundays, had fallen into the habit of retiring from the church while his wife remained and communed. Upon one occasion Dr. Abercrombie alluded to the unhappy tendency of the example of those dignified by age and position turning their backs upon the celebration of the Lord's Supper. The discourse arrested the attention of Washington, and after that he never came to church with his wife on communion Sunday. Dr. Abercrombie, in a letter which appears in the fifth volume of Sprague's 'Annals of the American Pulpit,' mentions that he did not find fault with the sermon, but respected the preacher for his moral courage. There is a story about Washington being found in the woods in winter time in prayer by the owner of the house which he used as his headquarters at Valley Forge, which I would like to believe if it were not so improbable, and if it had not been first put in print by the eccentric and not very accurate Episcopal minister, Morgan L. Weems. John Potts, of Pottsgrove, had several sons and daughters. One, James, studied law at the Temple, London, and was a judge of the Court of Common Pleas in Philadelphia at the beginning of the war of the Revolution, and, being a Tory, eventually went to Halifax. Jonathan, another son, studied medicin at Edinburgh, and espoused the cause of the colonies, and was the medical-director general of the middle department. Another son was a Quaker and a neutral, and owned the house at Valley Forge which is still known as Washington's Headquarters, and the three were brothers of the grandmother of the writer of this article. With a capacious and comfortable house at his disposal, it is hardly possible that the shy, silent, cautious Washington should leave such retirement and enter the leafless woods in the vicinity of the winter encampment of an army and engage in audible prayer. The alleged scene has been often produced by the painter and engraver, but I fear it is only a myth."

Lectures and Meetings.

THE first annual convention of the Pennsylvania State Liberal League will meet at Altoona January 30th, and continue three days. The Pittsburgh Truth says:

"Able speakers hav been engaged, and earnest workers interested. Charles Watts, the great English champion of Secularism, has located in America, accepted the vice-presidency of the National Liberal League, and proposes to devote his entire time to the promotion of Freethought in the United States and Canada. Liberals who hav not heard him should by all means come to Altoona, and those who hav will need no invitation to do so. Another prominent speaker at the convention will be the genial and versatil Samuel P. Putnam, of New York, secretary of the National Liberal League, a poet and scholar, and a speaker of no ordinary ability. He accompanies Mr. Watts in his tour of the states, and will do good work for the cause. Ex-Rev. Charles B. Reynolds, of North Parma, N. Y., a regular 'little giant,' will be on the ground, and will make things lively. The queenly and eloquent Mrs. Mattie P. Kreckel, of Kansas City, Mo., will also be present to grace the occasion; and lastly, that warmhearted and unselfish Liberal, Professor Wm. Seymour, of Philadelphia, vice-president of the State League, will lend a helping hand. The minor details of arrangement hav been entrusted to John R. Kemp and the friends at Altoona, who, being on the ground, are the better judges."

By a circular issued it is announced that Colonel Ingersoll will attend. Mr. James E. Emerson, president of the League, being in Washington, called on the colonel, who promised to visit Altoona if the Opera House could be secured. That place has been rented by the State League, and Mr. Ingersoll has since written that he would speak on the 31st. The Liberals of Altoona and vicinity are to be congratulated.

AT the close of W. F. Jamieson's second course of lectures in Wentworth, Dakota, a Liberal League of thirty-six members was organized. Of the series of meetings the Wentworth Bond has this to say:

"Professor Jamieson's lectures at the Bond Hall last week were largely attended. Freethinker and Christian, Jew and gentile, came from all parts of the county to hear him. As a public speaker he is a success; direct and forcible in his argument, dramatic in his actions, eloquent in his powers of expression, grand, poetic, sublime in his imagery, a speaker of wonderful magnetic influence. Though all who listened to his discourses did not believe in his doctrins, they could not deny the force of his arguments, and many in doubts and fears, tied down by the superstitions of their early teachings, had their eyes opened by the shining light of reason, and today are freemen, no longer the slaves to beliefs fastened on to them in their infancy, and strengthened by the force of habit."

Communications.

Sunday Sociables.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In the last Truth Seeker I find the following in a quotation from the Missouri Liberal: "The League, in its scope, could greatly outdo the church if it would only supply in its operations this social opportunity permanently, by organizing constructiv work that would interest, and occupy part of the Sundays and other days of recreation for Liberals and their children," and wish to say that we are already carrying out a similar idea in this city, as the following advertisment, which appeared among the "Sunday Services" in the Boston Sunday Herald, will show:

"Science and Freethought! The Ingersoll Secular Society hold their regular meeting in Paine Memorial (lower) Hall at 2:45. A grand sociable, with literary and musical entertainments, will be the order of exercises, and the Liberals of Boston and vicinity are invited to attend and enjoy the festivities. No day is too holy for happiness. Admittance free to all."

I desire to state, also, for the encouragement of other Liberal societies, that this Sunday sociable of ours was a grand success in every way, and that we shall hav them every few weeks hereafter.

With true Secularists, no day is too holy for happiness, and consequently philosophy and pleasure should be friends on Sunday as well as on any other day of the week, in societies that aim to secularize instead of religionize the human race.

Money.—No. II.

WHAT WILL CHANGE THE VALUE OF MONEY?

We hav already seen that the value of anything depends upon its utility, its scarcity, and the whims, fancies, and fashions of purchasers. The utility of money will always remain about the same, and, consequently its value will not change from any change in this respect. But the scarcity of money, or its amount per capita in circulation, is very variable in this country. During the last twenty years we hav had at one time, I think, as much as $56 per capita in circulation, and at another time it was reduced to about $14 per capita, and in December, 1879, it was $23.64 per capita. When money was $56 per capita, wheat was as cheap at $4 per bushel as it was at $1 per bushel when money was $14 per capita, for a man could buy fourteen bushels of wheat at $4 per bushel with $56, and he could buy no more with $14 and wheat at $1 per bushel. It is evident, therefore, that to double the quantity of money in circulation is equivalent to reducing the value of any given sum of money to one-half, or it may be said to be equal to taking one-half of every man's money from him and paying one-half of every man's debts. So, also, reducing the amount of money in circulation one-half is equivalent to doubling the value or amount of money in every man's possession, and to doubling every man's debts. If this be a true statement, what shall we say of the money we hav had for the last twenty years? May it not be compared to buying and selling goods with an India rubber yard measure?

People who imagin that gold has a uniform value are very much mistaken. An ounce of gold two hundred years ago would hav bought twelve times as much of all the necessaries and luxuries of life as it will do now, because there is about twelve times as much gold per capita in circulation now as there was then. If a mining company should discover a rich gold mine and put into the market $305,750,497—the amount of gold money in this country December, 1879—it would be equivalent to taking one-half of every man's gold money from him, as it would reduce its purchasing power to one-half, unless it should be shipped abroad. But, if the various mining companies throughout the world shall succeed in doubling the amount of gold money in the world, it will reduced its purchasing power throughout the world to one-half, and consequently the value of gold in every man's possession to one-half. Query: Would such an increase of gold be a blessing or a curse?

Again, Vanderbilt is said to be worth about $300,000,000. If he should buy up gold with this wealth, and send one-half of it out of the country, it would double the purchasing power of gold, and be equivalent to doubling the amount of gold in every man's possession. This again would be equivalent to reducing the gold price of everything in the country. If this be true, who shall say that we hav a good money in this country? Is a gold basis for money any better than a sand basis for a house? Who has the power to change the volume of the money per capita in circulation? When money is scarce, where is it? When it is plentiful, where did it come from? What causes the floods? and what causes the shallows?

During the war the government issued vast amounts of money and put it in circulation. This would hav nearly ruined the money kings if the government had not come to their relief. Many people think the government did wrong in legislating in favor of the money kings, but I shall show that the government did wrong in issuing money on the principle they did, and that they had no right to reduce the purchasing power of money by increasing its volume per capita. It was simply an act of robbery that cannot be justified. But when the government commenced the contraction of the currency, they increased the purchasing power of money; or, in other words, reduced the price of everything else, and a wail of suffering went up from the poor all over the land; but the government did not come to the relief of the poor as it did to the relief of the rich. They continued to burn the people's money, to increase every man's debts, and to reduce the price of every man's goods. The money kings then laughed with a fiendish grin, and the masses wept and went down to beggary and starvation by millions, like fish in a lake from which the water has been drained.

But the volume of the currency is contracted and expanded by banking corporations as well as by the government. It is one of the tricks of banking. Their harvest is during what we call hard times, and they know how to inaugurate hard times when they please. All they hav to do is to stop loaning, and say money is scarce, and as fast as it is paid in, lock it up in their vaults, and money will soon be scarce. Money is never scarce when there is plenty of it circulating among the people. When it is not circulating among the people, where is it? I can think of but one other place, and that is the bank vaults. Of course, when the government burnt more than a billion of dollars of paper money, that made it scarce at that time, but the banks do not burn it, and still they can make it scarce.

Is it safe for a people to giv corporations the power to control the volume of money in circulation? Is it safe for a people to giv corporations the power to increase or diminish the purchasing power of money at will? Is it safe for a people to giv corporations the power to fix the price of everything to suit themselvs? If not, we must hav a new system of banking. We must hav a money of more fixed value than gold or silver. We must hav a money whose value shall not change from year to year, nor from age to age.

To accomplish this we must hav a money that we can keep a uniform amount of per capita in circulation, and made of material that people will neither bury in the ground, nor send across the seas. It must also be made of a material that will not be affected by changes of fashions, or be demanded to gratify whims and fancies of people. In short, we want it made of a material that cannot be used for anything else. Jewelers can melt up gold money and take it out of circulation. So, also, can dentists. We must hav a material not liable to any such accidents.

Mr. Charles Watts on the Sabbath Question.

An article recently appeared in the Palladium, a journal having a large circulation in Canada in the interest of the working classes, in which the writer charges the Secularists with having made a mistake in including in their "demands" the abolition of the laws enforcing the religious observance of the Sunday. To this charge Mr. Watts replied in the following letter, which appeared in the Palladium of Saturday, Jan. 3d:

SECULARISM AND THE SUNDAY QUESTION.

To the Editor of The Palladium: My attention has been called to an article on "Sunday Labor" which appeared in the Palladium of Dec. 20th, wherein the writer mentions what he terms "the mistake of Secularism." This mistake is alleged to consist in the Secularists advocating the following:

"We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed."

While agreeing with much of the article in question, which in many respects is a most excellent one, the writer appears to me to have fallen into a "mistake" himself, and that of a very glaring character. For does he not see that the "demand" mentioned refers only to laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath, and not merely as a day of rest? It is its supposed "divine" or "sacred" character against which we protest, and not the opportunity it offers for relief from the toil of the other portions of the week. So far from Secularists having a desire to compel men to work seven days, they would oppose to the last such a despotic "mistake." In seeking to reform the present misuse of Sunday, we, as Secularists, show no favor to greedy, selfish employers, and my knowledge of workingmen induces me to believe that they can take care of their own interests when circumstances render it necessary for them to do so.

Should it be urged, however, that they are not sufficiently united to enable them to adequately protect themselves, my reply is, the sooner they recognize the importance of better union, and resolve to manfully carry out their duty in this respect, the better. It is undignified upon the part of any class of men to shun improvement just because they lack the energy to consolidate the power to secure it. The lesson of all history is that self-reform, based upon self-reliance, is the highest and noblest of all regenerating influences; and when the "hewers of wood and drawers of water" practically acknowledge this great truth, they need not fear the success of any attempt to unjustly deprive them of their rights. It is simply a half-hearted policy to refuse to remove one wrong because it is feared another evil will take its place. This is not the nature of the heroic conduct that won the reforms in the past. Faithfully directed, the power that wins success can maintain that success and protect it from the assaults of its enemies. In reference, then, to the alleged "mistake of Secularism," the case stands thus:

The existing laws bearing upon Sunday observance were passed in the interests of one class of the community, and hav proved to be inconvenient to a large section of the workingmen, and also to bear unjustly upon those members of society who do not accept the popular theology. The Secularists, therefore, plead for a reform of those laws, condemning, as they do, all class legislation. Surely this is no "mistake," from the workingman's point of view. Again must it be stated that Secularism does not seek to abolish Sunday as a day of cessation from labor, but only to divest it of its so-called sacred character, and thus leave its use, that is, the way in which it should be spent, to the judgment of the individual. Let it be a day of rest from the fatigue of bodily labor, refreshing to the poor man, and supplying him the means of reinvigorating his body and informing his mind. Such a day Secularists would hail as a boon to mankind. Indeed, to those who choose to devote it to religious purposes, there can be no objection to their doing so, only they must not insist upon regulating the way in which others who differ from them are to spend the day. If it be true that "the Sabbath was made for man," whatever sacredness attaches to it must spring from man, and the use to which he puts it for his own physical, moral, and intellectual good. Charles Watts,

First Vice-President of the American Secular Union.

Letters from Friends.

Richford, Vt., Dec. 28, 285.

Mr. Editor: I hav taken The Truth Seeker from its start in 1873, and hav never failed to pay in advance for it before. I am getting old and blundering. Am 85 years old, and am now living in Canada. I did not know till last week how I stood with you. I looked at the tab, and was surprised. I hav never been able to get more than a few three-months subcribers for your paper since I took it. I let every one read it who will, and also all my Liberal books. I hav scattered a dozen copies of Paine's "Age of Reason," but can't get subscribers for The Truth Seeker, although it furnishes more important real fact and information to me than any paper I ever saw. My own sons are not much interested in it. Truth seekers in earnest, and sober-thought readers, are very scarce. They are under the influence of the old blessed superstition, and do not care much about that, only for show and diversion. They seem to dislike anyone who questions the old faith and hypocrisy. If when we are dead we stay so, all right. If Spiritualism is true, we never die—we go to another country where we shall learn new habits and fashions. We expect to die in the faith we are taught. Priests tell us we shall lose our souls if we do not. Those who hav intellect enough to do something are fearful that they shall lose trade and caste, and those who hav small minds hav no time to read. So I hav plodded almost alone, and never expect to see any alteration in my neighbors. Age has almost used me up, so I think my paper, with which I hav been so highly entertained, may as well be stopped. A solemn thought: dear Bennett is gone, and my age reminds me that I cannot stay here long. That lovely man has furnished me with more information than all other men put together. I lamented his death most keenly. I hav his picture in several books. I hav a large pile of good old Truth Seekers to read and giv away. Go on, dear sir. I will try to help you by getting subscribers, but with a faint heart, because I hav tried and failed again and again. I hav tried to get some one to take my paper, so as to keep it up when I am gone, but no one will do it. I hav kept up courage; because I love The Truth Seeker so well myself I thought some one would want it. I hope it never will fail. I am glad to hear that so many intelligent men are laboring to sustain free thought, free speech, free press, and free mails, and wish that more giants like Col. Ingersoll would arise, and prove by the Bible itself that the Christian superstition is nothing but priestcraft, pride, pomp, show, and despotism. Oh, that all could learn to say, "We won't believe unless we hav evidence to convince our own sober judgment, beyond a doubt, that the proposed thing is a real fact."

Inclosed find $5, and if I can do anything for the good old Truth Seeker I will write you. Joseph Noyes.

Auburn, N. Y., Jan. 2, 1885.

Mr. Editor: The first number for 1885 of the glorious old "anchor-sheet" of Liberalism, universal mental freedom, and all that is beautiful, grand, and good for the soul of mankind, has just reached me, laden, as usual, with a bounteous supply of interesting reading from nearly all parts of the Freethought world. It is some time since I hav conversed with "my friend until death," from being very busy quite the whole time in life's great struggle for existence. However, since my last say, I hav gathered here and there along the wayside of life's thorny path, several trial subscribers, some of whom, having become so endeared to the paper, renewed for a continuous subscription. It was only by chance ten years ago, by picking up a cast-away half-sheet of The Truth Seeker that I was ushered into a new world by being through its influence, which carried at once conviction to my soul, "born again." Previous to this immaculate birth, for years I was in an embryonic state of doubt concerning the alleged truthfulness of what to me now is one of the greatest humbugs and established shams that ever cursed mankind—Christianity. It was this strayed half-sheet that "exploded the magazine," since which time I hav been growing, becoming redeemed, regenerated from the soul-destroying and intellect-perverting nightmare of a false and barbarian theology, whose god is but an incarnate autocrat, worse than whom no mind could ever conceive of. Oh, when will mankind cease worshiping the hocus-pocus product of a diseased mind? When will the human family turn to reason, truth, and wisdom? When will men and women study the true, the beautiful, and be wise? I see by the paper of this first number that J. E. Remsburg is to lecture the 8th and 9th at Montezuma, N. Y., only ten miles from this city, which pleasingly surprises me. This is nearer to the city than ever before that a Freethought lecture has been given. I hav just written Edward Ross of that place concerning Mr. Remsburg, and will endeavor to get the lectures advertised in our city papers. I hav in my note to Mr. Ross mentioned Mr. Remsburg's qualities as a speaker, his talent, the force of his arguments, and the convictions which they carry to his hearers in setting forth his great indictments against the church militant. I am confident Mr. Remsburg will leave a good impression with all who hear him, that he is arrayed with a wonderful amount of learning in relation to historical Christianity, that he is well acquainted with its ways, knows its purposes, and all in all is one of the most dangerous opponents the church has to-day.

Inclosed find $3 for renewal of my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1885.

Yours forever in the cause of truth, reason, and humanity,

VINELAND, N. J., Jan. 3, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Through THE TRUTH SEEKER, with your permission, I should like to ask Mr. Wettstein a few questions in reference to his communication in said paper of Dec. 13th.

Friend Wettstein, is it not possible you are mistaken in your opening statements? Does a particle of matter assume precisely the same form at two distinct given periods of time? Are you to-day exactly as you were yesterday? Are you absolutely certain that any form now in the universe had a beginning? If so, will you inform us where the material to begin with came from? Where, outside of the universe, can material be found to compose the human or any animal? And is it not in some form now in store for use when wanted? be it five thousand or five million of years from now. Are not all of us parts of the universe, and can one particle of the universe "die" or be "annihilated?" Has not all the matter, mind, and life that now is in the universe, always been in it in some form? Are not the root, leaf, and stem necessary to perfect the flowers? And is it not possible that a human body is necessary to perfect, or cause to blossom, a spirit body? We both agree that "eyes are necessary to sight." In 249, my family were in Ludlow, Vt.; I in Greenport, Long Island, N. Y. I dreamed I saw my three-year-old boy with a large gash in his forehead, looking pale and sick. In the morning after, I started for Vermont. I found the boy as I saw in the dream. In 255, I was in Gardiner, Me. I dreamed I was in a cemetery in Wallingford, Conn.; saw and coversed with a friend of my youth, whose body was buried in said cemetery many years before. I was with her at her grave and noticed minutely its location in the cemetery and shrubbery around it. Not long after this, I had occasion to go to said cemetery in company with my mother to identify some graves. Had found all but this one. My mother thought it was in a northwest direction; I northeast. We each followed our impressions; both were disappointed. In this condition the dream came to my mind. I turned, went southwest direct as I could to the grave, and found it as I saw it in my dream. Had it not been for the dream, in our limited time, I think we would not hav found it. In 256 I was in Gardiner, Me, alone in a room, sitting in front of a stove in a meditativ mood. I saw copies of three letters—the letters had been sent to me—maliciously purloined, copied, and restored to the place from where taken. They were folded in a sheet, third from the top, in the third drawer of a bureau directly back of me. I went directly to the drawer and found them as I saw them.

Now, as it requires "eyes to see," will you please tell me what eyes they were with which I saw these things? I confess I don't know. I could relate hundreds of like circumstances; but what eyes I saw them with has been, and is now, an unsolved mystery. Yours truly, A. BENNETT HOUGH.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Jan. 1, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: So long as I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER nothing has ever appeared over the name of Otto Wettstein that I hav not read and re-read with profit and pleasure, though not always agreeing with him, or in sympathy with his thought. Perhaps it is that his logic is too acute, and my range of thought is not comprehensiv enough to receive and assimilate his more extended and finished ideas.

Has he not tacked a little, and is he not getting off from that solid base on which he has claimed to stand? And is there a little only, or considerable, speculation and presumption when he says: "Every flower, tree, creature, every rock, world, sun, and system, at one time was not; and it is considered equally certain that at sometime in the future they will cease to be. All hav a beginning; are evolved from the eternal potencies of infinit matter; grow for a few moments, or for a few millions of years, then decay, disintegrate, and again mingle with other forces, only to resume again a link in the perpetual chain of growth and decay. The perpetuity of nature is dependent on this law?" (see TRUTH SEEKER, Dec. 13th, p. 791.)

An inference by some might be drawn that he meant annihilation, but he is too good a Materialist for that, in the sense that matter is indestructible, and cannot be annihilated. But to presume a time when the sun was not as it now is, and could cease to be, is a little vague, if nothing more.

It is impossible for the mind, with all the aids that science and philosophy can bring, to grasp and comprehend the thought (if thought it is) or idea, when suns and systems were not, and when they may cease to be; what could the sun be changed to, and where would it go, when it ceased to be what it now is? Again there are certain elements that are always associated with, and certain conditions that always surround, matter. It assumes form, and is ponderable, may be weighed, and locality and space are absolutely and always essential. The infinit is beyond the range of thought, and yet all can comprehend that space is infinit, and greater than matter, because suns and systems are located in space. And yet we can not see, feel, or understand what it is.

If we could go to the most distant star, sun, system, or nebula, we would be just as far from the bounds or limits as we are now. Figures cannot estimate the distance; and if it could be expressed, the mind would be unable to grasp it. To me it looks like a bold presumption, and I dare not try to think of a time when what we are pleased to call space was not, and, in so far as we can comprehend the incomprehensible, will not be. To speculate as to when the universe, or a part of it, was not, is vain, and the words beginning and ending hav no meaning when used in reference to those things. As to when life was not, and when it is supposed to hav begun, let us see what Mr. Darwin says when he speculates about those things. On page 66, "Descent of Man," we read, "In what manner the mental powers were first developed in the lower organisms is as hopeless an inquiry as how life originated." Again, page 428, "Origin of Species," "There is a grandeur in this view of life with its several powers, having been originally breathed by the creator into a few forms or into one." There are some who are a little curious to know what kind of a creator he believed in having such potency in his breath.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dec. 20th, editor's quotation, reads: "Evolution teaches that the animal kingdom evolved from the vegetable, and the vegetable from still lower forms of organic life, which life is traced back to protoplasm, mere specks of albumen floating on the oceans of antiquity." And of him I would inquire if that is in harmony, or at variance, with Mr. Darwin's breath theory?

It is apparent the great scientist himself had got in a dark place, and the light to him was about as dim as to ordinary and common mortals. He again says, "Descent of Man," page 66: "These are problems for the distant future, if they are ever to be solved by man."

There can be no harm in speculating on what is called the problem of the universe, taken as a whole or in sections, and many hav supposed Mr. Darwin has solved some of the sections, if not the whole. He is not very sanguin, and evidently in doubt himself. J. VAN DENBURGH.

GANANOQUE, Jan. 4, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. J. H. Cook, of Concordia, Kan., seems to imagin the shorthand system as the multum in parvo, and endeavors to impress on your readers that such system is the only one that leads successfully to a real healthful understanding of a debate, a lecture, or a sermon. With all due regard for our friend, T. C. Leland, who has done so much for Liberalism, knowing, as I do, the advantages to be derived from shorthand in the way of reporting, etc., I still beg to differ with Mr. Cook that shorthand, or phonography, is the best way of retaining our ideas of the subject we hear. For myself, and I don't speak for others, I can attend a lecture, debate, or a discussion, and twenty-four hours after sit down and chronicle, almost verbatim, a report of the proceedings. Can he do it? If he can, what need of shorthand. If he can not, let him practice his memory faculties, and, some day, he may find out that there are some people in this world who can write a full and complete account from the simple hearing without having recourse to a system which has only speed and facility to recommend it, and which has to take a side track when compared with a literal verbatim report, sent in at the conclusion of the debate or lecture (whatever it may be), and not officially verified as reports such as he has the pleasure to chronicle are subject to. He may say my reports are not correct. I can return the compliment, and say I can report, verbatim, twenty-four hours after hearing, a more faithful account than he can by phonography. S. K. TOLOGY.

OXFORD, N. S., Dec. 27, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: When will Liberals get over the too amiable weakness of giving honor where honor is not due; of giving honorary titles to all the members of the champion criminal class? Why say cardinal this, bishop that, reverend tother? Does not Mike McClosky, Paddy Ryan, Tim or Teddy Talmage, sound as well as Tom Paine, or Bob Ingersoll? To distinguish priests from honest, useful people, put a P after their names; that will stand for priest, pauper, or parasite. But when that raris avis, a worthy levite, heaves in sight, giv honor due. When the holy hypocrits turn up their eyes and howl their jeremiades about the damning increase of Infidelity and immorality, keep up the truer cry of the prevalence of Christianity and criminality, of religion and rascality. In England one of every 40 Baptists is a criminal; one of every 666 Dissenters; one of every 20,000 Infidels; probably about the same proportion holds good in America. World over, the less religion, the less crime. The popish priests are hard at work amongst you to get the uncontroled control of their full share of the public school taxes for their sectarian schools. Would it not be a just quid pro quo for Liberals to insist that the sects be taxed in proportion to the paupers they produce, and the criminals they manufacture? If papists, in consequence of their ignorance and uncultured or perverted reasoning faculties, are more turbulent than other people, if they half fill all public eleemosynary institutions, prisons, and reformatories, let the sect be taxed to maintain, to repress, reform, or punish its delinquents. If they wish to be a separate people for the purpose of miseducation, apply the principle to reformation or punishment. If medical men sought leave to inoculate all children with a poisonous specific disease, so they might hav good times ever after drugging and doctoring them, how mad we would be. Yet this is only what the priests ask—leave to poison the minds of innocent children so they may make an easy living out of them afterward, ministering to minds diseased.

You seem to be greatly exercised because Priest Capel says, in effect, that the popish faith makes people content to do any dirty drudgery for a paltry pittance, finding lots of consolation in their religion. And the Investigator folks are ditto, because Harry Beecher said "that a working man could keep a wife and six children on a dollar a day. A dollar would buy bread; water cost nothing; the man who could not liv and work on bread and water was not fit to liv." What is there to excite surprise here, only the rival sects bidding against each other for the countenance and support of the mighty and rich—those who want docil slaves—only the churches fulfilling their chief functions after making a soft thing for the priests to make soft-heads and slaves of the masses; to divert men's attention from the wrongs and evils here and now, and keep dreaming of bliss in the sweet by and by. The reformed faith is only a pup out of the old ruffianly Roman dog, with all the appetites and instincts of the savage old brute, slightly disguised with a mock liberality to suit the clime and temper of the times. The church that fails to cramp the intellect, to dwarf individuality, to make servil slaves of the many, will lose the favor of rulers and the rich. So Capel is only doing that which helps to butter his bread on both sides, when he flatters or forces Bridget to be happy washing pockethandkerchiefs, etc., and find consolation counting beads, and in mechanically mumbling stereotyped prayers. And Beecher, who knows what poverty is, having to scrub along, somehow, on $25,000 a year, and perquisits, for gabbling three or four hours per week part of the year, he, Harry, speaks for No. 1 when he says a dollar a day, bread and water, is good enough for working men.

"Trust in the Lord, forever trust,
And banish all your fears;
He'll send your wives nice sealskin sacks,
And clothe your hungry dears."

EARLVILLE, ILL., Jan. 1, 285.

MR. EDITOR: After wishing you a Happy New Year, I will now take my pen again for a few moments. I think I laid it down at Hayden Pond. I then soon went to Bangor on the Maine Central Railroad, passed through many villages that looked thriving and prosperous. The city of Bangor is a beautiful commercial town, with the advantages of navigation, but think they must be short of land, for they hav built their city market, Norembaga Hall, and their custom house all in the middle of Kenduskeag River, which was a novelty to me. I took a ride round through the city. I passed the court house and jail, was invited to stop at the jail and see two preachers they had cooped there for trial, but, as my time was limited at the depot, I was deprived of the privilege of seeing them. I then returned to Skowhegan, stopped a while to attend court and hear a murder trial that I was interested in, being slightly acquainted with both parties years ago. It grew out of a serenade after a wedding. He treated his friends to bullets instead of peanuts, but he was a good Christian, and said he worshiped at the Free Baptist church. I suppose he thought it no harm to kill his neighbor.

Poor health prevented me from stopping in Boston to see Paine's Memorial building, or going to New York to see the Bennett Monument, as I had intended, so my sight-seeing was cut short, and I returned to my friends. S. C. HILTON.

DENVER, IOWA, Dec. 30, 284.

MR. EDITOR: A Happy New Year to the Company, and to every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER. And here is $5 (if some post-office pirate don't steal it) to promote your happiness, and to apply to my subscription for your paper; and if I don't liv long enough to read it till the subscription expires, it will come good to those I leave. I am now in my sixty-third year, and hav, no doubt, already lived longer than some people wish; and I never did expect to liv long enough to receive, through the mail, a begging notice from a "Liberal" friend, saying if I didn't send him at least ten cents, he should consider me dead. Yet such a notice I received by the last mail; and I now beg leave to say to him, through THE TRUTH SEEKER, "I am dead. 'Now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace.'"

Of course I am well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER, and glad to see so many different ideas advocated therein. I take no fright because Liberals no not agree in everything, for that would be the end of progress. M. FARRINGTON.

DUCK LAKE, MICH., Dec. 30, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5, which you will please apply on my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Can't do without your paper yet; would be losing too much food for thought; must feed the mind as well as the body. The very unwise and partial financial policy of Congress or the money kings makes it very hard for the laboring class to do either, and I am one of that class; but, being a Greenbacker and a Freethinker, I must read something that tends to enlighten the minds of the people. The strength of the church is in the ignorance of the people, and as they become enlightened the church weakens. It is now a wicked power in the land. Please send me one of your blank petitions to Congress.

J. A. COURTRIGHT.

MERRICK, Jan. 1, 285.

MR. EDITOR: A Happy New Year to you and to the truth seeker family. Inclosed find fifteen dollars to be used as ordered. Freethought moves slowly here. There are many who are disgusted with orthodoxy, and don't care a snap about it, but too cowardly to speak out, and too infernal stingy to help the cause, some few excepted. There is a boy in this place by the name of Charles Heges, who has done some exploits during the past month that I must mention. He says he wants no God or Christ to help him. About the middle of December he saw a wild duck fly down in a brook; he ran with a pole and struck it, and killed it. On Christmas he saw a hawk come down by his father's barn, and catch a chicken. He ran and struck it with his fist as it went to fly, and knocked it down, then stamped on it and killed it. It measured twenty-nine inches from the bill to the tail, and fifty-two inches from tip to tip of its wings. E. HYATT.

EAST PORTLAND, OREGON, Dec. 18, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav seen in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 6th an article entitled "To Be Versus Not To Be," and I feel that a suggestion may be in order. The writer asks, Does death end all? Now, the question is, Did birth begin all? In case it did, and the world has been wagging along 5645 years, and the infant who comes into existence wants to exist until time is no more, it seems to me that some ought to mourn because they did not exist in the past. To me it seems just as hard that I hav not existed in the past as that after death I shall no more exist. To be plain in the matter, if we hav existed before we came to this existence, we will exist after death; if we were a new creation, we shall cease to be. Now, if any Spiritualist friend wants to prove that we will exist after death, let him prove that we hav existed before our birth.

I remain yours for reason, C. L. SILVERMAN.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Balance.

He counted out the clinking coin
And heaped it shining in the scale.
"A very goodly pile!" said he,
"These figures tell a pleasant tale."
And smiled to see the evening sun
Burn redly on the coin he spun.

"You are not covetous, good dame,
Else had you never seen my gold,
And yet I trow you scarce would scorn
This gleaming heap, if truth were told."
She laughed and shook her proud young head.
"A goodly pile, indeed!" she said,

"You love your yellow treasure, too,
I know, for—hark!" her fair cheek glowed.
"I too hav weighed my growing wealth—
The scale these selfsame numbers showed.
Yours is a pretty sum, and round,
Yet I can match it, pound for pound.

"Forsooth!" he cried, in merry scorn,
"Come, prithee bring the riches out,
That we may weigh them, 'pound for pound,'
And prove your word, beyond a doubt.
Unless so locked away they be
That you yourself hav not the key!"

"Nay, friend," she laughed, with happy eyes,
"I keep my treasure safely hid,
But not within the mouldy ground
Or underneath an iron lid.
I count it secretly apart,
And wear it always next my heart."

She caught her baby from the floor,
A creeping, cooing, dimpled thing,
That struggled in its mother's arms
To reach the gold, with lusty spring,
And babbled at the dazzling sight,
A wordless language of delight.

She pressed the velvet cheek to hers.
And kissed the silken, sunny head.
"Come, are you ready? shall we weigh
The treasure, pound for pound?" she said,
And then with tender triumph smiled,
And in the balance laid her child.

Sympathy.

All beings in life require sympathy, or love, and the absence of it will leave the heart dreary and sad indeed. When a feeling comes over a person which tells them that they are not much cared for by others, it creates a lonely state of the mind, and such person is led into solitude, and in time seeks relief in retirement from society and friends, and although often compelled to associate with others, will become as one dumb to life and its immediate surroundings. By a long-continued state of such feelings the life becomes introverted and shrinks from outward expression, and at last by its utter loneliness is led into the contemplation of suicide. This last stage will only take place after the person has become melancholy, by which is meant a disease of an organ called the melt, which becomes swollen and painful. The examination by physicians of such cases has led to these conclusions, and establishes the fact that for every state of the mind there is to a great extent a bodily condition which corresponds to it.

The disease may originate by and through a bodily injury, or it may come from a purely mental state, and in time the mind will act upon the body until disease of some kind sets in and preys upon some part of the system which at the time is the weakest, until at last a chronic form takes possession, and the patient is encompassed by some branch of the great army of General Debility.

The above enumerated train of evils may all be avoided by extending to such dejected ones a few well-directed impulses of sympathy—a nice expression of love. They require and demand it at our hands. It is a duty we owe humanity to look about us and seek out the sorrowful countenance, the dejected and lonely one, and infuse the love of our natures into the soul life of the sufferer, for such are real sufferers. There is no language that can adequately express the utter worthlessness of life, which is felt by such suffering mortals.

To lose our interest in life is to lose all that life is meant to subserve. Surrounded by all the luxuries of wealth, and destitute of the love and sympathies of our associates, is to be the poorest of the poor.

How often hav persons been induced to feign sickness in order to see whether indeed anyone cared for them, and what a cheerfulness has settled upon the soul of such, when words of sympathy and acts of kindness were bestowed upon them! Can we blame the little strategic act, when we reflect that the person was almost famished for a few crumbs of comfort?

To illustrate: Upon one occasion, on a visit to my friends, I met such an ill-conditioned and neglected child, which, from time to time, had been more or less buffeted about, devoid of kind words or gentle acts of kindness, until a chronic indifference had set in, and she was regarded as too peculiar to associate with by the rest of the family. It required only a glance to satisfy me that here was a case for the exercise of sympathy, and accordingly, withdrawing my attentions for a time from the other portions of the family, I made an especial effort to concentrate all my attentions upon this neglected one.

It was a dreary, blustering, and stormy day; the snow was driving and pelting and whirling about, so that the sparrows were constantly flitting from place to place and could get nothing to eat. Seeing this, I said, "Kitty, come here; you and I will hav some fun; we will feed the sparrows; see, they can't find anything to eat, and how cold they look; the fierce wind is blowing up their warm coat of feathers and making them so cold; let us sweep away the porch and put some bread crumbs into the old pan for them." She said, in a languid tone, "Do you like sparrows?" "Why, yes; aren't they nice little birds?" "They are nice enough, I think, but George and Harry say they are, 'nasty little Englishmen.' They are driving all our birds away, and they are constantly hollowing out 'Chip, chip, chip,' and nothing else."

"That is because they cannot say anything else. If you wanted to say something to express your gladness, and could say nothing but 'Chip, chip,' I guess you would be chip, chipping about just as the sparrows do; but you see they do not even say 'chip, chip,' to-day. They are so cold and cheerless; no one has shown them any attention, and they are hungry and nearly freezing."

Before the last words were finished, she caught the feelings of sympathy I was manifesting for the sparrows, and, forgetting all the naughty things to be said against them; she flew out to get the old broom and the basin, and while I was sweeping off the snow and clearing a place, she was busy mashing bread crumbs fine enough to giv them each as much as they wanted.

It was great fun for us to look out of the window and see the great caution exercised by them in approaching the old pan. They would turn their heads aside, and look at us, apparently, with one eye, while they had the other upon the food. At last one, bolder than the rest, bounced into it, and flew out with a pretty large piece of bread, and immediately every one followed it, and fought one and another until it all disappeared. While the birds were acting, I was moralizing. I said: "How plainly that illustrates human life! The pan is filled with crumbs, to which each one might go, but in their greedy natures they will all follow the one who was courageous enough to help himself, and try to rob him, and that is just what people are doing with one another, instead of applying themselves industriously and honestly to obtain from nature's storehouse all the food and comforts we need, they are trying to rob each other."

At last one and another gained courage and bounced into the pan, until it contained more than a dozen at a time, and their heads and tails kept a bobbing up and down, and they were knocking each other off the rim, as if each feared it would not get all there was in the pan. At last, when they could not eat any more, they sat around looking at the old pan, seemingly to see which would get hungry first. They occasionally indulged in a discussion over their good luck, and may hav been trying, in their sort of religion, to thank the providence that placed the pan of food before them, but the only thing they uttered was "Chip, chip." The full stomach had opened their mouths, and they gave us their best music.

Kitty had been taught to regard the sparrows with little concern, but when she saw that I took such delight in feeding them she was much pleased, and she had an attraction in me that kept her constantly by my side. Some of the others, becoming jealous, wanted to shake her off and tear her from me, but to this I kindly but firmly objected. I told them that Kitty was their little sparrow, which they should feed with crumbs of affection, and when she returned their kindness, they would feel as happy as we all did to see the sparrows enjoy their feast. Kitty promised me to feed them every day during the cold weather.

When I took my leave, she was the last to let go, and when chided for holding on so stoutly, until the big tears started in her blue eyes, she said: "I know Mr. P. likes me, and I don't want him to go; I want him to help feed the sparrows to-morrow." The touching manner in which she said it, and the delicate shake of her voice, told as plainly as could be that the poor child had found one with whom to sympathize, and that she had taken a new and a keen interest in life. I need not say that I inwardly shed tears of affection for that neglected and lonely child of misfortune, and poured out my warmest love and blessings upon her. Let us all make an effort to feed the human sparrows. P.

ENIGMA.

In both the river and the rill,
Rut not in mountain or in hill;
In Sahara's drifting sand,
Not in pyramids that stand;
In the city's rushing crowd,
Not in the grave, nor in the shroud;
In hurricane and in cyclone,
But never in a dead calm known;
In the pendulum and wheels,
Nor face nor case the spell reveals;
In rolling car, or coach, or hack,
But not in street or railroad track.
Six letters spell the word I mean,
A common noun it will be seen.

"A CORD OF LETTERS."

"Cords of letters," you declare,
You could write were "time to spare."
A cord-ial welcome they should find
Ac-corded to them in my mind.
A chord deep in this heart of mine
Would vibrate to each word, each line.
A cord of prose or poet-tree
Would be a gracious sight to see.
Pleasant-trees laid up so square,
If you just had time to spare;
No bigot-tree in all the "cord,"
Nor sophis-tree in any word;
Its symme-tree made up of good,
Oh, girlie, don't I wish you would!

CHARADE.

Complementary to a Complimentary Charade, No. 3, of Dec. 13th.

A woman's name is in my mind,
Which I would hav our posers find;
'Tis Hebrew for a Lily.
Reverse the name, and then it shows
A Latin name that means the nose.
I'm yours as ever, BILLY DOUX.

CHARADE.

My first bears a cross like a priest,
A miracle stamped on its breed.
Since Jesus once rode on the beast,
The cross on its back,
Is a "record in black,"
That the Christian can read
("Though a wayfaring man or a fool")
On his mule,
Or his jack.

Dear, sure-footed Donkey, your cross
Is no miracle faith must expound,
For zo-ogenists are at no loss
Your "birth-mark" to trace
To its own proper place
Where zebras and quaggas abound,
Whose curious markings and stripes,
Its first types,
They hav found.

You never saw angels, or spoke;
By no God was inspired of yore;
I must set these things down as a joke.
You never went third
With St. Peter's bird,
When thrice he crew ere the morn awoke;
And the only angels of wrath
In your path,
Are men-folk.

But jokes, and fancy, and love are free,
Only are food and clothing dear;
And while I am doubting a wonder I see,
A second head sprouts,
In spite of these doubts,
And affixed to my first, doth appear,
But this makes my second part less,
I confess,
And agree.

And now a reversible two-headed beast,
With its latter head set upon art;
Yet neither is skill, wit, or virtue increased,
For I'll tell you in time,
My whole is a crime;
And all of the heads and the heart
Of this curious creature we name,
Are the same
I impart.

Its a "Trespass by grubbing up trees—"
Old law—I'll amend it now quite;
Dig Bigot-tree, Sophis-t-ee out, if you please;
Let Poet-tree stand,
With Symme-tree grand,
Love's Minis-trees bloom for delight;
Geome-tree, Chemis-tree, these Everyone sees
Are all right.

Correspondence.

DEAR YOUNG FRIENDS: That imperturbable old Turk, Rekab Semaj, sat smoking his pipe, and stroking his beard as if perfectly satisfied with the world in general, and himself in particular. You would hav said that the explosion of forty tons of nitro-glycerin could not much disturb his serenity had you seen him sitting so placidly there while a little mob of children clattered around him, begging and clamoring that he should tell them the answer to his "Melodious Puzzle."

Willie tipped his chair, Maud pulled his beard, and Artie snatched his pipe, but still he looked as placid as a pond of oil.

"It's too bad! It's too bad! Do tell us," cried Bessie.

"Hold!" said Semaj; "if you say it's too bad again, I'll make you giv the answer yourselvs."

"It's too bad—b-a-d—b-a-a-d," vociferated that incorrigible little mob in concert; but just as Bessie was saucily drawing out the word "b-a-d," Semaj quickly but gently patted her rosy lips with his open hand.

"By my beard!" said Semaj, "you hav answered it yourself! Like a true Turk, your 'Ah' is changed to 'Allah,' and your 'b-a-d' to 'b-alla-d.'" So she had! Try it yourselvs, my chicks! As you are in the act of pronouncing the vowel of 'bad,' gently, quickly, but decidedly buffet the lips with the open hand, and you will hear yourselvs say 'ballad' very distinctly.

Hurrah for Rekab Semaj, and may he never lose his beard! YOUR UNCLE JAMES.

MISS WIXON: I must tell you about the Literary. I am director of our school district, and we hav a good schoolhouse, a Liberal young man for teacher, and a very good school. The scholars hav a "Literary" every Friday evening. The exercises consist of singing, reading, declamations, essays, debates, and the reading of their paper, the Little Acorn, of which our Katie and Charley are editors. It is all the work of the children, and I'll declare it surpasses what one might expect from mere children. They call themselvs "The Rising Star," and they hav a badge, a red star, made from card-board, and worn on the breast. It was the former teacher, now married, Mrs. Jessie Sweeting (our Jessie, in age between Marie Louise and Mrs. N. B. Snow), who first organized and inspired them with the finest esprit du corps I ever saw. There are many interesting things to be said of them that I fear to begin lest I never end. As I am deaf, I will confine myself to the Little Acorn. Here is circumlocution:

"Mr. Cushing told Greeley that Charles Sweeting told him that his wife said that Professor Whitney (the teacher) said that he heard Nora Jackson tell Willie Palmer that Dora told her that Katie Baker said that Maud Clark said that Forest told her that Stanton Van Vliet told Bessie Farrell it was a pleasant evening last Friday night. Stanton, is that true?" A cut at S. V. V.'s being "slow of speech" in the presence of his inamorata. Greeley, that child of tribulation, comes in for a hit or two. Eva Cushing, about G.'s age, and a very pretty little girl, livs not nearly in a direct line from our house to the school-house; but it is given out on his authority that the nearest way home is by Cushing's. Again:

"Who stops at Cushing's door for her,
Of candy has a store for her?
Who'll shortly get some more for her?
Who says he'd spill his gore for her?
Ask Greeley Baker.

"What makes somebody smile so sweet
Whenever enters S. Van Vliet?
Who kindly offers half her seat,
And seems so pleased her friend to meet?
Ask Bessie Farrell."

But I am forgetting that it takes nearly as much time to read as write a letter. Well, if it grows tedious, you can stop when you please. Forgiv the infliction. Yours, J. K. P.B.

Obituary.

IN MEMORY OF BABY GRACIE.

Little sister, thou hast left us,
And our hearts are lonely now,
But though shadows fold about us.
Care shall never mar thy brow.

Scarcely had the sun arisen
On the morning of thy life,
Ere death came to take our baby
From this world of ceaseless strife.

Purest ray of golden sunshine,
Ours to hold for one brief hour,
Love could no longer keep thee,
Death was stronger than our power.

We will lay thee in the springtime
Where shall bloom the summer flowers,
While we mourn for thy departure,
'Tis thy gain—the loss is our.

Poetry.

Right and Wrong.

The manner in which it is done
  Has a great deal to do with the evil.
There is nothing under the sun
  In which you may not cheat the devil.

God's elect may knock balls on the green,
  In that innocent game of croquet;
But if with a cue playing billiards they're seen,
  'Tis a sin most improper, they say.

If sounds of sweet music come soft on the air,
  With one foot good time you may keep;
But if both feet are used*, O sinner beware,
  For you never can go with the sheep.

For a secular purpose a man uses beans;†
  Twenty dollars and costs is the fine;
But sanctify beans, you then find the means
  To pay preachers for service divine.

Dear friend, you must never buy wine by the glass
  At low places where liquors are sold;
On the lightning express to the devil you'll pass,
  In Gehena you'll soon be enrolled.

But go to the temple of God for a drink;
  Get sanctified wine called the blood.
(That the blood of your savior is good, I don't think, Nor his body adapted for food.)

Toronto, Ont. JOHN HAIGHT.

*That's dancing.

†E. King Dodd was fined in Toronto some time ago for sealing up a quanuity of beans in a glass dish; each competitor paid a certain sum and guessed how many beans the dish contained. A prize was offered to the one coming the nearest to the correct number. Mr. Dodd got the idea at a church fair.

A Clerical Witness.

There was a little personal difficulty on Livingston street the other day between two citizens, to which a Brooklyn clergyman was the only eye witness. The principles were reticent about the affair, and the divine was solicited to make a statement.

"Your information is correct, sir. Yes, sir, your information is correct," he said to an Eagle reporter. "I was standing on an adjacent curbstone, and I think I may safely say I saw it all. An unfortunate affair, sir, very."

"What was it about?" asked the reporter.

"That, sir, I hav not been able to ascertain. I hav made a few inquiries, but my investigations are without satisfactory results."

"Did one of them insult the other?"

"Different men put different constructions upon words. I would not like to say that any affront was intended. I will say, though, that the language was not scriptural."

"Were there any blows struck?"

"It seems to me that there was smiting involved in the controversy."

"Which one struck first?"

"I don't think I am prepared to say who inaugurated the assault. It may hav been one, and it may hav been the other?"

"Did the assaulted man strike back?"

"He may hav done so. I will take the responsibility of saying that, very likely, he did. Men under the influence of carnal anger are prone to smite when smitten."

"Did they fall down?"

"I don't know whether they fell or were thrown down. I saw them on the sidewalk together; locked in close embrace and striving with prodigious strength."

"Didn't you try to separate them?"

"I spoke to them and asked them to refrain from such an unseemly display of violence. But they heeded not. Their passions were strong upon them. I told them that I might hav to invoke the constabulary if they did not desist."

"What did they say?"

"They made a few remarks about the constabulary that I did not deem germane."

"Were they punching each other all the time?"

"There was much violence constantly exhibited and much anger displayed."

"Which whipped in the end?"

"I incline to the opinion that our deacon had the advantage of the opposing deacon. In fact, I might say that our deacon chastised the other deacon severely, though I hear that he and the members of his church claim that our deacon was worsted. Not so, not so! I am not well versed in such contests, but I should say from my observation that our deacon, providentially, perhaps, was on top during the greater portion of the time. In fact, to use the language of our deacon in a moment of intense exeitement and subsequent to the battle, he whaled the stuffing out of the other deacon."—Brooklyn Eagle.

"Bible Morals."

TWENTY CRIMES AND VICES SANCTIONED BY SCRIPTURE. BY JOHN E. REMSBURG.

"A good missionary document," as one has said of it, and that is just what it is, and I am very glad the matter it contains is put in this neat pamphlet form for daily use and distribution.

Mr. Remsburg, whom I remember as a modest, unassuming, scholarly gentleman, never opens his mouth to speak but to some wise purpose, has given in "Bible Morals" precisely what we hav all along wished for—a neat, concise, compact statement of facts—Bible facts—with reference to book, verse, and chapter. After respectful mention of that which is really true and beautiful in the Bible, Mr. Remsburg goes on to show twenty horrible crimes and vices—and they are among the worst in the calendar—that are upheld and sanctioned by scripture, and which prevent him, and should prevent everybody, from accepting the Holy Bible as an infallible moral guide.

The good things of that book are always held up for our contemplation, but we never hear of the crime and villainy within its pages unless some brave reformer brings them to the light, and then he is called "Infidel." We need to hav these texts showing the wickedness of the "Book of Books" at our tongue's end for use in argument, but we cannot do that always; we can, however, hav at a trifling expense this little book at our right hand, and it is a perfect jewel to anyone who desires truth and morality to prevail in spite of falsehood and all its kindred evils. For one, I am truly thankful to Mr. Remsburg for all his care and trouble in writing and compiling it. When not in my pocket, it will hav a conspicuous place on my table, and when one attempts to tell me what a good book the Bible is, I shall just pick up "Bible Morals," and in the twinkling of an eye I will show him the kind of food the "good old Bible" contains. In less than five minutes he will be so sick and ashamed he won't know what to do, and will go away a sadder but wiser man or woman, as the case may be, and never disturb me with scripture quotations again. Let every one get this little gem of a book, a dozen or more, if he can, read and circulate, and he or she will thus be an instrument in humanity's hands, of shedding light in dark places, of sowing seeds of truth that shall make the world wiser, better, and brighter than before. SUSAN H. WIXON.

A CARD TO MR. REMSBURG.

SIR: Your "Bible Morals," forwarded by you from Canada, is the best exposition I hav ever yet seen of the beauties of the Christian's fetich book. I wish a copy could be placed in the post-office box of every clergyman and Christian in the world. Sinners do not need the book; it is the saints, who do not read their Bibles, who are dying for lack of the information it contains. Nevertheless, sinners should furnish it to the saints, so I trust the book will hav a large sale, a wide distribution, and an extensiv reading.

Truly yours, ELLA E. GIBSON.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav read the above work by John E. Remsburg, and hav also heard him deliver the same, and I wish that every Christian in the world could do likewise. I do not believe that any man or woman could still believe in the scriptures after. They might say they did, but I do not believe they would be sincere. Anyone can see that Remsburg is a Bible student as well as a Bible unbeliever. He shows that God and his chosen leaders were in favor of, and participated in, the worst crimes that are now in our list, and the founder of the Church of England, when advised to practice polygamy, avoided it by divorcing two wives and killing two more. I would advise every one to buy a copy of the book, which only costs 25 cents, and have it for handy reference, and to lend their Christian neighbors, and thus help our good cause along.

Boston. REMLY S. SIDELINGER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav the pleasure of reading the apostle of truth, John E. Remsburg's, "Bible Morals," and must truly say Kersey Graves's mantle rests upon him. He has not only mowed, but raked after, and the gleanings deserve unquenchable fire.

Bibleites object to selecting the immoral passages. I ask, what are they in the infallible word for? If it is God's word, why does it speak with such discordant tongue? Why are so many interpreters all at variance about its meanings?

How is it possible for the human mind to have been so long defrauded with such a mixture of incoherent contradictions, is past my comprehension.

Why is it that a book of uncertain authorship, the contents of which (some of it) is revolting to enlightened reason, has been the fortress of the church, the hangman of freemen, the despoiler of human happiness?

Ingersoll says he will join the church when a faith-eater takes the dose he fixes for him, and survives. If the church wants such a champion, here is the chance. When I see a man walk on water when the mercury is above thirty-two, I will kick off the steamer, as Jonah did the whale, and keep him company.

Go on, Brother John, "For men in earnest hav no time to waste in patching fig-leaves for the naked truth."

"Much in the Bible which I love and bless,
I could love more if God I could love less."

Yours, for truth against error,

ELIJAH MYRICK.

What Objections to Christianity? A discussion between D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR, divided into the following theses: 1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion.
2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.
3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.
BENNETT affirms; MAIR denies. This is an exhaustiv discussion. Price, $1.50.

PROSE POEMS

And Selections,

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued.

It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author.

The work is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it.

In the more elegant styles of binding, this volume is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

In workmanship the volume is a masterpiece. The type is large and beautiful; the paper heavy and richly tinted; the press work faultless; and the binding, as perfect as the best materials and skill can produce. The book is quarto in size, and contains 248 pages. No item of expense has been spared to make the work worthy of author and public.

PRICES:

Silk-cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side,	$2 50
Half-calf, mottled edges, elegant library style,	4 50
Full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitely fine,	7 50
Full tree calf, highest possible style and finish,	9 00

Something for Invalids to read and study over.—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

Ah! but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would not submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we hav treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all form of chronic invalidism.

Gems of Thought.

IT is not difficult to spend one hour in the day in pursuit of that which we know is high and worthy, which will improve our status in life; and what we can do for one hour we can do for the entire day; what we can do for a day, we can do for a month, for a year, and for a lifetime. Life is made up of breaths, of inhalations and exhalations, and while taking a breath any person can perform his duty, and not fall short in it; and what he could do while taking one breath he can do while taking a thousand. Perfection, however, is not to be expected from human beings. Slight mistakes are almost inevitable, but with a settled purpose to pursue the right course and to do wrong to none, one's life may be passed in doing much good, and very little harm. —D. M. Bennett.

FOR hundreds of years, miracles were about the only things that happened. They were wrought by thousands of Christians, and testified to by millions. The saints and martyrs, the best and greatest, were the witnesses and workers of wonders. Even heretics, with the assistance of the devil, could "suspend the laws of nature." Must we believe these wonderful accounts because they were written by "good men," by Christians, "who made their statements in the presence and expectation of death?" The truth is that these "good men" were mistaken. They expected the miraculous. They breathed the air of the marvelous. They fed their minds on prodigies, and their imaginations feasted on effects without causes. They were incapable of investigating. Doubts were regarded as "rude disturbers of the congregation." Credulity and sanctity walked hand in hand. Reason was danger. Belief was safety. As the philosophy of the ancients was rendered almost worthless by the credulity of the common people, so the proverbs of Christ, his religion of forgiveness, his creed of kindness, were lost in the mist of miracle and the darkness of superstition.—R. G. Ingersoll in the Christian Religion.

IN the latter part of his "Life of Johnson" we meet phrases in which Boswell is evidently aping the true Johnsonian style. So, for example, when somebody distinguishes between moral and physical necessity, Boswell exclaims, "Alas, sir! they come both to the same thing. You may be as hard-bound by chains when covered by leather as when the iron appears." —Leslie Stephens's Johnson.

FROM the dependence of mental activity on the brain—with whose growth and development it unfolds itself, decreasing again as the latter dwindles away in old age, and likewise in any affection caused by its disease or injury, Carl Vogt has undauntedly concluded that the admission of a special spiritual substance is a pure hypothesis; that not a single fact points to the existence of such a substance; and that, moreover, the introduction of this hypothesis is utterly useless, as it explains nothing, brings nothing more forcibly before us.—Strauss's Old and New Faith.

AGUR said, "Giv me neither poverty nor riches;' and this will ever be the prayer of the wise. Our incomes should be like our shoes; if too small, they will gall and pinch us, but if too large, they will cause us to stumble and to trip. But wealth, after all, is a relativ thing, since he that has little and wants less is richer than he that has much and wants more. True contentment depends not upon what we hav, but upon what we would hav; a tub was large enough for Diogenes, but a world was too little for Alexander.—Colton's Lacon.

IT'S no in Bibles nor in rank;
It's no in wealth, like Lon'on bank,
To purchase peace and rest.
It's no in making muckle mair;
It's no in books; it's no in laer,
To make us truly blest.

If happiness hae not her seat
And center in the breast,
We may be wise, or rich, or great,
But never can be blest.

Nae pleasures nor treasures
Could make us happy lang;
The heart's aye the part aye
That makes us right or wrang.
—Burns's Epistle to Davie.

THE situation that has not its duty, its ideal, was never yet occupied by man. Yet here, in this poor, hampered, despicable actual, where thou even now standest, here, or nowhere, is thy ideal; work it out, therefore; and working, believe, liv and be free. Fool! the ideal is in thyself, the impediment is in thyself, too. Thy condition is but the stuff thou art to shape that same ideal out of; what matters whether such stuff be of this or that, so the form thou giv it be heroic, be poetic? O thou that pinest in the imprisonment of the actual and criest bitterly to the gods for a kingdom wherein to rule and create, know this of a truth: the thing thou seekest is already with thee, "here or nowhere," couldst thou only see!—Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.

VIRTUE? a fig! 'Tis in ourselvs that we are thus, or thus. Our bodies are our gardens; to the which, our wills are gardeners; so that if we will plant nettles, or sow lettuce; set hyssop, and weed up thyme; supply it with one gender of herbs, or distract it with many; either to hav it steril with idleness, or manured with industry; why, the power and corrigible authority of this lies in our wills.—Shakspere's Othello.

FOR what is glory but the blaze of fame,
The people's praise?—if always praise unmixed—
And what the people but a herd confused,
A miscellaneous rabble, who extol
Things vulgar, and scarce worth the praise?
They praise and they admire, they know not what,
And know not whom, but as the one leads the other;
And what delight to be by such extolled,
To liv upon their tongues, and be their talk,
Of whom to be dispraised were no small praise?—
His lot who dares be singularly good!
The intelligent among them, and the wise,
Are few, and glory scarce of few is raised.
—Milton's Paradise Regained,

THE proper study of a wise man is not how to die, but how to liv.—Spinoza.

The political aim of THE TRUTH SEEKER is to enforce the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

In philosophy, THE TRUTH SEEKER advocates the upbuilding of a rational system that shall lead to better lives on the part of the people, and that shall yield to its adherents all the social and emotional enjoyments of the churches, without any mixture of superstition, or the use of rites and ceremonies degrading to manhood and womanhood. This philosophy must be a growth, an evolution from lower forms, and this growth THE TRUTH SEEKER hopefully fosters. It is, therefore, both destructive and constructive.

Among the contributors to THE TRUTH SEEKER are the most eminent men and brilliant writers in the Liberal ranks of the United States, including Courtlandt Palmer, Charles Watts, T. B. Wakeman, S. P. Andrews, T. C. Leland, C. B. Reynolds, S. P. Putnam, J. E. Remsburg, W. S. Bush, Elliott Preston, John Peck, J. L. York, Susan H. Wixon, Helen Gardener, Mrs. Slenker, and many other able men and women. THE TRUTH SEEKER also makes a feature of reprinting the ablest English essayists and philosophers, and during 1884 has given its readers several papers from the pens of Frederic Harrison and Herbert Spencer. The home contributors are legion, and the communications embrace the widest possible range of subjects—religious, philosophic, Anarchistic, Socialistic, land reform, tariff and political reform.

EVERY LIBERAL IN THE COUNTRY WANTS THE TRUTH SEEKER.

DEPARTMENTS:

In the League Department is recorded the news of the National Liberal League, furnished to our columns by the secretary, and other officers of the National and auxiliary Leagues.

We also have an able correspondent in Canada, who furnishes weekly news of the Freethought movement in that dominion.

Our Children's Department is edited by one of the best and most successful writers for children in the United States. Miss Susan H. Wixon is widely known, not only in the Freethought ranks, but as a writer for popular papers and magazines. We have from all sides the strongest testimonials to the efficiency of her work in THE TRUTH SEEKER. She will continue the Department through 1885.

Through the department of "Letters from Friends" hundreds of subscribers have made pleasant acquaintances and lasting friendships. Its two pages are a place for exchange of thoughts, relation of experiences, and whatever the friends of Freethought find occasion to say. This department is a "talk together" of great and varied interest.

One subscription with one new subscriber, in one remittance,	5 00
One subscription with two new subscribers, in one remittance,	7 00

It is thus seen that any of our friends who will take the trouble to get a new subscriber at the regular rate ($3), will get his own for $2; by getting two new subscribers he will get his own paper for $1; by getting three new subscribers he will not only get his own free, but will have fifty cents left to pay cost of money order; by getting four new subscribers he will have his own free and gain $2.

This makes THE TRUTH SEEKER, with its sixteen large pages, cheaper than any other Liberal paper. If anyone chooses, or if by so doing he can easier secure partners in taking the paper, he can share with them the advantages of the club rates.

Odds and Ends.

A GEORGIA man has paid for a farm with the melons off it, to say nothing of the struggling young doctor he has firmly established in business.

AN old maid in Nashville keeps a parrot which swears and a monkey which chews tobacco. She says between the two she doesn't miss a husband very much.

HE (solemnly): You had a very narrow escape last night, Miss Julia. She: Mercy, what do you mean? He: Well, you see, I had a dream about you. I thought I was just about to kiss you when a Chinaman rapped at the door. She (after a pause): The Chinese must go.

THERE is a boy in Springfield, Mass., who is dropping himself all over the state. He has left a thumb at his grandmother's in Salem, two fingers with his uncle's mowing machine in Norway, half a foot at a relativs near Lowell, and three teeth in Boston. That boy is going to take up a good deal of the Angel Gabriel's time on resurrection day.

HERE is an old "chestnut" that should be started on its travels again: "A duel was lately fought in Texas by Alexander Shott and John S. Nott. Nott was shot, and Shott was not. In this case it is better to be Shott than Nott. There was a rumor that Nott was not shot, but Shott avows that he shot Nott, which proves either that the shot Shott shot at Nott was not shot, or that Nott was shot notwithstanding. Circumstantial evidence is not always good. It may be made to appear on trial that the shot Shott shot shot Nott, or, as accidents with firearms are frequent, it may be possible that the shot Shott shot shot himself, when the whole affair would resolve itself into its original elements, and Shott would be shot, and Nott would be not. We think, however, that the shot Shott shot shot not Shott but Nott. Anyway, it is hard to tell who was shot."

A VERY little girl, who is often rebuked for being noisy, asked her mother the other day, "Mamma, when little girls die they go to heaven, don't they?" "Yes, dear," replied the mother. "And don't they hav wings and white robes?" "Yes." "And crowns?" "Yes." "And harps? Do they hav harps?" "Yes, dear." Then, after a long meditativ pause, "Will they let them play the harps?"

"YES, dear children," said Deacon Buckrag, addressing the Sunday-school, "if we are dutiful and good and—and conscientious, and—er truthful in this world, we shall all meet together in Paradise." The deacon is a good man, but not much of a talker. "Now, children," he went on, "I want you all to tell me, every one of you, where we will meet again if we are good and dutiful and conscientious." No response. "Come," he said kindly, "some of you must certainly know. It begins with a P. P—p?" "Oh, I know," exclaimed a little girl on one of the back benches; "it's purgatory."

A POPULAR minister was asked the other day how it was possible for him to preach a new sermon every Sunday year after year, and to find something new to say. "Doesn't it giv you a great deal of thought and trouble?" "Oh, no!" was the reply. "It's a mere matter of habit. My sermons hav never kept me awake five minutes." "Ah!" said the other; "that, then, is probably the reason why they don't keep other people awake either." The ensuing silence was both chilling and embarrassing. Some people never know when it is inadvisable to joke.

THE writer attended church last Sunday evening, and learned more about Francis Asbury, the first Methodist Episcopal bishop in America, than he would hav learned by reading Watts's hymns clean through. The discourse was an eloquent one, and the disconrser became infused with the military spirit of the good old bishop. "In considering such characters as the Duke of Wellington, Washington, and Francis Asbury," said he, "I feel thrilled to the very bottom." Perhaps he meant to add, "of my heart," but he didn't; and then, again, perhaps he meant just what he said. The peroration caused some smiles, but no levity.—Peok's Sun.

SHE turned the music softly o'er,
Her lovely color came and went.
She tossed her jaunty hat aside,
And sat before the instrument.
The ivory keys her ivory hands
Touched with a master touch, the while
With sweetest voice she sang that sweet
Old song, "I'm sitting on the stile."

He softly stole within the room,
To hear her sing; entranced he sat
Upon the most convenient chair,
The chair which held her jaunty hat.
She turned and looked with anguish'd eyes;
He turned and looked with sickly smile;
Beheld the ruin he had wrought,
And said, "I'm sitting on the style!"

YOU can always tell a boy whose mother cuts his hair by the way he stops in the street and wriggles his shoulders. When a fond mother has to cut her boy's hair she draws the front hair over his eyes and leaves it there while she cuts that which is at the back. The hair which lies over his eyes appears to be surcharged with electric needles, and that which is silently dropping down under his collar-band appears to be on fire. She has unconsciously pushed his head forward until his nose presses his breast. In the mean time he is seized with an irresistible desire to blow his nose, but he recollects that his handkerchief is in the other room. Then a fly lights on his nose, and does it so unexpectedly that he involuntarily dodges, and catches the point of the shears in his left ear. At this he commences to cry and wish he was a man. But his mother doesn't notice him. When she is through she holds his jacket collar back from his neck, and with her mouth blows the short bits of hair from the top of his head down his back. He calls attention to the fact, but she looks for a new place in his head and hits him there, and asks him why he didn't use his handkerchief. Then he goes out and wriggles to get the hairs out of his neck, and wonders what the other boys will say to him.

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 12. No. 4. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY.} New York, Saturday, January 24, 1885. {33 CLINTON PLACE.} $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY'S numerous friends rejoice that his sojourn in Naples has greatly improved his health.

THE Rev. W. S. Hyde, in a recent issue of The New-Englander, enlivens its dignified pages with the following theological statement: "Philosophically viewed, the characteristic of sin is its dual character. The deuce is in it."

IT is a matter of regret to the Freeman's Journal that "Roman Catholics sometimes affect an air of primness and horror" when Sunday recreations are discussed, whereas they ought to disdain the "Puritan imitation of the Hebrew Sabbath."

ONE cause of the bitterness against Beecher in Plymouth church is the fact that two of the deacons bet big money on Blaine before they knew that the pastor intended to support Cleveland. It naturally "riles" a brother to get chiselled out of his money in this way.

OVERHEARD at a church conference, Brother A: "Hav you heard the minister at Blank church?" "No," answers Brother B. "Well," rejoins the other, "he is real nice; I really think he is a Christian." And then he added, reflectivly: "I don't see how his congregation can tolerate him!"

SINCE the police make it so uncomfortable for those who gamble in Chinese lotteries and at the faro table, remarks the San Franciscan, it is pleasant to know that one can generally find a church fair open, where he can try his luck without fear of the temporal authorities, and in the assurance of the approval of heaven.

A TEXAS paper remarks: "The names of Jesus and Christ sound very sacred to English speaking people, but among the Spanish both are very common names—given and surnames. At Laredo the other day Jesus H. Christ was registered at one of the hotels. We remember noting a few years ago that a Mexican named Jesus Christ had been hanged for horse stealing."

"Do you know what peculiarity there is in the last chapter of Hezekiah?" the young man with the sober countenance asked the Baptist deacon. The good deacon couldn't think, and reached for his well-thumbed Bible, when the sober young man began to smile and the deacon saw the point. Several persons, generally considered well versed in scripture lore, hav lately been caught by this question.—Christian Advocate.

"Now then," said a Sunday-school teacher, who was trying to explain a miracle to her class, "how do you account for Peter's being able to walk on the surface of the water?" "I know!" said a little bright-eyed boy, whose father lost a limb at the siege of Vicksburg. "Well, how do you account for Peter's walking on the water?" "He had cork legs and they wouldn't let him sink!" said the little fellow, triumphantly.—Paris Beacon.

THE St. Paul Pioneer Press advertised for a boy at two dollars a week, and received two hundred and fifty answers. There seems to hav been a sort of competitiv examination or adoption of civil service rules in selecting a boy, and the one who wrote the following letter was selected: "Mister P., Pioneer Press: I want the Job my folces is not rich & I hav got to russell. They are ded. It betes hel how hard times is i am 14 & I kin do chores I look good with new clothes on i wold like to get a good plase in your offis I kin learn fast."

THE late Rev. W. Milton, of Sheffield, England, leaves about a quarter of a million dollars behind him. He didn't take it with him in gold, says the London Freethinker, because it would hav melted. If this remark is objected to as lacking Christian charity, Mr. Foote answers that the doctrin of hell-fire is drawn from Christianity and that according to Christ it is impossible for a rich man to enter heaven without a special miracle. Christianity brought the horror and the terror of hell into men's hearts. He only makes fun of it and destroys it.

CAPT. PHELAN, the dynamiter, who was recently the victim of an attempted assassination by another dynamiter named Short, is in a fair way to recover. It was reported that when Phelan was first stabbed and thought to be dying, he refused the offices of a priest on the ground that he was "a Bob Ingersoll man." Mr. Phelan denies this slander, and says he hopes to liv and die a good Catholic. From his record as general dynamiter-at-large, it is judged that the first part of his wish is being granted him.

THE Rev. Dr. Paxton observes that the Scotch "are the only people who ever successfully solved the problem on this little planet of how to combine punch and piety." That is pretty well put. Their punch, like their piety, is strong and genuin. The remark recalls the reproachful commentary of a Canadian Episcopal bishop of Scotch birth upon his treatment at the table of a certain rector in Boston: "They were all good people, and most kind, I am sure; but do you know, my dear," said the old gentleman, "they gave me water to drink at table and upon going to bed, as if I had been a horse."

THE editor af the Arizona Antidote is not to be put down. He warns the editor of a rival sheet thus: "The hell-born, red-headed, smart Aleck who makes abortiv attempts to edit the little patent outside in Tenderfoot City squeals like a stuck pig because we hav shown up his political aspirations. He pretends to be horrified because we drink good liquor and hav a red nose, thus hoping to throw dust in the eyes of the public. But it won't do. The people know that there is no more to him than there is to a footless sock without any leg—that is, just nothing. Our nose is our own, and we pay for our liquor in hard money."

IT appears that impure drinking waters contain bacteria in numbers proportioned to their degree of impurity. Acting upon this fact, M.M. Proust and Fauvel hav been cultivating various river waters in gelatine, and afterward, by the use of a microscope constructed for the purpose, hav succeeded in counting the number of microscopic organisms in each cubic centimetre of the fluid. The water of the Vanne, which is considered good, contained 11,000 bacteria. The Seine water was found to contain 242,000 of the organisms, thus justifying the serious complaints made against it. The results arrived at by the microscope are in exact accord with those obtained by the ordinary complicated and expensiv chemical analyses.

THE Rev. A. B. Beach, D.D., rector of St. John's church, a leading minister of the Episcopal church in central New York, died at Ithaca, N. Y., last week, from an apoplectic stroke received on the Sunday previous. He was in the act of catechising the Sunday-school when persons in the audience noticed a spasmodic twitching of his lips. Then his mind wandered, and, abruptly leaving the subject on which he was talking, he suddenly began to repeat, in an abstracted manner, the Apostles' Creed. He began to stagger, and was only prevented from falling by timely assistance. His left side was completely paralyzed. He was a brother of the Rev. Alfred Beach, of New York. He has been in the Episcopal ministry for half a century.

MRS. BELVA ANN LOCKWOOD, the candidate of the Equal Rights party for president in the late campaign, has sent to the Senate, through Senator Horr, a petition asking that the votes cast for her in New York, New Hampshire, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Illinois, Maryland, and California be counted, and that the electoral vote of Indiana be given to her. She charges that the votes cast for her were "counted for the alleged majority candidate, the same being antagonistic to the letter and spirit of the law, and subversiv of every principle of equity and justice." She also asks that the Senate "refuse to receive the electoral returns of the state of New York, or count them for the alleged majority candidate; for had the 1,336 votes which were polled in said state for your petitioner been counted for her and not for one Grover Cleveland, he would not hav been awarded a majority of all the votes cast at said election in said state." The reason for asking that the electoral vote of Indiana be cast for her, she says, is "that after the electoral college of that state had cast its vote for the aforesaid Grover Cleveland it changed its mind, as it had a legal right to, and did cast its united ballot for your petitioner."

DR. GUERNSEY, in an article on faith cure, in the Medical Times, cites a case in which will-power appears to hav successfully supplied the place of faith. Among the parishioners of the Rev. Dr. Taylor, of New Haven, was an invalid lady, who finally took to her bed, where she continued to receive her pastor's visits. One bitter cold night she sent for him to console her dying moments, and declared herself ready to depart in peace. "If it is his will," she said, "that I shall go to hell, I can still say, 'Thy will be done.'" The physician who was present became a little impatient. "Well," said he, "if that is God's will, and both you and your family are reconciled to it, I do not know that I ought to object." In a moment the woman was on her feet shouting, "I won't die, and I won't go to hell!" She afterward enjoyed comfortable health for years.

AT Creston, Ia., there are a large number of the Christian sect known as Adventists. They are very devout. In the town of Creston livs the Karl family, consisting of twelve members. The Karls stand well, and several of the men are railroaders, but most intense believers in the faith. They fully believed that the world would close upon the fourth, and made all arrangements to that end, having clothing made, and on the moring of the fourth donned funeral habiliments and spent the day praying, singing, and reading the Bible, and waiting for the crash. They refused to leave the house or eat, or prepare anything to eat. The crash didn't come, but they believe it will come, and remain ready to receive the bridegroom. They now believe a sacrifice is necessary, that their God demands a ranson, and made arrangements to offer up a daughter, a girl about sixteen, Katie Karl, as an offering to their God, who is angry, and will not carry out his desires until the girl or some other pure and sinless human being is killed. The neighbors made complaints, but nothing could be done. Policemen were stationed about the house to prevent the cold-blooded murder of the girl, which is feared, as several attempts to knife her hav been made by the father. The men will not work, nor will they permit the women, and the entire sect, fully fifty, are almost starved to death from watching, waiting, and fasting. Last week they were reported about dead, and cannot hold out many days.

FREDERIC HARRISON, writing of Carlyle in the North American Review, draws this picture of the great egotist: "A grand imagination stinging itself to death, like a scorpion, in its frenzy of self-absorption; a generous heart turned to gall because it had lost its way, lost all hope of finding a way; an 'influence,' a master of speech, a glorious inciter to great things; an 'influence,' deeper, doubtless, than Coleridge, higher than Johnson, but how much lower than the mighty Burke! Let us think of him sadly and kindly, lying amongst the Annandale peasants from whom he came forth and of whom he was ever one. Compare the cruel storms in the life of this lost soul with the serene humanity of those whom he nicknamed Atheists. Read the autobiography of Hume, and see how a really great thinker could die, with sweetness, hope, and love in every tone. Or read the memoirs of Gibbon, or the life of Turgot, of Adam Smith, of Condorcet. Or, lastly, compare these fuliginous railings and wailings with the manly, self-possessed, simple story told by the magnanimous spirit of John Mill. They found peace; while the wild spirit that in life covered them with his mockery, went tossing down to his last rest in an agony of scorn, hate, and despair. 'Wa, wa,' he tells us the dying Frankish king cried, 'who is this mighty power which pulls down the strongest?' Wa, wa,' wails Thomas Carlyle, recognizing a power too strong to be resisted. That power is humanity, the human race, which his long life was devoted to deriding, and which now, in his death, still honors him as a brother of rare genius and mighty purpose."

News of the Week.

EDMOND ABOUT, the distinguished French author, died on the 17th.

THE spinners of Fall River, Mass., hav accepted a reduction without striking.

EX-VICE-PRESIDENT SCHUYLER COLFAX is dead. He was buried at South Bend, Ind., on the 17th.

OLIVER BROS. & PHILLIPS, iron manufacturers, of Pittsburgh, Pa., hav failed for $1,000,000.

WM. M. EVARTS will represent New York in the United States Senate for the next six years.

THE receipts of the New York post-office during 1884 exceeded the expenditures by nearly $3,000,000.

EX-SENATOR HARRISON TWEED dropped dead in his pew in a Baptist church at Taunton, Mass., on the 18th.

EDMUND YATES, editor of the London World, is sentenced to four months' imprisonment for libeling a "noble lord."

THE New York society of master printers celebrated Benjamin Franklin's birthday with a banquet on Jan. 17th.

SEVENTEEN invalids were burnt to death or suffocated by a fire in the lunatic asylum at Kankakee, Ill., last Sunday.

A NEW YORK Methodist was seen going into a Catholic church last Sunday, and was arrested. He is by profession a pickpocket.

THE Rev. Charles F. Clarke, of Houston Co., Ga., got into a fight with a negro last week, and killed him by a blow on the head with a cane.

A GREAT gale prevailed in many parts of the United States last Saturday. At Steubenville, Ohio, a $70,000 Presbyterian church was wrecked.

ST. JOHN, the Prohibitionist candidate for president, is still accused of having sold out to the Democrats for $25,000. The charge has not yet been satisfactorily proven.

IN the vote for chaplain in the House at Austin, Texas, last week, Beecher, Burchard, and Col. Ingersoll received one vote each. The Rev. J. W. Poindexter was elected.

AN attempt was made last Saturday to blow up with dynamite a hat factory at South Norwalk, Conn. The striking hatters are accused of the crime, but deny all knowledge of it.

GEN. GRANT is in poor health. He is reported to be suffering from a cancer of the tongue, the result of excessiv smoking. The general has of late given up the use of tobacco.

SUNDAY is the most popular day at the New Orleans Exposition. Secretary Frelinghuysen says that President Arthur will order the United States department of the fair to be closed on the Sabbath. President Arthur ought to know better.

CONNECTICUT piety rises superior over all. Last Saturday three defaulting financiers of that state were found to be somewhere near $200,000 wrong in their accounts. The gentlemen pleaded that they might not be arrested immediately, as they wished to spend Sunday with their families at church.

DEACON RANNEY and his friends hav prevailed over the Newman faction in the Madison Avenue Congregational church, and Parson Newman has been incontinently "fired out." This was done at a meeting in the church last week, when parties belonging to both factions assailed each other with all sorts of impolite epithets, and policemen were necessary to keep order.

THE Young Men's Christian Association of Brooklyn are making war on theater posters. It is said that actresses are pictured on the billboards with such shocking anatomical display as to create a competition among bald-headed deacons for front seats that threatens to end in total demoralization. All sorts of signs will be treated with equal severity by the young men of Brooklyn. It is evident that an era of beatific morality is about to be inaugurated.

Communications.

Miss Gardener on the Charac'eristics of Her Sex.

DEAR MR. PUTNAM: Your letter asking me to giv you my opinion of the peculiar mental traits of women, and expressing your views upon the same, is one of a large number I hav received upon this topic, and calls for much the same reply. I hav, therefore, concluded, with your permission (since there appears to be a desire to hav me write upon this subject), to make your very able and courteous letter the basis of my reply to them all.

You were quite right in thinking that I would not be in the least offended by any criticisms upon my sex which are made in so courteous a manner and tone, and with the evident intention of fairness and a desire for frank, honest, and unprejudiced discussion.

Hence no apology is necessary, and the page of saccharine substance (usually called "taffy") which seemed to you a needful offering to my lacerated feelings was really not necessary at all to save you from being "drowned with tears," while my nativ incapacity (coupled with present illness) will, no doubt, save you from your other dilemma of being "squelched by reason or overcome by logic."

The fact is, tears are not much in my line, personally, while logic and reason, you indicate, are not "natural" attributes of my sex.

Therefore, your personal safety is fully assured, and I may proceed to discuss with you some of the reasons which occur to me for the unfortunate "peculiarities of women," which, I agree with you, do exist, and "are the cause of infinit pain to man," as well as to herself.

Another time I may take up some of the points herein suggested where I do not agree with you—the one, for example, where you say, with that large confidence and breezy good nature characteristic of your sex when upon this topic, that "man is governed by reason," as an offset to your other statement, "and woman by emotion."

The last I agree with in the main, and shall discuss. The first seems rather a paradox coming from one who is spending his energy and eloquence wholly in the attempt to coax men to use even a very little reason in the domain where superstition is king, and prejudice supreme judge.

Especially paradoxical does it appear when we reflect that these very superstitions (one and all of them) were invented by the sex which has the honor to be "governed by reason;" the sex which covered itself all over with fame (if not with glory) some years back, by seriously trying and convicting hogs, sheep, cattle, and even bugs, for the crime of blasphemy, and found unborn children guilty of unpardonable sins; the sex which to-day numbers among its ornaments the Revs. T. DeWitt Talmage and Dr. Burchard; the sex which so recently voted against one man because another man was too suggestivly alliterativ to permit his reason to wait upon his prejudice in the domain of politics, where words are at par value, and not to be taken in a "spiritual" sense

And to digress a trifle here, did it ever occur to you that that is the reason why ministers almost always make such a mess of it when they try to discuss politics, business, or any of the subjects where words carry their face value, their actual meaning, together with the responsibility for their utterance?

Clergymen are used to offering, promising, and explaining in a field where words mean nothing, hav no par value, where actual value is unknown, where responsibility is impossible; and the more exaggerated the imagery the greater the success. These men grow to be—physically incapacitated for verbal accuracy. (There may be a shorter way to describe it, but I forbear.) They promis and offer all sorts of gifts, emoluments, and positions upon a capital stock which embraces nothing but a book of fables and an activ imagination. They know there is no danger of their notes going to protest, and the value received is safely stowed away. If a politician promises a post-office, it means a post-office, or public political disgrace and bankruptcy. But the clergy distribute "mansions, crowns, and eternal life" with a large disregard of the fact that they do not possess a second coat of their own, and a childlike faith that all they will ever be called upon to pay is very small interest on the capital represented, in the shape of two hydrocephalitic sermons per week and a little periodic abuse of Infidels.

And yet these be men, "and men be governed by reason."

But this is too long a digression. You object to the unreasoning and emotional "nature" of women, and you, as all men who think, deplore this and rightly attribute to it much of the pain and sorrow of mankind.

Yet these same men, almost all of them, say: "I never say anything to disturb the faith of my wife and the girls. They go to church—and really, after all, it don't do much harm, for a woman." I hav heard some of our most thoughtful Liberals talk that way; and yet religion is all emotional, and cultivates this quality more than anything else.

It, more than anything else, undermines reason. It, more than anything else, teaches women to not use what reason and logic they do possess. It, more than anything else, destroys the power of thought; the ability to weigh, and measure, and compare; the power to arrive at just values—in short, the faculty of correct reasoning and judicial deliberation.

The studies of science, business, or political affairs, which destroy or disciplin the emotional, and giv poise and balance to character, fathers say are of no use to their girls, and they are given, instead, languages, arts, and accomplishments—all direct cultivators and stimulators of the already too emotional and imaginativ elements of which he complains.

These very fathers will send their daughters (or permit them to think it right to go) to Sunday-school, encourage their association with clergymen, and teach them, year in and year out: "Don't bother your brain about business matters. Keep within so much and spend what I giv you. I provide it. You use it, and don't bother me asking questions." (I don't say this is talked to the girls always, but I do say it is taught them hourly.) They never think of training their boys to a future of idle dependence and emotional trust and faith that the Lord (or some other male bird) will feed and clothe them.

They, even Liberals, do not think not to so train their girls.

"You should be soft and yielding and graceful," is the lesson taught; "not logical, exact, and firm. A firm woman is usually called a virago, or masculin;" and women do not like to be thought either the one or the other.

Again, when a man finds what is expected of him, he will try to excel in that thing—even if it be burglary. What is not expected of him at all, he labors but little to attain. If he believes it to be impossible, he will make no effort at all. It is so with woman, and she has been thoroughly drilled to know that nothing in the line of action or thought is of her "sphere;" that caprice is beautiful in her, ignorance charming, and inaccuracy wholly unobjectionable; that logical and persistent reasoning is impossible in most cases, and unbecoming in the case where possible. Every educational institution in the world, almost, has been a constant reminder to her that her mind is of less consequence than her brother's; that he can be and should be well trained mentally by all the studies which develop his faculties; that she should gratefully accept a silly, childish, lopsided "education" as sufficient for her needs and suited to her capacity.

You will say: "If she does not like it, why does she do it? 'Women make public opinion.'" Not at all.

They who hold the purse-strings are they who govern the world. Jay Gould, with his money and a newspaper, has more real power than all his thousands of employees. Who governs the South, its numbers or its property and education?

Now, in this case, men hav always held the money. Need I elaborate the simple statement? Does that fact not tell the whole story? Again, you may say, "Well, if women had been capable of making money they would hav had it." Read the common law and you will see. Read the canon law (church law) and it will not take you many pages until you will find that: 1. She is not allowed to make money; 2. If she does make it, she is not allowed to keep it—it does not belong to her; 3. If she inherited it, it was not her own; but in either or all of these cases some male relation or guardian was the real owner. Is it strange she has had no power? Is it strange she has developed slowly and emotionally?

If all the weaknesses and defects charged against her be true, are not these, with all they imply, sufficient reasons to account for the fact? And if it all be true, who is responsible?

If men suffer and the race degenerate, or progress but slowly, because of the unreasoning, emotional, and narrow nature of woman—and I agree with you that this is the case—who is responsible?

One-half of the race cannot be dwarfed without dwarfing the other half. Retribution is as inevitable as death where the mothers of a race are the first victims.

For all these centuries the attempt has been made to elevate humanity one side at a time. It has been a hopeless failure. For centuries man has hoped and striven to achieve great things while requiring the mothers of the race to be content to devote their abilities to trivialities.

He strove to achieve greatness at the expense of the comfort, the honor, the welfare, and through the robbery and degradation, of those who gave him life. The result has not been a blooming success, and so long as the laws of heredity endure it never can be.

I do not say that all this has been deliberate. I do do not say that it has been intentional; but I do say that it is a sad fact, and is now the awful problem which faces those who think. How repair the wrong? How remedy the evil? How rectify the fatal mistake in the shortest possible time?

The great problem to-day before men is how they can best repair the injury done to the race—done to themselvs, if you please—by these centuries of blind, ignorant struggle toward the achievement of a personal gain which should exclude the other sex. It was quite hopeless for women to ask consideration of these matters until man had first seen that it touched his own welfare. The argument then becomes quite easy. I do not say this as a woman, for it is equally true of all the other problems that hav disturbed and puzzled the past. If it were race prejudice, or caste, or money power, or divine rights, which had to be dealt with, the trouble was the same—the immediate beneficiary was slow to see why he should not be the sole consideration; and so long as man is no farther developed than he can hope to be for some time to come, he will hav to be touched, if not "through his stomach," at least through the Ego, spelled with a big E. (N. B.—You will please observe that I use the word "man" here in its broadest sense, and am quite willing to take the same medicin which I offer to you.)

While we bemoan these emotional, irrational, and unreliable characteristics as sad deficiencies of woman's "nature," would it not be well to stop long enough to consider whether they are not rather the result of defectiv training?

If she is carefully excluded from those studies, occupations, and ambitions which are always given to or opened for boys and men as a necessary part of their life, and for the proper building of their characters and developing their faculties, to enable them to successfully meet the world and understand the meaning of life, so as to cope with its difficulties, can we expect anything else than that she will lack the result of such training? If it requires all this to develop him into a rational, thoughtful, and successful being, it seems to me that it is asking and expecting a good deal of her to even suggest that she should possess the highest results of such a process so long as she is deprived of all of the stimulants, aids, and means by which he attains them. Add to this centuries of time in which she has been worse off than she is to-day. Add to that the fact that all the disciplin and training she does get (her schooling, in the main), her home life and social condition, her inferior legal status, her political non-existence, and her constantly and abnormally stimulated religious conditions (to say nothing of the overwhelmingly overburdened and perverted maternal capacities), and hav you not reason enough to say why she is not usually logical, and why she is generally "emotional?"

And again I ask, who is responsible? If you take a child and tie his hands behind him, is he or you to blame if his work is not done? If you put out his eyes (because he is weaker than you), can you blame him if he cannot read to you when your own sight has failed?

It may come hard on you then, but how has it been for him these long years of darkness and mental torture?

If you paralyze his tongue, can he call out to save you when you near the abyss which he can see, but you do not? If you destroy his hearing, will he respond when you call for help? Can you blame him? Can you call his defects "natural?"

I agree with you that in the main "women do not reason well, that they are deficient in logic, that they are emotional often at the expense of all justice and happiness to themselvs and to those whom they love," but I do not agree with you that these faults are either "natural" or necessary.

They are the plain result of an education which is often worse than useless, of a social and political status which is an insult to her and a dishonor to those who impose them, and of a religious training which makes her humbly accept and acquiesce in all of these, because it has made her believe (as it has made men maintain) that she is an inferior, an afterthought, the source of all evil and an unclean thing, cursed of Jehovah and scorned of men; a dependant to be treated with contempt, severity, or kindness at the pleasure or discretion of those who used to claim to be made in the "image and glory of God," and who, having outgrown the old idea, now believe themselvs to be the original of the picture—at least for women.

But only very few of them hav so far been able to conceive it possible that the opinions in regard to the "sphere," capacities, and proper status of women which were held by Moses, David, Lot, and Paul, are perhaps as far below the line as are the views of these same distinguished gentlemen on astronomy, evolution, or saline products.

Once in a while we hear of some great outrage where some one has abused a child until it is deformed and becomes an idiot. We read the details with horror, and say: "No wonder; such treatment would naturally result just that way. Deprived of natural amusements and ambitions, kept alone and in fear, brow-beaten, dependent, and half-starved, mentally or physically—what else could hav resulted if the child lived? The more ambitious or sensitiv the child, the shorter and surer the process."

Well, now, suppose you apply that to women? That enough of them hav come out of the dark room far enough from being idiots, to recount some of the details of the process, speaks volumes for somebody.

Can it be said that the product of such a system has ever been "natural?" Do you believe you hav ever seen a "natural" woman?

Suppose a race of beings greatly stronger than man should suddenly swoop down upon this earth and deprive men of all power—suppose they took all wealth to themselvs, made man absolutely a dependent, left him no voice in his own education or occupations, carefully eliminated all useful studies, ambitions, and occupations, taught him by and by to be ashamed to think (only on certain subjects and according to given rules which should arrive at stated results), and to be afraid to express an opinion; taught him he could hav no opinions even about himself which were not first revised for him; surrounded him with laws, panalties, customs, and religions which bound him mentally and physically hand and foot, and left him no appeal in society, in law, or in force.

Stop right here and picture that man—still unburdened by nature's law of maternity—and do you think (after a few thousand years) that man would emerge a natural being? Would he be a blooming success in the light of a rational, dignified, self-respecting, and self-directing being?

Again, suppose you compare our brightest, freest men to-day with those who were the abject slaves of the Roman confessional, who did not dare whisper that their lives were their own, who crawled at the feet of the church, and licked the foot that kicked them. Compare such a man with one who is to-day free—with a Humboldt, a Darwin, or an Ingersoll—and then divide the difference by all the creeds of earth (and all are against women); divide it by all the wealth of the world, divide it by all the infinit force of social and political custom, power, and belief; divide it by all the strength of law; divide it by all time, and then you will begin to arrive at an approximate comparison with woman's condition as related to that of man.

And, O ye Gods! where is that man you began to divide?

Now, of course, I do not pretend that in all these centuries the upward growth of man has not inevitably had much influence in raising woman, also, nearer to the free light of heaven; that the side lights and the incidental aids she has received hav not greatly modified this condition; that now and then she has not been thrown a good, large bone (after it was pretty well picked); that, once in a while, some Adam did not giv her almost half of an apple.

If it were not so, she would not be, to-day, in a condition to even ask questions. And, now, my dear sir, if you will once more excuse a digression and a personal allusion, I will say it is because all these conditions (which, also, affect every son who must receive his endowments from a mother) are what they are, and it is because the religions of the world are the strongest of all influences which hav made and kept them so, and it is because our religion so plainly and distinctly teaches that these are right conditions, and advocates the belief in the utter inferiority of woman, and encourages and induces men to believe in and practice upon this basis of justice and right, that I hav ever publicly taken the field against the Bible as authority and the church as a guide.

Others, more able than I, hav broken lances against this old superstition for other good and sufficient reasons. I do it for women. I do it because the Bible presumes to (and has, for all these centuries) establish the position of woman, and insured her subjection and degradation, so far as it could, by its imbecil theory of her creation as an annex, her disobedience, her natural uncleanness, and her general depravity, worthlessness, and inferiority.

Men asserted that whatever mistakes the Bible may hav made in geology or astronomy, it was perfectly correct in its estimate of woman—and she meekly bowed to the rod, and the combined result has gone far to produce the inane, degraded, and inferior being which Jehovah commanded Moses to dishonor and pollute (Num. xxxi), and Paul delighted to insult; the creature who, to-day, listens to hundreds of theological imbecils week by week, who love to recount to her her various weak points and shortcomings, while she pays him so much per year for the privilege (and he sees to it that he earns the money).

When the Bible argument was brought by a divine in one of the heated abolition debates, we read that Wendell Phillips said, "Yes, sir; I agree with you that the Bible is in favor of the slave trade, and, therefore, I say, so much the worse for the Bible. If it stands in the way of freedom, the Bible, not freedom, will hav to take a back seat." So I say, to-day. It is this musty old book and its offspring, the church, which, in this country, stands as a bar to the proper recognition that woman is a human being with faculties to develop, and not simply a machine to manipulate. Therefore, I say that, first of all, we must say: If the Bible stands in the way of woman, so much the worse for the Bible. It, not woman, must take a back seat.

I am glad to say that in nine cases out of ten our Liberal men (in debate, at least) argue for the full, proper, and vigorous recognition of the exact equality of the sexes, but in act and in ordinary life the swaddling-clothes of the old faith so hold them that in most cases their daughters are trained just as other girls are, go to Sunday-school and church, and never know their own disgrace in so doing. The father says, "Oh, yes, my wife and the girls go to church, and I suppose it don't really do much harm—for women."

If these daughters were educated—I do not mean sent to a seminary—there would be not the least danger that they would think it harmless to go to church, for they would know that the Bible is an insult to women, and every orthodox preacher is bound to humiliate and degrade her so far as the law will permit. They would know that every denominational school is a chain to bind her reason, and that "female seminaries," and "annexes" are insults to a woman who livs in a country whose constitution claims to offer absolute equality and rights to all of its citizens, and to defend them in "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," without favor or distinction.

She would know that all these invidious distinctions are based upon the theory and belief that she is an inferior whose intellectual needs are to be stunted upon a different and lower basis than the one chosen for and furnished the one who holds the purse-strings, together with the happiness and welfare of the race, who does not know (?) that one-half of that race is quite as hungry, and needs quite as much and as good intellectual food as the other.

Do not conclude from all this that I am what you call a "tearing woman's rights woman." I do not believe there is such a thing as woman's rights, or man's rights. I hav somewhere said before, "Humanity is a unit with interests and aims indivisible." But the higher unity cannot be achieved so long as they are divided in rights and separated in responsibility.

Now, you see, I hav not attempted to "smash you with logic," nor hav I done the tearful act (quite as distasteful to me as to you); neither hav I "flown to the defense of my sisters," unless you call it flying to their defense when I say (recognizing the faults of which you write): "They are not 'natural' defects. They are plainly the result of vicious training and surroundings to which man is not subject, and for which she is not responsible." Who is? What can be done about it?

And looking at the problem from a moral standpoint, do not Col. Ingersoll's great words apply here? "I would rather suffer a wrong than inflict one." "I would rather be a slave than a slave-owner." And, I may add, he who inflicts a wrong has more to be humble about, to correct, and to apologize for than he who is incapacitated by the infliction.

There are always two slaves where there is one—he who is owned and he who owns. It is as great an injustice to a man to make him a tyrant as it is to make him a slave.

The owner does not usually see it that way until reaction sets in on himself. Then is the time for the one who was the first victim to ask: "Who is responsible? What shall we do about it?"

If this very inadequate letter does not suggest to you what I might reply to your other questions—did space permit—I shall expect you to say so as frankly as you wrote before, and I shall try to respond more fully.

The subject is such a large one that the space of a letter is wholly inadequate to its proper treatment. John Stuart Mill's "Subjection of Woman" will better fill the want, and why should I repeat feebly what he has so ably stated? Read that, please, if you hav not. These arguments come much more gracefully from men like him. I always dislike to offer them lest it appear a complaint against men by a woman.

I hav no such feeling in the matter. It has been a sad mistake which has crippled the human race, and no sex has escaped the consequence.

And it is true that much of "the suffering and pain, the wrong and the anguish, of this world can be traced to woman," and much of it is unnecessary. But so long as the law of heredity lasts, the blow will fall on all; and it is a fortunate thing for the future of woman that this is true, for upon man's recognition of this fact (and the fear of the reaction upon himself) almost alone must she depend for her future elevation and the rectifying of the wrong of the past. For right is not masculin only, and justice knows no sex. Sincerely, HELEN H. GARDENER.

NOTE.—Will the other gentlemen who wrote me on these and kindred topics please accept this as a reply to them also? Indeed, I hav gone somewhat outside of Mr. Putnam's letter once or twice in order to cover these others, since I hav neither the time nor the strength to reply to each one singly. Such points as I hav not covered, or to which I hav not suggested a reply, I shall be glad to hav you repeat. H. H. G.

The Christ of Paul.

Mr. Edward Irving, of England, is unable to find any historical proof of a Christ crucified under Pontius Pilate, and the Rev. T. B. Furbish, of Detroit, concedes that the fact of the existence of a historic Jesus rests almost if not quite entirely on the testimony of Paul. Very good. But both these gentlemen ought to know that Paul was not living in the time of Pontius Pilate. He was preaching in Damascus as early as 63 B.C. This fact, which is the key to the whole mystery (i. e., mystification), was discovered in 1878 by ANTICHRIST, A.M.

Freethought in Australia.

The Freethought movement in Australasia continues to prosper, and its foes are already beginning to feel the effects of its influence.

The Australasian Secular Association is activly at work, both at its headquarters, and also at the branches, while other institutions of a similar nature are steadily making headway.

Mr. Symes continues his prosperous career as lecturer and editor, and he has not failed to make his existence known to the Melbourne public. His lectures every Sunday night, at the Hall of Science, are always delivered to a pleased and appreciativ audience, who always manage to muster in sufficient force to fill the building on each occasion. Mr. Symes's lectures on each Tuesday night in the same hall continue to be fairly patronized; while the open-air lectures, which he delivers each Sunday afternoon on the Yarra banks, always draw together a crowd of astonished citizens, outnumbering the Salvation Army gathering a few yards further on.

The Australasian Secular Association has scored a great victory lately, the attorney-general having given his opinion that the law does not prevent us from charging for admission to our lectures on Sunday evenings. We hav, accordingly, adopted that system in place of the old one of taking up voluntary collections. Of course, you will know as well as I can tell you that voluntary collections are not very profitable unless you hav a devil to assist you; and as we repudiate the services of that venerable old gentleman, we require to conduct our affairs in a business-like manner, and the system of charging for admission answers our purpose admirably. Of course, the venders of immortality do not desire this state of things, and they are going to set the law in motion against us by prosecuting us for Sunday trading. They hav unearthed an obsolete act of George III., and are very kindly going to test its potency by making us the instruments of the experiment. Writs are already issued, one for Mr. Joseph Symes for £600, and another for our vice-president, for a smaller sum. Mr. Symes sarcastically observes in his Liberator that they (the government) are shortly going to get up a test case for witchcraft also!

The Liberator, by the way, is getting along well. It has just commenced its second half-yearly volume, and its circulation is steadily increasing. It is a most unmerciful paper, the frauds and superstitions of society being thrashed with a vigor that would do justice to a jail flagellator. Sometimes an unfortunate individual comes within its range, and gets more than he bargained for. Mr. Symes promised that his editorial policy should be "uncompromising," and he has kept his word. Whether it is the best possible policy is, perhaps, a matter for discussion; at all events, its effectivness cannot be denied.

The Mutual Improvement class of the Australasian Secular Association is getting on very well; and the Secular Sunday-school has been very successful, indeed.

I started a paper for this school (with the assistance of a friend), and am pleased to say it proved very successful; unfortunately, however, it does not seem as if the third number will ever see daylight, for, although all the matter is ready, we cannot find a printer who will undertake the job. The paper is named The Young Secularist.

The Australasian Secular Association in Sydney is getting along very fairly; and the branch at Newcastle, New South Wales, is putting the rest of us to shame. It has had the honor of erecting the first Freethought hall in Australia. When will the capital cities do the same? I must not forget to tell you that the hall was opened by the talented Freethought lecturess, Miss Ada Campbell. This lady had just previously terminated a successful course of lectures in Adelaide under engagement to the South Australian Freethought Society.

The wonderful prosperity of the Freethought movement in New Zealand, I need not dilate upon, as you will hav received the news more directly through the columns of that excellent paper, the Freethought Review. I may as well note, however, that Mr. Robert Stout, the well-known Agnostic, has been elected premier of New Zealand, and Mr. Ballance, the able editor of the Freethought Review, has also secured a seat in the same parliament.

The Australasian Secular Association, Melbourne, are writing to England for another lecturer. Why can't we hav the pleasure of a visit from an American friend now and then? Of course, our friend Ingersoll is beyond our expectations, and we must rest satisfied at seeing his glowing utterances in print. But there are many lecturers in your states, and I hope one or more of them will soon pay us a visit. If he is thinking of doing so, he should not fail to write to the Melbourne Association.

If these few facts and fancies are acceptable to THE TRUTH SEEKER, I shall say more on a future occasion. In the mean time, accept the best wishes of DAVID A. ANDRADE.

Melbourne, Australia, Dec. 1, 1884.

The Liberal Club.

The lecture before the Manhattan Liberal Club on the 16th inst. was advertised to be delivered by Mrs. Nellie Brigham, "On a Subject to be chosen by the Audience." At eight o'clock the audience was at hand willing and anxious to do a large amount of off-hand choosing. Mr. Wakeman was appointed a committee of one to decide what the subject should be, Mr. Huhn favoring this measure because Mr. Wakeman was above the suspicion of being a Spiritualist, or of being in collusion with the lecturess. A man named Westbrook bobbed serenely up to repel the insinuation that Mrs. Brigham could be in collusion with anyone. It was suggested that Mrs. Brigham should tell where the Butler vote went to. Mrs. Brigham had not yet arrived. Veteran John P. Guild, who still wears the soldier's coat, made a vigorous, blunt, Davy Crockett sort of speech on the question of the proposed statue to Giordano Bruno in Rome, which the chair followed with some further remarks in the same line. Mrs. Brigham still failing to appear, Mr. Wakeman invited anyone to take her place who could speak under spirit influence. Mr. Huhn mentioned Mrs. Dr. Herrick as one who was fond of talking on subjects she knew nothing about. Dr. Herrick demurred. Mr. Andrews would not speak unless he knew the subject. The chairman passed him a slip of paper with the proposed topic written upon it, and Mr. Andrews said he would try it. It happened to be a subject he knew something about. He said that while he called himself familiar with a large variety of questions, he would not face any audience in the world under the conditions Mrs. Brigham and a few other women submitted to. He could not explain the power which these inspirational speakers possessed. The subject proposed by Mr. Wakeman, and amended by Mr. Andrews, was as follows:

"Does not science, by its law of correlation, prove that the soul or life of man is a process or function of sensation? If so, are not all our efforts and attention devoted to another world so much lost to this?"

All agreed that this was a tough one. Mr. Andrews said no to the first proposition. The notion of a law of the correlation of forces was a highly metaphysical conception. The scientists, for instance, held that heat was a mode of motion. Heat was formerly spoken of as caloric, but that name must now be dropped, because caloric was a thing, a something, which heat, according to the scientists, was not. To assume motion apart from something to be moved, Mr. Andrews thought, was not only metaphysical but metempirical, because motion was a phenomenal aspect of a substance. It was an axion of mathematics that if a is a function of b, then b is a function of a. So if consciousness or life is a function of sensation, sensation must be a function of life or consciousness. The speaker was interrupted near this point by the appearance of Mrs. Brigham, whose late arrival was apologized for by another lady who said the lecturess had lost the address of the hall and in looking for it had wandered into numerous lager-beer saloons and other Teutonic institutions. Somebody inquired if she found any "spirits" in the saloons. This irreverent jest was deservedly ignored, but the later query from Dr. Foote, Sr., as to why the spirits had not directed their charge to the proper place, Mrs. Brigham replied to by saying that it was a test question.

Mrs. Brigham is a bright-looking young person of more than average good looks, and would pass anywhere for a nice girl. She picked up Mr. Wakeman's ponderous conundrums, gave them a brief glance, and entered upon her discourse in a clear and pleasing voice. She assumed the first person plural, using "we" instead of "I" when referring to herself, or rather to the defunct philosophers who, it was supposed, had come out from the yawning tomb of the past to utilize her physical organism for the enlightenment of those still groveling in the dust and ignorance of the present. [The foregoing sentence is a long one, but it is all there.—Rep.] The speaker reviewed the popular explanations of spiritual manifestations which had been relegated to the domain of electrical phenomena. She would say that electricity had no brains. The manifestations revealed a hidden intelligence; therefore electricity did not account for them. Psychology was alike inadequate. The telegragh was unexplainable, the steamboat was formerly deemed an impossibility, and the chrysalis exemplified the unfolding and development in its higher aspects of the human soul. It was better for men to be spiritualized than for spirits to be materialized. Mrs. Brigham closed with a poem descriptiv of the existence which we shall enter upon when we lay our armor by. In justice to the lecture it may be said that such was its scope and general comprehensivness that with a few verbal alterations it might hav been applied with equally exaustiv results to almost any subject of a spiritual nature. Mr. Huhn desired to know why it was necessary to hav darkness at a seance, and for the audience to keep their hands off the spirit. Mrs. Brigham told him to ask a photographer why he rushed into a dark room with his pictures.

Mrs. Dr. Herrick affirmed that she recognized nothing supernatural in the performance with which the audience had been entertained. Any phrenologist who should examin Mrs. Brigham's head would tell us that she would never be at a loss for something to say. Dr. Herrick said that she herself had some valuable information to divulge at the proper time, having made discoveries which, when they should be made known and applied, would effectually solve the problem of human happiness. The doctor read a written statement in which the exact nature of the discoveries did not appear, their final announcement being reserved for some future occasion. It is understood that Dr. Herrick favors muscular development in woman, so that the rights which the tyranny of man has denied her may be wrested from him by main strength.

Mr. Langerfelt, who has frequented the club of late less than formerly, took the platform, and having shaken hands cordially with the chair, said he had no doubt that Mrs. Brigham believed honestly in the spirit business, but lightning calculators and jugglers were equally expert. The chrysalis theory excited in him no enthusiasm, because though a grub might develop into a butterfly, yet when a butterfly passed back to dust it was as dead as anything else. Mr. Langerfelt then took up the question of reciprocating functions, and argued that spirit must be shown to be a function of matter before it could be proven that matter sustained that relation to spirit.

Dr. Kinget applied the theory of analogy to the question of spirit existence. No form of matter was exempt from the law of eternal change. If, therefore, spirit was a form of matter, however etherealized or sublimated, it was governed by this same law, and must continue to change its form. Spirit existence, therefore, did not prove immortality, and the discussion of the question of the ultimate destiny of man which so puzzles us in this life is then necessarily to be continued in our next. The doctrin of Materialism and devotion to duty, the speaker said, gave him comfort and peace.

Dr. Weeks considered that although we could not explain spiritual phenomena, that did not invalidate our testimony as to the facts. The reason Materialists found peace in their belief was because sincerity, whatever its object, was always productiv of happiness. He had known believers in hell-fire who appeared to find comfort in their belief. "You wouldn't think it," said the doctor, "but it's so." Dr. Weeks is a Spiritualist.

Mr. Huhn described Spiritualism as always appearing to him to be a disease, something like the delirium tremens, with the difference that they were superinduced by adverse kinds of spirits, and when a man had the jimjams he got over it and realized that the shakes he had seen, and the other phenomena, were the result of his disordered imagination, while the Spiritualist never recovered, and died in the belief that he had seen spooks. Mr. Huhn means well, but he is hardly philosophical enough to deal with subjects of this sort.

At the request of Mrs. Brigham, Chairman T. B. Wakeman closed the discussion. Mr. Wakeman defined life as the result of correlated forces impinging upon the colloid matter called protoplasm. Science and law do not recognize the existence of spirits, because, according to the rules of evidence, that existence has not been proved. You cannot hang a man for murder unless you can first produce a dead body, and you cannot demonstrate the truth of Spiritualism unless you can bring a spirit into court. This as regards entical Spiritualism. But there was an ideal Spiritualism, which is natural and proper, and in which the hopes, and emotions, and aspirations of mankind find their highest expression. We attain immortality in the continuity of the race. The summer-land which the lady speaker had pictured existed ideally, but not in some other world. In the language of the Bible, the kingdom of heaven is within us, that is, in the human heart. Mr. Wakeman is becoming universological to a marked degree in his methods of synthesizing and reconciling adverse theories. Mr. Andrews watches the evolution of his former adversary with eminent composure, but it is said that a slight twinkle is observable in the eyes of the Great Universal Preacher when the subject is presented to his attention.

It was late when the club adjourned, but such was the interest manifested that nearly everybody in the large audience had remained until the close of the meeting. Mr. Shook was present only in spirit, and Professor Vaughan and his stinging answer failed to materialize. It is the habit of the chairman to announce at the beginning of the month that the program is the most attractiv yet issued, and the meetings generally fulfil his prophecy.

THE Indiana Pharmacist says that a woman who has her letters directed to the New York post-office claims to cure cancer by means of a direct revelation from her "dear Lord." Her circular winds up with "Praise God from whom all blessings flow; four-ounce bottles, $5; eight-ounce, $8." The editor says: "It will be seen that the financial part of the business is the big end of the log."

Canadian Notes.

"The glory of Infidelity!" The Toronto Daily World, in commenting on this subject, says: "Two lectures were delivered at Albert Hall on Sunday last under the auspices of the Secular Society, by S. P. Putnam of New York, secretary of the National Liberal League. The subject in the afternoon was 'The Coming Religious Demands.' In the evening he spoke on 'The Glory of Infidelity.' He contended that the spirit of questioning and doubting conventionally received opinions alone prevented intellectual stagnation and stimulated research, invention, and progress. The Infidelity of Ingersoll and other assailants of orthodoxy had done much to promote mental activity among Christians and rouse all their energies in its defense. The system owed whatever intellectual brilliancy it possessed to the stimulus of doubt and discussion. The lecturer then considered the effect of Infidelity or a departure from the recognized formulas and systems upon art, poetry, and literature, instancing Lucretius, Shakspere, Voltaire, Victor Hugo, Byron, Shelley, Walt Whitman, Wagner and others as leaders of thought who by boldly undertaking new departures and setting established canons of thought and expression at defiance had achieved imperishable renown. Mr. Putnam's lectures were thoughtful and felicitously worded and displayed a wide literary research."

Among the numerous frauds and shams which go toward making up modern Christianity is the barefaced impudent lie that the Jewish Bible first originated the common morality of modern civilized nations; although the evidences are ten thousand times ten thousand that it is the gradual outcome of the experience of mankind in all countries and all ages, ancient and modern, and in its main features was commonly taught many long ages before the first word of the Bible was ever in existence. What is good in the so-called word of God has been copied from preceding systems and philosophies, but the Bible is so full of teachings of vice and wickedness that originality in this respect might probably be established. A book entitled "Bible Morals," by John E. Remsburg, published by the Truth Seeker Company, quotes from the Bible innumerable passages sanctioning more than twenty different vices and crimes. He givs chapter and verse for each passage he quotes. Twenty-five cents, inclosed to THE TRUTH SEEKER office, will procure a copy of this invaluable work by return mail. Intrinsically it is worth ten times its price.

As a specimen of the tissue of lies by which the barbarous superstitions of Christianity are bolstered, a pious Toronto paper lately asserted that a Freethinker was stricken with paralysis while blaspheming against God and his precious Bible; but his landlady sent a letter to the public press denying the whole story, as he was not talking on the subject at the time, and had been ill for several weeks previously. "And all liars shall hav their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone" (Rev. xxi, 8).

Toronto, Jan. 17, 1885. R. B. BUTLAND.

The Demand of Mr. Mitchell.

We demand the immediate repeal of all laws now on the statute books of the national and the several state legislatures, and that legislators stop making laws.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In behalf of the advanced guard of freedom, I move the above "demand" in place of the Nine Demands printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 6, 1884.

"The Nine Demands" are only the "skirmishing lines," but not the real battle that is to be.

The real earnest reformer, he or she who has a purpose in life, will never be satisfied while there is a statute unrepealed, or while men make laws.

Yours for the only effectiv method for lasting peace, SEWARD MITCHELL.

Notes and Comments.

Friend Dopp, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 27th, tells of a son whom he had buried ten years ago appearing to him, and a few moments later the dead child's mother laid her hands on his shoulders, and said: "It is curious you did not know Benny." Now, I wonder if Dopp ever had a waking dream; these flashes of thought that picture a panorama so vividly that you see and hear it, and yet it is gone in an instant? Probably Dopp had a waking dream of this kind. Think how vividly the dead as well as the far-off living come and mix themselvs in our sleeping dreams with images of the now. I often dream of my dead father, and before the dream ends he will resolve into my living husband.

When a spirit of the dead will come and bear tests that we apply to living people, then we may begin to think that death does not end all. Spiritualists giv us vivid descriptions of "the summer-land," and describe its fruits, flowers, and food, but they never bring us any specimens of these, yet, if they were real, they could do this as well as materialize old clothes or new lace!

Friend Powell contrasts Elmina's investigation with that of Gladstone, and says: "Elmina indicates thankfulness that she discovered nothing to change her former opinions."

Exactly so. Elmina is glad to feel that she found out that the facts coincided with her former opinions, because she is thankful to be in the right. Had Elmina found truth led her to the conviction that the dead still liv, she would hav rejoiced just as much. When I was trying hard to hold fast to the old God of Moses, I wanted truth, and wanted truth to be on God's side. But when God and the future all slipped away, I was still thankful. I had truth, and did not liv in delusion.

When I prefer hypocrisy, lies, cheats, frauds, errors, and mistakes to their counterparts, then I'll be thankful for the wrong and the false. Now Gladstone is a God-believer, and clings to man's immortality, hence it was easy for him to find "duty" in the pre-natural. ELMINA.

Pennsylvania State League

ANNUAL CONVENTION AT ALTOONA, PA., FRIDAY, SATURDAY, AND SUNDAY, JAN. 30TH AND 31ST AND FEB. 1ST, 285.

The great state of Pennsylvania is deep in the mire of puritanical Phariseeism, superstition, bigotry, and intolerance. The great mass of her people are blindfolded by the priesthood, and, because so blinded, are the willing slaves of the church. Thousands of her best citizens dare not express their honest convictions, are forced to yield seeming allegiance to religious rites and observances they regard with loathing and contempt, because to take any part in propagating Liberalism would insure them loss of business or dismissal from employment.

Liberals of Pennsylvania, what are you doing to remedy this most deplorable state of affairs? What are you doing to enlighten the people in regard to the aims, objects, and benefits of Secularism? Where are the distributors of Liberal literature? Where the activ, persistent canvassers for our best periodicals and books? What is being done to shed abroad the light of truth?

Never was more favorable time than now for the accomplishment of a large work in short time. But we want men. We want women. We want means.

Oh, that every Liberal of Pennsylvania would realize, as did that great, model truth seeker, D. M. Bennett, the necessity and duty to make real, earnest, self-sacrificing efforts to shed abroad the light of truth for the benefit of others!

The time of submission to the arrogant dictation of church prelates, of slavish obedience to the whims and decrees of Mother Church and Mrs. Grundy, is past. The time for resistance, for commencing in earnest the aggressiv war for our rights, for the secularization of our government, and redeeming the state of Pennsylvania from the disgrace of its Blue laws, relics of Puritan bigotry, has arrived.

Every Liberal of Pennsylvania, man and woman alike, must realize the great and pressing need of more energetic, systematic action, both individually and collectivly.

Only by agitation, by presenting facts, awakening thought and discussion, can we hope to attain the much-needed thorough and perfect organization, and establish a local League in every town in the state.

The officers of the Pennsylvania State League hav, after overcoming many difficulties, perfected arrangements for the Annual State Convention that cannot fail to meet the enthusiastic approval of every honnst-hearted Liberal in the state.

The meeting is appointed at Altoona, Pa., a central point, easy of access, on the line of the great Pennsylvania Central Railroad.

The Opera House is engaged for Friday, Jan. 30th, Saturday, Jan. 31st, and Sunday, Feb. 1st. The most able speakers and earnest, efficient, experienced workers hav been engaged, among whom, even first, is

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, who has said, "Secure the Opera House and I will be there."

The most able debater, and great champion of Secularism, Charles Watts.

The genial, brilliant child of poesy, Samuel P. Putnam.

The earnest and devoted advocate of Liberalism, Professor William Seymour.

The long-tried and true devotee to the cause of universal mental liberty, Harry Hoover.

[The energetic, experienced organizer and orator, C. B. Reynolds.—ED. T. S.]

And, last, but very far from least, the Convention will be honored by the presence and addressed by the best efforts of that most able and winning advocate of Secularization, Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel.

Here is a galaxy of talent that may never again be convened, that can never be surpassed. Truly the officers of the State League hav done nobly. Now, what are we going to do to help in this great and noble work? If we would share the glory of the victory, let us each and all bear part of the burden of the warfare. First, let every Liberal of Pennsylvania—who has not already done so—send one dollar to S. F. De Jones, 99 Fifth Ave, Pittsburgh, Pa., treasurer of the Pennsylvania State League, in payment of membership fee for the ensuing year, and all who can send contributions toward the expenses of the Convention. There are heavy expenses to be met. Do not mar the work and discourage the workers by permitting the treasurer to be without ample funds. (We must avoid all begging for funds at the Convention). We are not doing one-hundredth part of what we might, could, and should do.

Think of the vast amount of time, money, and energy so freely expended by Christians in perpetuating darkness, bigotry, and superstition. The poor, despised sect of Seventh Day Adventists, in addition to giving one-tenth of their income to support their ministers last year, raised the sum of $25,000 and spent it in the purchase and distribution of tracts and publications advocating their faith. Shall the Liberals begrudge a tithing for the cause of science, sociability, and Secularization? Let all make immediate arrangements to attend, and bring the wives, mothers, sisters, and daughters. Use every effort to induce fair-minded, intelligent friends and neighbors to accompany you. For union is strength; numbers giv confidence. It is a duty we owe to each other and the cause to be present. Let us beware of following the example of the Christians and being mere professors instead of earnest practicers of our principles. What though attendance at the Convention will occasion some loss, some outlay, expense not easily to be afforded? Nothing worth having is attained without effort. Think of the heroic sacrifice by the pioneers of Liberalism, but for whose self-denial, loss of property, liberty, even life itself, the holding of such a convention had been impossible, every advocate of Freethought so assembling would hav been liable to the dungeon, the torture, and the stake.

Remember this Convention is for the individual benefit and encouragement of each and every one who favors liberty of conscience, and would defend their birthright from the usurpations and intolerance, the fanaticism, bigotry, and superstition of the priesthood.

We trust every local League will be fully represented—send every man and woman of influence and ability—so that the Convention shall, in every sense, be a truly representativ body of our people. Matters of momentous interest will come before the Convention. It will seek to devise and perfect plans for more efficient individual labor, and for the united, triumphant onward march of Freethought and Secularism.

The earnest, practical, actual co-operation and presence of every true Liberal in Pennsylvania and vicinity is required.

Remember the able exponents of Liberalism announced will hav to leave other fields of labor to help the state of Pennsylvania. They one and all will be there, ready and willing to labor alike on and off the rostrum in instructing, counseling, and discussing with you the best means to advance the cause in your neighborhood. If you wish to be benefited you must do your part of the work. By staying away you would do great injury to the cause you love; you would giv the orthodox a triumph and bring discouragement on the workers. There must be a full attendance. Your presence is really necessary. Let nothing but severe sickness keep any real Liberal away. Your friends and co-workers expect to meet you at Altoona. Do not discourage—do not disappoint them.

CHAS. B. REYNOLDS,
Chairman of the Executiv Committee.

Charles Watts and the Salvation Army.

On the evening of Thursday, the 8th inst., Mr. Charles Watts gave a lecture at this place to a crowded audience, his subject being, "Wherein Secularism is Superior to Christianity." He is a speaker of great force and eloquence, and commanded the attention of the audience; and, from the remarks I could hear among those present, I should say that he made a very good impression.

But the grand finale was when a weakly-looking parson of some orthodox denomination or sect ventured to cross swords with this giant of Secularism, for then he showed himself the consummate debater that he is, and from his lips issued forth a torrent of unanswerable arguments and logic, in language of eloquence and power, that completely dumfounded and annihilated the poor parson. It struck him like a flash of lightning and sent him off quivering, to rise no more, unless the united prayers of his flock shall resuscitate him with strength sufficient to believe that if he had another chance he could overcome this champion of Freethought as David did Goliah.

But there was a drawback to this most interesting discussion, although it did not stop it, or prevent the speaker being heard, thanks to his powerful voice, yet it was very disagreeable and very annoying to both the speaker and audience.

Unfortunately for the cultured portion of the community of this country, they are inflicted with a pestilence worse than one or all of the plagues of Egypt, in the shape of a Christian sect called the Salvation Army, whose idiotic actions and antics would plainly indicate that they had some relation to the family from which Darwin says we are all descended—a sect which infests every village, town, and city. And this city has the misfortune of having to endure their vile presence.

After going through their usual evening religious performance, they coolly marched from their barracks with the premeditated purpose of putting a stop to the lecture by getting in front of the lecture hall, where they remained for upwards of an hour, howling, praying, singing, and drumming, with that most loving intention that Christians hav always been noted for in the history of the past and present, that of drowning the voice of the lecturer. They finally got tired of their orgies and left, and I am almost ashamed to state that no effort was made by the authorities of the town to put a stop to the disgraceful proceedings. But these obstructions to Freethought will eventually do the cause more good than harm. And this is but a sample of what a belief in a supernatural religion is capable of doing. History tells us what it has done in the past, and would do again if they only had the power. Centuries hav been spent in burning into the human heart and brain the errors and delusions of the Jewish Bible, and it takes time to efface the scars. Yet it is a good sign of its decline when even children are beginning to laugh at its old wives' fables. And it was not these silly creatures alone; just as silly Christians of other denominations not only encouraged it, but joined them in their revelry. And what better could be expected of men and women when part of their religious performance is to put out the lights and go "searching for Jesus," as they call it? and we can fancy what sort of searching and feeling is going on in the dark among old men and young men and maidens. Is it not disgraceful to Christian civilization to hav these howling and prowling dervishes encouraged and patronized by people who consider themselvs highly civilized? And the leading papers of this country are dumb upon this blot that disgraces our country, but rather uphold them, and say that they are doing good. When men of the highest culture and refinement come among us to lecture on philosophical themes connected with ethics, science, and history, they are either denounced or left unnoticed. Well might the poet Moore say in his day:

"Yes, ye vile race, for hell's amusement given,
Too mean for earth, yet claiming kin with heaven—
God's images, forsooth! But the time is coming when
From the lips of truth one mighty breath
Shall, like a whirlwind, scatter in its breeze
That whole dark pile of human mockeries.
Then shall the reign of man commence on earth,
And, starting fresh, as from a second birth,
Man is the sunshine of the world. New spring
Shall walk transparent like some holy thing."

The aim of every cultivated mind should be directed toward the consummation of a thing so desirable. "Nature had given to man, before there were books or priests, the germ of the virtues which render him sociable. There were men of integrity before they had imagined a hell, and there will be some yet when people shall hav ceased to believe in it. This pure book that Christians look up to as a god, what has it done for poor humanity? Has it reduced crime? Has it abolished vice? Has it made the people temperate? Has it done away with poverty? Has it reformed the vicious? And where is the invention or discovery fostered and aided by its teachers? And see what vast sums of money hav been expended to make people believe that they are conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity. There is a plan of never-ending torment to the most of them, to which they were unchangeably predestined from the first; that a just God made this place; that this God wrote a book, the proper understanding of which is necessary to salvation; that this book has never been understood, and consequently the majority would go to this hell; that he made this hell and this book to fit together. This crowning infamy, that an all-wise and all-good father would make a hell to burn eternally his erring children, and an incarnate fiend to superintend the roasting, what misfortunes has it not caused to humanity? We are all equals in the eyes of nature, and ought only acquire a superiority over each other by the use of their reason and by the development of the intellectual faculties and by virtue. It is not the instruction of the people that is to be feared (only priests and tyrants fear it), but rather much more their ignorance and vices. Morality has much more to gain when surrounded by all the light of reason than when inclosed in the darkness of faith. Nature has engraved in the heart of man himself the catalog of his duties, and her most beautiful altar in the heart of an honest man.

"The sacred dogma of natural morality has its source in the brain of eternal reason, which governs the world, which alone ought to be listened to and followed. Everything which may be superadded thereto can only corrupt it. Any association with maxims foreign to it, and drawn from a supernatural power, can only weaken the ties, for the simple reason that they are not those which are acknowledged by nature and reason. How little do we count upon the probity of him who is an honest man only so far as he is deceived, and that he believes in hell! Man ceases to hav religion when he ceases to hav any faith in the absurd stories which hav been told to him under that name, because it would seem that absurdity and miracles are the distinctiv characteristics of all religions, and that it is a general belief that a man cannot be honest without being a fool." ONE OF THE AUDIENCE.

Thorold, Ont, Can.

THE funny paper, Texas Siftings, sometime ago began publishing the weekly sermons of the Rev. Mr. Talmage, which assimilated quite harmoniously with the other current nonsense that the paper printed. When Talmage started out on his recent barnstorming tour, the publication of this particular department of the journal had to be suspended. The editors apologize thus:

"DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON.

("Owing to Dr. Talmage's absence from his pulpit, at the Brooklyn Tabernacle, for several weeks, his sermon has to be omitted for the present.")

The omission is supplied by a blood-curdling tale headed as follows.

"A TRAGEDY OF THE GULCH!

"REMARKABLE STORY OF A FRATRICIDE IN A COLORADO CABIN."

No complaints that the readers were not well satisfied probably being received, another week the sermon was replaced by a second yarn entitled:

"THE DEVIL TO PAY!

"A STRANGE STORY OF QUEER PEOPLE."

If Texas Siftings can keep this thing up, the publication of the Rev. Mr. Talmage's sermons will not need to be resumed.

The Alleged Life Beyond.

The friendly but vigorous discussion of the future life question that is going on, I think, will do much good, because, although but few conversions may be made, it will hav a tendency to rouse people out of intellectual ruts into which they hav fallen, and prevent them, to some extent, from "thinking along defined grooves,"as Herbert Spencer expresses it. Discussions on important subjects expand the mind, and create a keener interest in scientific analysis, the result of which is the acquisition of certain golden grains of truth, though these are often picked up where they were not sought. All real truth seekers try to divest themselvs of prejudice and preference when considering a question of any kind, but this is a difficult thing to do. Be as honest as we may, it always takes a little stronger evidence to lead us one way than it does to lead us the other. People generally approach certain subjects with more or less awe and bewilderment. Thus they are unfitted at the very start for a candid and searching investigation. Never mind the consequences when pursuing light and knowledge.

> "Felix, qui potuit rerum cognoscere causas,
> Atque metus omnis et inexorabile fatum
> Subjecit pedibus strepitumque Acherontis avari,"

Said the Mantuan bard nineteen centuries ago, and it is sound doctrin to-day. In the investigation of the causes of things, of all laws, of all phenomena, we should put aside all preconceived notions, whether held by priest or prophet, sage or savage, whether of very limited or of well-nigh universal acceptance, whether venerable with age or of yesterday's growth. Hope, fear, and love must be banished till the pursuit is over. Professor Bain, the great logician of Aberdeen University, says: "There is a natural tendency to believe much more than we hav any experience of." And also: "As we are so liable to extend our assertions beyond the facts, we should be particularly on our guard against universal declarations. This is one of the weaknesses of human nature, and a leading source of fallacy and error." Again: "The real evidence of the law of causation must be something different from our being disposed to believe it." It is noticeable that the majority of those who uphold modern Spiritualism are fond of contrasting their belief with what they consider the gloomy doctrin of Materialism and the Christian doctrin of endless punishment.

This is an exhibition of real magnaminity, but it is akin to the Jesuitical doctrin, first defended by Plato, that it is commendable to teach that which is or may be false, provided the effect of such teaching is beneficial; a doctrin, I may add, which the entire Christian world is practicing to-day. The Spiritualists would hav us believe in a future life whether it can be proved or not, because, for one reason, such belief is comforting while physical life lasts, at any rate. This is stepping backward while in search of light. It is shading that which we wish to illumine. It is eating the cake before you get it. It is bad doctrin. I do not assert that there is not and never can be any such thing as spirit-life, nor that no possible evidence could convince me that there is. The man who declares that his mind is immovably fixed on any point, implies either that he has exhausted all possible knowledge, present and future, on the subject, or that, should occasion require, he would ignore the evidence of his own reason. I simply hold that individual spirit existence has never been proved. So far as actual knowledge about them is concerned, human spirits stand just where the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost stand. Millions of people believe in the former, and other millions believe in the latter, but nobody knows anything about either. In support of this statement, though not absolutely conclusiv, I cite the fact that there are now many intelligent people in the world who once firmly believed, on what they considered ample evidence, in the truth of Spiritualism, but who now entirely reject it, and hav no faith in the performances of mediums. It is impossible that this could be so if those people had know what they thought they knew. No man can know anything and not know it at the same time. If they had known there were spirits, it would hav been as impossible for them ever to hav not known it, as it would be for them to cease to know that there is an earth on which they tread. Some enthusiastic Spiritualist may here reply: "Those backsliders did not know, but I do." Ah, but how can you convince the outsider that you really know any more about it than the others? I concede that the Spiritualist is not bound to show why spirits exist, to giv a minutely accurate description of them, or to explain how their lives are supported after leaving physical organisms. He is not bound to show that a universal belief in Spiritualism would hav a beneficial effect, or any effect whatever, on the morals or happiness of mankind. Let him first prove that spirits exist and hav the power of communicating with living people. Then it will be time to require further particulars. In the first place, this theory requires unusually clear, connected, and powerful evidence for its confirmation, from some source, because its alleged phenomena, its manifestations, with their accompanying performances, are nearly all absurd, unnatural, and contemptible. Who has ever given a sound reason, who can giv one, why a conscious, intelligent being, wishing to communicate seriously with a person, should require any table, cabinet, slates, circle, or medium? What sane person would expect a spirit to come in any one of the ways they are said to hav come, if he had never heard of the return of a spirit, but believed one was about to return? No one living, I believe.

One writer says that Professors Hare, Crookes, and Zoellner hav investigated, and "they say the facts are true." None of us will deny that facts are true, but the grand difficulty that confronts us all is to tell what are the facts. Can these professors show clearly to an unbeliever the difference between spirit and life? Can they prove conclusivly that a spirit is or is not necessary to a living person? If they cannot show clearly and positivly to the unbeliever that spirits exist and return, their opinions are worth no more than another person's. The indestructibility of matter is, I suppose, almost universally conceded in the civilized world. It is inconceivable that anything which cannot be destroyed could hav been created or created itself; hence I may say that matter never had a beginning. All known substances are comprehended in the general term, matter; therefore what is not matter is nothing. If I hav a spirit, it must be composed of matter, and therefore existed always in some form. Matter is none the less matter because it is invisible. If this spirit was always a conscious, individual being, it cannot be properly called my spirit, because it existed eternally independent of me, and its brief stay with me is only a breathng-spell in its endless career. Besides, if I had never been born, the spirit would hav gone on just the same, if there is no death for spirits. But if it did not always exist as a person, there must hav been a time when it began to exist. If it began to exist simultaneously with the physical organism and grew up with it, there is simply a dual being or else two different beings with the appearance of one, but the great problems of life and intelligence are as far from solution as ever.

How can one of two mutually dependent beings become independent more than the other? All life exists by virtue of death, and cannot exist without it. Animals and plants, and even members of our own species, must die in order to make our existence possible. All dead bodies become a part of the great sum total of matter from which they sprang, and they are constantly nourishing other living bodies; thus, though still ignorant of the great life principle, we can account for the continuous reproduction of terrestrial life in all its forms. But if spirits continue to liv, they take something from the sum total of matter but return nothing, and this course, in time, would exhaust the material universe, and it would become transformed into a vast, invisible army. There would be no planets to explore, nothing to rest upon, and no food supply; hence they must either die, or part of the host turn cannibal and devour the others. If it is objected that matter is probably infinit in amount, I reply that it is quite as propbable that the reproduction of animal life will continue forever in some part of the universe. If it is said that spirits hav no organs and require no food, it is nonsense to call them persons, or essential parts of persons. It is giving form and a robe to a thought and calling it something. When the scientist traces life downward through its lower forms, he finds that animals and plants converge more closely till at last they are so intricately blended in form and qualities that human analysis cannot distinguish them; hence we are forced to the conclusion that man, with all his superior faculties, is no higher in ultimate origin than the oyster and the thistle, and that no part of him, now or hereafter, can exist by virtue of special and separate laws. If evolution is true, and if man is the only creature that is immortal, when did the spirit take possession of the bodily frame? Did it come fully grown, or as an infant? Where did it come from? The preceding anthropoid ape either had a spirit or it had not. If it had none, then no amount of time could hav developed one in the successor, man; therefore, if man has an immortal spirit he got it from an outside source.

But suppose we reject evolution entirely. We must then fall back on the old theological creation or assume that man sprang up in some mysterious way, body, spirit and all. Start man in any way you please, the difficulties in the way of his eternal future existence remain insuperable, so far as we know. If the ape has an immortal soul, so has the dog, and the cat, and all the lower creatures, down to the lowest conscious thing, and if the present stock hav one, of course, all the multiplied millions and trillions of people and other creatures that ever lived are still living in invisible forms. As Bryant say in "Thanatopsis," "All that tread the globe are but a handful to the tribes that slumber in its bosom."

Now about the return of spirits. If spirits grow and progress as they are said to, they must hav some definit size, and each must take up some space. Considering the incalculable number of spirits that are living somewhere—if they liv at all—is it really probable that a particular spirit could always find room to make its way to any required spot at its own will, or at the desire of a certain medium? It may be said that there is plenty of room for all, because space is infinit in extent, but we must not forget that the space surrounding the inhabited part of this earth is comparativly very small. Other spirits may be crowded around the particular locality, and I suppose no one has the power to compel all spirits to retire to any certain distance. Suppose a man is suddenly buried one hundred feet deep in solid rock and dies three minutes afterward. Can his spirit reach the surface, the rock remaining firm? To say yes is to suppose it capable of contraction or attenuation to a degree that is inconceivable as the actual state, form, and size of a living, conscious person with the necessary organs. W. F. McCormick says that spirits are invisible, because they vibrate too rapidly to come within the range of vision—more than seven hundred and eighty-nine trillions of vibrations per second. But they become visible "by coating their spiritual bodies over with grosser matter taken from the medium and persons forming the circle."

The same process is resorted to in the production of sound. Now, if a spirit can actually take away the smallest particle of matter from a medium, it is logical to suppose that it can take away several particles. In fact, there is no telling how much, and several spirits might reduce the medium perceptibly, and a larger number carry him or her away entirely, leaving the medium a thinner party than the ghosts were before. Such fanciful calculations about the exploits of spirits may be very amusing to any one who has already "assumed" that Spiritualism is true, but they hav little weight with those who want to know that there is something to vibrate before they reckon its rapidity.

Ingersoll says, "Wherever man has lived, his religion has had another world in which to meet the lost." Doubtless that is true, but it does not touch the origin of the belief in immortality. In my opinion the origin and development of the idea of immortality was a wholly subjectiv procedure. Man loved life before he ever loved anything else. This love he inherited and transmitted. It was a part and a necessity of his nature. He clung to life and eventually wished that consciousness might not cease at death. The wish grew to a hope, and the hope to a vague belief. Beyond that, in all the lands and peoples—savage, pagan, Jewish, and Christian—it has never advanced. The primitiv man saw his fellows dying around him, and when he had reached the point at which he conceived it possible that he might liv beyond the grave, his reason told him that if he could liv, others could also, and then arose the hope of meeting his departed kindred. The hope of immortality is nothing more than the inborn love of life extended indefinitly.

Observation teaches man that he cannot always liv here, and he reaches out into the dark unknown. But all the wishes, hopes, and beliefs of all mankind weigh not a feather in the scale of proof. If the desire to liv forever was any proof of immortality, man would continue to liv in his physical body. As vitativness is a necessity to the perpetuation of the species, it is likely that while man continues to inhabit this globe he will wish that the spark of intelligence may not be hopelessly buried in the gloom of dissolution. Those who cry out so loudly about the horrible doctrin of the Materialist should remember that they are trying to look at the matter from two different standpoints at once. This cannot be done. Should they ever come to accept the view they now denounce, they would be apt to find that happiness is quite possible where now it seems impossible. Happiness is a mental state, and so long as we can attain it, does it make any difference, so far as this world is concerned, what our belief may be in regard to another?

Of course, I do not include actions growing out of beliefs. Do not imagin that this is a license to seek happiness by unworthy means. Virtue and vice, goodness and evil, with their unavoidable consequences, will continue the same whether there is a future life or not, and whether we believe there is or not. But there is one thing about the other world that I like. It is the only absolutely free country that has ever been known. You may hav a house with many mansions in it, or a mansion with houses in it, just as you please. You may build a beautiful palace, liv in a hut, lie on the ground summer and winter, or sail around in the air. You may dawdle along on a golden pavement, swinging an ivory-headed cane, pick your way through a tangled thornbrake, or wander in charming gsoves. You may hav hot and cold water and gas in every room, and no taxes to pay. If there are any capitalists there—which is doubtful—they hav lost their grip. The labor question is solved.

You may plant corn, build railroads, dig in mines, or play base-ball. You may wrap yourself in furs and skate on ice in July, and scrape an old fiddle on Sunday. You may dress in or out of the fashion, wear a Mother Hubbard or a train, either freight or passenger. You may institute any system you please—Free love, no love, monogamy, bigamy, trigamy, deuterogamy, spinsterhood, or etcettery.

You may take leave of your friends with a distant hand-shake, or adopt the Plymouth pastor's paroxysmal kiss. If you cannot arrange things satisfactorily, there is no one to blame but yourself. Amen.

Montezuma, New York.

The impeturbable serenity of Remsburg and Reynolds, and their prompt repartee to fierce charges made, and perfect nonchalance amidst the wild, savage gestures and fierce imprecations of the devout Christians, overawed those most desirous of lynching them.

In spite of frantic efforts to prevent attendance, at 3 o'clock the hall was two-thirds full. Daniel was eager for the judgment, and stamped and raved for one hour and a quarter. Twice Mr. Reynolds called his attention to the flight of time, and that he had not yet said one word in regard to the subject he himself selected, "The Atonement." The audience got tired and weary, and at half-past four the chairman called the Rev. Hull to order. Mr. Reynolds declared there was nothing for him to answer. The reverend gentleman reminded him of Dickens's "Dombey and Son," the opinions and mode of expression were so much like Bunsby. Mr. Reynolds proved from the Bible: 1. That the Bible plan of atonement was unjust and absurd; 2. That Christ did not make any atonement. The Bible said, "The soul that sinneth it shall die" (Ezek. xviii, 4). The Bible says the soul is doomed to death. Christians claim "Jesus came to pay the penalty. He poured out his precious blood on Calvary's cross to save our immortal souls from death. He, the blessed Jesus, the son of God, a God co-equal with the father, died that we might liv."

Did Christ's soul die? If so, he was not God, for a dead God is an absurdity. The church declares Christ's soul did not, could not, die; but the Bible and Christ declare his soul did die (Isa. liii, 10, 12; Rev. i, 18). Which shall we believe, either, or neither? If Christ's soul did die, as the Bible says it did, then he could not hav been God.

If not God, he could not hav died for us. But according to the Bible, Christ needed a savior for himself (Rom. v, 12).

The church declares he poured out his precious blood on Calvary's cross to save poor sinners.

According to the Bible account of his crucifixion, Christ never poured out any blood. He died with less and shorter suffering than any other who ever was crucified.

Smith's Bible Dictionary, the standard orthodox authority, says, "He was watched, according to custom, by a party of four soldiers with their centurion, whose express office was to prevent the stealing of the body. This was necessary from the lingering character of the death, which sometimes did not supervene even for three days, and was at last the result of gradual benumbing and starvation."

Neither Matthew nor Mark says anything of any shedding of blood.

Luke tells of the agony in the garden of Gethsemane (Luke xxii, 44). "And his sweat was as it were great drops of blood" (Greek, hosi, "just as if," "as it were," "something like").

John alone tells us of any blood at the crucifixion. "But when they came to Jesus and saw that he was dead already, they brake not his legs, but one of the soldiers pierced his side, and forthwith came there out blood and water" (John xix, 33, 34). A dead man could not shed his blood to save any one, yet according to the divinely-inspired New Testament no blood was shed by Jesus until after he was dead.

But suppose Christ did pour out his blood, and his soul died on Calvary, what do Christians claim as the result? "That at death of all who believe this, their immortal soul takes its flight beyond the realms of time and space, and goes to God who gave it." What is the immortal soul? All Christians argue the immortal soul is immaterial, indivisible, without form or parts, cannot be seen, felt, smelt, or tasted. This is the best possible definition of nothing. Where does this nothing or immortal soul go at death? Beyond the realms of time and space. When beyond time, where are we? Nowhere. When beyond space, where should we be? Nowhere. Then the atonement of Christ insured nothing going nowhere.

But Christians declare God is everywhere. Now, if a person dies in this room, if God is everywhere, what need the immortal soul should go anywhere? How could it go to find God if God is everywhere?

Mr. Reynolds then called attention to the necessity of real salvation for all here and now—salvation from error, ignorance, superstition, and the dominion of priestcraft, and showed the necessity of organizing local Leagues in every neighborhood for the promotion of scientific education and sociability. His remarks were loudly applauded. Mr. Ross asked the Rev. Daniel Hull if he was satisfied. He said he had received more favor, courtesy, and privilege at this Infidel meeting than he had at any of the minister's meetings. But when the people voted unanimously to hear an Infidel like Remsburg, instead of a believer in Christ, explain the plan of salvation, he would say no more.

The fact of so large attendance only irritated the good Christians, and their excitement only aroused intense desire to hear. Despite threatening rain and storm, the house was crowded as early as 7 o'clock Friday evening. Mr. Remsburg delivered his great masterpiece, "False Claims," and the opposition and abuse he had suffered inspired him with force and vigor of delivery that was electrifying, and made an impression on all present that will never be effaced. In spite of prejudice and the shattering of their idols he forced from the audience frequent long and hearty applause.

He was followed by Ex-Rev. Reynolds on "Salvation." The commingling of humor and pathos won their attention and held their interest, and there is little doubt but his concluding appeal to those who favored Liberalism to report to Mr. Ross or Mr. Travers their names as members of the Montezuma Liberal League, will giv quite a number courage to respond.

Soon as Messrs. Remsburg and Reynolds announced their departure in the morning, a young doctor announced that the lecture of Mr. Remsburg on "Bible Morals" would be answered at the Methodist church on Sunday, and all were invited to attend. Mr. Ross inquired if Mr. Remsburg would be awarded the privilege to reply. The doctor said the reply to the lecture, "Bible Morals," would be by a gentleman who had not heard Mr. Remsburg, and at another place than where the lecture was delivered, and so if Mr. Remsburg desired to answer his reviewer he must do so at some other time and place. The same old tactics. Undaunted courage of priestcraft when sure opponents are far away.

Mr. Remsburg says in four years' constant work, from East to West, and North to South, he never before witnessed so much fierce, bitter, and vindictiv hate as at Montezuma.

CHAS. B. REYNOLDS,
Ch'n Ex. Com. N. L. L.

A Noteworthy Circumstance.

A century ago, in this country, there was much more skepticism in the South than there was in the North. The slipshod kind of religion they had in the South did not terrorize the people and stifle thought, as Puritanism did in the Northern states. Jefferson's influence in this line was decided and far-reaching. All, or nearly all, the lawyers, physicians, and politicians of that day and section, even if they did not attack the popular superstition as Jefferson did, like Washington, gave it the go-by. Had this sentiment been organized into a school and perpetuated itself as other organizations do, it is extremely probable that the whole history of the South, from that day to this, would be entirely different from what it is. There would never hav been any attempt at secession, and the South, with her superior natural advantages of soil, climate, and adaptation to the cultivation of the cotton-plant, would by this time hav been farther advanced in civilization than the North. For it is a historical fact that skepticism—infidelity to the reigning superstition—has evermore been opposed to the enslavement of human beings, and in favor of mental and personal freedom. It is religion that has stained the earth with human blood.

But when, in 1830 or thereabouts, the men who concocted the plan for dissolving the Union—Calhoun, McDuffie, et id omne genus—came upon the stage, they found that to carry out their purposes of founding a new government composed of the Southern states, with negro slavery as its chief cornerstone, it was necessary to get the religious sentiment of the South in its favor and make the enterprise a kind of crusade for the glory of God. This was an easy task to perform, for in both the Old Testament and the New they had not only verbal authority for the doctrin that human slavery was right and lawful, but they had the cumulativ argument in the practice of the "covenanted people of God," who had the divine sanction for making slaves of the heathens round about.

Every one must hav been struck with the singular fact, during the rebellion, that, from Jefferson Davis down to the corporal in the army, the rebel officers, with but few exceptions, were all exceedingly pious. Stevens, Lee, Jackson, and indeed pretty much all the civilians and soldiers of the Confederacy were very religious. One of the major-generals was an orthodox bishop, who left the cure of souls and entered the army, and was the means, no doubt, of sending many a Yankee's soul to hell. They seemed as if they thought that by their zeal in this line they could cajole God to head their battalions and march them on to victory. The religious teachers had brought themselvs and the politicians to believe that God was bound by his attributes to interpose in their behalf, when the object of the war was to honor him by erecting a political government upon the divine institution of slavery. And I heard a religious Southerner, a few years ago, say that when the clergy saw that God calmly looked on and allowed the Northern soldiers to crush the armies of the South, some of them became so disgusted with him for going back upon his own institution that they actually denied his existence altogether and became Atheists.

But since the war we see that during all that reign of evangelical piety there was much latent skepticism, which is beginning to come out and to find utterance in the Liberal papers of the North. Among these long imprisoned but now liberated skeptics is Mr. Albert Chavannes, of Knox Co., Tennessee. He is the editor of a monthly, called The Sociologist, and is an able thinker and writer. Then there is Dr. Lazarus, of Alabama, who has written some important articles for our Radical papers, East and West. Then, also, a Tennessean, named Simpson, who probably was a preacher formerly, but, having been cured of his tongue-tie, speaks out vigorously in the Investigator. And I hav just read, in the Boston Index, the second number of a series of articles by Edmund Montgomery, of Texas, who is an enthusiastic scientist and, of course, a non-believer in the popular superstition. It is to be hoped that these gentlemen are spokesmen of a much larger number in the South whose hearts are with us in the cause of popular enlightenment. But it will take years of toiling and waiting before the South will become intellectually free. She is delivered from the system of slavery which sat upon all her interests as an incubus, but she will hav to writhe for many years under the greater curse of church superstition. The religion of the colored people, who now number 6,000,000, is but little removed from the fetichism of their African ancestors; and that of the majority of the white people is not much better; while the orthodoxy of the upper classes is on a par with what we see here, and is a mere badge of respectability and social standing.

Is Professor Proctor Proselyted?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I see in the New York Herald, that Proctor, of England, formerly astronomer and Atheist, is reported as saying, "We know nothing of the origin of worlds, and the only consolation is the knowledge or belief that God made them."

Such talk is trash, and bespeaks a cowardly knuckling to popular superstition by a man supposed to be a headlight of science.

If we know nothing of the origin of worlds, where does the knowledge that God made them come in?

What consolation can the baseless belief that God made the world afford, since his existence still remains to be accounted for?

JOHN P. GUILD.

New York.

Humanity in American Poetry.

From the Montreal Gazette of January 9th.

There was a good attendance in the Freethought hall, last evening, on the occasion of a lecture by Mr. S. P Putnam, of New York, on the subject of "The Spirit of Humanity in American Poetry." Humanity, said the lecturer, was the essential spirit of poetry. The more human we are, the more poetic we are. It was not any belief in the gods that made poetry possible, but a vivid experience about ourselvs. American literature is a fresh and natural product, something breathing of the very soil itself. There had been much imitation, but there were genuin singers who sang because nature compelled them to do so. The most original American poets were Bryant, Poe, Walt Whitman, and Bret Harte. Bryant looked upon the vast physical aspects, and all his poetry was full of the spirit of physical surroundings. He was, however, not intense with the spirit of humanity. Poe was highly original and the most skilful artist in words, but his lurid pages possessed little humanity. Walt Whitman was altogether of the new world, and partook of its roughness. Bret Harte was equally original and humanitarian, besides more artistic and possessing a wonderfully subtle humor. His writings were based on personal observation, and made the most enduring literature for profitable instruction as well as for perpetual delight. The poet of America in all his writings must realize the infinit majesty of man, that what he feels and thinks and does, under whatever circumstances, is of more import than what any other can think, feel, or do. The proper study of mankind is man. All the accompaniments of his civilization, however rude, are to be rendered in the light of poetry. Man was a physical being to be ennobled. In America, especially, must the physical aspects of life be vindicated as to their poetic and artistic value. The poet of the future must also recognize the demands of science; she must be his most potent guide, not to make poetry, but to furnish its most brilliant forms.

The poet must realize the inward as well the outward. The finite is bosomed in the infinit, and the poet had to realize this quality of mystery. He must also emphasize the moral element, that there is good and evil, that this universe is an eternal battle-ground, and that we must giv ourselvs to the good, not because we find it will triumph, but because it is the dearest part of ourselvs. The humanitarian poet must be the poet of labor. He must see that labor was the true creativ force of this planet, and sing of it with more eloquence than Homer sang of his gods and heroes. The noblest singer is he who with deft fingers touches the strings of our humblest joys; who awakes the music of the humblest tasks of life; who roams not in the palaces to gather the jewels of a deathless crown, but amid the cottages, the daisies, and the primroses, and the sweet fields where glows and ripens the harvest of our common work.

The lecture, which was illustrated with quotations throughout, was of a most interesting nature, and was listened to with deep attention. Mr Putnam will lecture this evening in the same hall on "The New American Church."

The Coming Coalition.

One of the guarantees of safety from religious persecution has been the bitterness of Protestant sectarian strife, and the cordial hatred all the sects, from Calvinistic to Unitarian, hav entertained for the mother church of Rome. This agreement to disagree, and to fight it out on that line, had a very potent influence in the establishment of religious freedom by our Revolutionary sires. A few of the most influential of the framers of our government honestly and sincerely believed in making an unsectarian republic, a republic which should allow men to hav any or no religion, as they pleased, but the majority of the people of the last century were not in favor of a secular government, but only of an unsectarian polity, and that simply because their particular sect had no chance of securing plenary power. The sects distrusted each other, and most of all distrusted the Catholicism of Maryland, which state at that time had a loud voice in the councils of the embryo nation. And from that time to this, such exemption as the Infidels hav enjoyed from governmental persecution has been owing rather to this harsh strain of discord between Protestants and Catholics than to any toleration in the two systems of religion.

But now signs of a making-up of their differences are multiplying thick and fast. The latest is the almost unqualified commendation of the pastoral letter of the late Romish Plenary Council by the official journal of the Methodist church. The lion and the tiger are making love, and their amorous embraces bode no good to the common prey. The pastoral letter commands that in the homes of Catholics shall be admitted no "publication tending to weaken faith in the religion and the church of Jesus Christ." "This," says the Methodist church through its organ, "is worthy of all commendation." Does this imply that Methodism is going to hav an Index Expurgatorius, as well as Rome? Shall no criticism of his faith be read by a Methodist? John Wesley would never hav refused to meet an opponent, or to allow discussion of his new salvation plan. Is the Methodist church so far gone that it must go back to mediævalism—to mental stagnation and intellectual death?

Upon the subject of the Sabbath the Catholic church has heretofore been more nearly allied to Liberalism than to Methodism. Is this utterance of the Council an admission that Rome feels the need of Protestant aid to overcome the Rationalistic tendencies of the times?

"We earnestly appeal to all Catholics, without distinction, not only to take no part in any movement tending toward a relaxation of the observance of Sunday, but to use their influence and power as citizens to resist in the opposit direction."

This exhortation, thinks the Methodist church, "should be observed by all." Of course.

Another, and a most hypocritical paragraph, is also reprinted and indorsed. It is concerning "the pastor's relation to the church:"

"Since, therefore, the priests of God leave all things to devote themselvs to your spiritual welfare, show by your affection, by your co-operation with their efforts for your spiritual improvement, and even by your care for their physical comfort, that you appreciate their devotedness and the reciprocal obligation which it imposes. If duty sometimes calls upon them to admonish or rebuke you, remember that the reproof is meant for your good, and take it in the spirit in which it is given."

Since when hav either Catholic priests or Methodist ministers left all things to help their parishioners? Catholic priests liv better than their flocks. In the very poorest parishes, where the revenues come from servant girls and day-laborers, who oftentime go ragged and insufficiently clothed, hungry and miserable wretches that they are, the priest has raiment of the best, and feeds right royally, "his fair round belly with good capon lined," and not a thought of want or care obtrudes itself upon him. Methodist bishops get $3,000 a year and a residence, and the ministers receive from salaries and fees for christening, marrying, and burying their parishioners all the way from one to ten or fifteen thousand dollars a year. We do not say the people hav not a right to pay them what they choose, but the sniveling cry that they leave all to benefit their people is the rankest hypocrisy.

A change in the relations of Protestantism and Catholicism most significant is also apparent in other directions than the Methodist church. Not only is the editorial from which we hav quoted the foregoing very tender of the feelings of Catholics, but other Protestant church papers are putting on the kid gloves of speech when touching Rome. Calvinistic, Congregational, even Unitarian journals profess respect for the "grand old institution, the stanch bulwark of faith against Infidelity." It looks to an observing one of the latter class that a combined raid of all the churches will soon be made upon the heretics. Either it is that, or it is the despairing cry of "Help me, Cassius, ere I sink."

How the Tax Payers of New York State are Swindled.

Very few are aware of the amount of church property in this state to which the tax gatherer never pays a visit. The following table will show to what enormous extent the churches are filching from that property which cannot escape the assessor by the plea of "holy."

If this were taxed at two per cent (a low average rate), it would yield a revenue to city, county, and state of $2,351,943, or something over fifty cents for each man, woman, and child in the state. But this is not all. It costs the state not less than half a million a year to protect this property, equal to another ten cents drawn from every man, woman, and child in the state. And in cities, gas-pipes, and water pipes are laid by the churches, and the municipality foots the bill. What this amounts to there is no basis for estimating. But probably this church property costs the state, in exemption and by protection, not less than three million dollars per annum. What corporation is there, soul-saving or other, that would not be jubilant over such a magnificent annual subsidy?

Who enjoys the luxury of this? About one-fifth of the people—to be exact, 1,177,470, for that is the church-membership in this state, out of a population of about five million. We hav no fault to find that these eleven hundred and odd thousand tax themselvs some $15,308,231 a year to pay some seven or eight thousand ministers' salaries, but we do most strenuously object to see the nearly four millions of other folks taxed to support churches to which they do not belong—which is what the exemption, protection, and other privileges practically amount to.

We commend the above figures to the members of our legislature. They form a more eloquent plea for justice than lips can frame or pen indite. And if there be a Freethinker in Assembly or Senate, we urge him in the name of the blind-folded goddess to present a bill to right this monstrous wrong.

Capt. Isaiah Rynders, Consistent Christian.

The death, last week, of Capt. Rynders, of this city, recalls the great changes that hav taken place since ante-bellum times. Capt. Rynders was on the wrong side in those days, and looked at the Abolitionists as dangerous fanatics and wicked disturbers of the peace of the Republic. Though for him we ought, perhaps, to use the back-end-of-the-dictionary epitaph, De mortuis nil nisi bonum, his prominence in the politics of the past and present does not allow entire forgetfulness of the days when he worked with the pro-slavery orators, and proved from the Bible, with all the glibness of the preacher, that it was a religious duty to keep the "children of Ham" in slavery.

At the old Tabernacle in Broadway, near the City Hall, the anti-slavery people used to hold meetings at which the speakers were usually greeted with abusiv cries and sometimes the unpleasant missils of their opponents. On one of these occasions Capt. Rynders, exasperated by his attack on Zachary Taylor, rushed to the platform, seized William Lloyd Garrison by the collar, and threatened to throw him off the stage if he repeated his words.

Yet Capt. Rynders only represented the popular sentiment—the sentiment of the ministers and of most of their congregations. His treatment of Mr. Garrison was mild in comparison with that which the great abolitionist leader suffered at the hands of the "solid" men of Boston in October, 1835, when a mob composed of "gentlemen of property and standing" partly stripped him and proposed to hang him on Boston Common. Garrison escaped the lynching only by the interference of the authorities, who lodged him in jail for safety.

Capt. Rynders preserved his Christianity to the day of his death, which was the Monday after Colonel Ingersoll lectured here. The early part of the day he spent in arguing with a Freethinking friend against the heresies expounded in the Academy of Music the night before. The lecturer as well as the lecture came in for a generous share of his impetuous and profane, though pious, denunciation.

In Capt. Rynders has passed away, perhaps, the last of the prominent Northern pro-slavery men. He was about the same age as Elizur Wright, one of his most hearty opponents on the questions of slavery and Christianity. He was sincere and honest in upholding the "divine institution," and did not, as the church did, turn his coat the moment the slave was liberated and claim the credit. In slavery days he hated the abolitionists for what they did for the negro. In his later days he hated them because they are nearly all Infidels.

An Exhortation to the Defenders of the Faith.

The task of "answering" Colonel Ingersoll has been left thus far mainly with the lesser lights of the clerical profession, and he has been challenged to almost innumerable debates by obscure parsons who need the notoriety such a discussion would bring them in order to be known to the public at all. Although in seeking such a debate they would be following the example of the misguided person who committed suicide to get his name in the papers, still they profess to be eager for the fray. Such is not the case with the mugwumps of the church. These do not desire to pit themselvs against the champion before whose lance they would lose saddle and stirrup in the first shock. They hav not the honesty, however, to declare their real reasons for shunning the encounter, and seclude themselvs behind the fictitious plea that his arguments hav all been answered. The New York Graphic reads them a useful lesson on this subject. It says:

"The earlier the teachers of orthodox religion learn that Robert G. Ingersoll is the most formidable enemy revealed religion has ever had, the better it will be for the cause of Christianity. The attempts of some clerical drivelers to pooh-pooh this American Voltaire and flippantly dismiss his sledge-hammer logic as unworthy of their learned consideration, only excite the derision of their intelligent hearers. The obstinate fact remains, however we may wish it otherwise, that Ingersoll is to-day the most eloquent orator in the United States, or probably in the world, unless we except Emilio Castelar. His invectiv is tremendous in its power. His points strike average men with the force of a pitchfork. The weapon of ridicule which he most adroitly and audaciously employs against religion, is wielded with tenfold more force than it was used by any of the famous or notorious Infidels who hav preceded him. We hav a scoffer and a skeptic greater than Volney, greater than Paine, more powerful than Hume, and more potent than Voltaire. Let the ablest of the divines buckle on their orthodox armor, and vanquish Ingersoll—if they can."

That is to the point. The colonel has entered the lists—a veritable Goliah of Gath. Where is David? There must still be pebbles in the brook, unless we are to conclude that they hav all been gathered and nothing been left but the mud with which it is the delight of the Christian to load his sling. If the prominent clergy honestly think that Colonel Ingersoll is mistaken, they should come forth and meet him with the courage of their convictions

"And the stern joy which warriors feel
In foemen worthy of their steel."

The Influence of Position.

CHRIST (upon the cross): "Father, forgiv them; for they know not what they do" (Luke xxiii, 34).

CHRIST (upon the throne): "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels" (Matt. xxv, 41).

INGERSOLL: "Is it possible that a little position can hav such an effect as that in changing a man's character?"

The Story Hour.

Our book for the young folks is being rapidly appreciated, which is as it should be. The book is—but we will let Miss Wixon say it:

FALL RIVER, MASS., Jan. 14, 1885.

DEAR FRIEND: The "Story Hour" appeared before me two days ago. It is just lovely—a perfect jewel of its kind. You hav made it very pretty and attractiv, and it cannot fail to please everybody, whether of our "faith" or any other. The illustrations are numerous and beautiful, and the picture of "Our Susie" is lifelike, and a credit to the Moss Engraving Co. The paper is excellent, the print clear and distinct, and the stories and poems—well, we will let the readers judge of them, and will only repeat what a middle-aged friend said of them this morning. "My dear," said she, "the 'Story Hour' is just as good reading for grown-up children as little ones. I enjoy the stories very much."

I know they are healthy and sensible, and I trust the two thousand copies printed will soon be exhausted, and another large edition be demanded. The publication of such a work, elegant in design and finish, and truly Liberal, is the very first effort of the kind ever attempted in this country, or in the whole world, so far as I know, and if the patronage of this book warrants, there will follow other books of a similar character, which will fill a long-felt want in the Liberal world.

You may send me twenty copies of the "Story Hour" as soon as you receive this, with bill for the same.

Yours very truly, SUSAN H. WIXON.

The Great Day.

Instead of the usual lecture and discussion at the Liberal Club on the 30th, the evening will be set apart for a celebration of the birth of THOMAS PAINE. There will be speeches, and music, and recitations, and everybody is invited to attend and help to make the occasion a memorable one.

Remember the date and place—Friday evening, Jan. 30th, at German Masonic Hall, 220 East Fifteenth street.

Editorial Notes.

THE Nevada legislature recently spent over an hour discussing the propriety of hiring chaplains. It was finally decided to hire them at $3 50 per prayer, which is considerable more than a prayer is worth, to say nothing of the injustice of squandering the people's money in that way.

ONE of our Methodist exchanges salutes 1885 this way: "May the new year, now fairly opened, giv true peace and solid prosperity to our readers!" Now we read the exchange regularly, and are set to wondering if the editor wishes us "true peace," and THE TRUTH SEEKER "solid prosperity."

TEH Rev. J. P. Jones writes to the Independent:

"Rationalists and many other opponents of Christianity indulge in no little rhetoric against what they are pleased to term the 'over-credulity' of Christians. And yet when any religious vagary—even though it be a most crude and vulgar superstition—is let loose upon a community, these devotees of reason and champions of unbelief are the first to be duped by the new superstition."

We judge from the foregoing statement what we hav often surmised on general principles, that there is no falsehood so mean or so palpably absurd that a minister cannot be found to utter it, if only it contains a slander on Freethought. The Rev. Mr. Jones's assertion is so bald and so devoid of support by facts that we hav no doubt he knew it to be a lie when he wrote it.

THIS is the way the Boston Pilot slurs the English missionaries:

"'Civilized by English missionaries' means more than the words imply. It means that the 'nativs' were found by England honest, simple, pure, sober, truthful, and probably warlike, and that the civilizing influence of their conquerors has make them a race of drunkards, liars, prostitutes, and depraved serfs."

WE call special attention to Mr. E. A. Stevens's advertisment of the Paine statuette. It is a fine work of art, and now that Paine is being publicly honored all over the country, it will be very appropriate that Freethinkers should prolong the honor by purchasing one of these statuettes and placing it in in their parlors. The likeness to Paine is accurate, the position graceful, and the sculpturing splendidly done. The design is the one that has been accepted for the Lincoln Park Monument, in Chicago, to be erected so soon as money enough has been raised to defray expenses.

"Two cautions to churches," remarks a noted working "divine," "are necessary at this season. First, keep your property insured; second, look well to the condition of your furnaces. . . Ten or twelve churches hav been damaged or destroyed by fire during the last ten days." The oldest inhabitant can remember when stoves were unallowable heresies, and insurance policies, like lightning reds, impious measures for thwarting the divine will, for, it was argued, if God wanted to destroy his own buildings, puny man had no right to interfere by putting conductors of the electric fluid upon the roof, or avert by insurance policies the consequences of God's wrath which came in the shape of consuming fire. O tempora! O mores!

ACCORDING to Dr. Buckley, the roller-skating craze is an epidemic, complaints of the demoralizing effects of which hav from time to time reached into the inner sanctum of the official Methodist church journal. That the roller-skate is a device of the devil is proved to his satisfaction thus:

"The craze is a direct antagonist of all religious efforts. A pastor whose church is within three miles of the City Hall informs us that twelve young ladies in his congregation hav lost all interest in religion since they became subjects of this craze, and that several hav formed associations very grievous to their parents."

Too bad, too bad! But Mr. Buckley must remember that the Lord once "devised a device against them," and how does he know that the roller-skate is not that very device?

THE discussion of the subject of spirit existence at the Liberal Club last week, of which a somewhat detailed account will be found elsewhere in this paper, was not without value to both Spiritualists and Materialists. There is evidence that not all who spoke upon the question brought to the discussion a great amount of philosophical thought, but the remarks of one speaker were particularly suggestiv. This speaker held that spirit, being a form of matter, even though highly sublimated, was amenable to the law of change which governs throughout the domain of material things. This being so, the process of growth and decay cannot be said to finish its work upon the human being with the death of the body; and although Longfellow has hinted that

"Dust thou art, to dust returnest,
Was not spoken of the soul,"

such may nevertheless be the fact. Many intelligent believers in immortality hold that spirit is, so to speak, a subtilized form of matter. Does the speaker to whom we hav alluded confront them with a fresh difficulty, or is the argument old and already refuted?

A PARIS correspondent of the Nonconformist says: "There can be no doubt that the question of dis-establishment in France has made rapid strides during the past few months. The total suppression of the public worship estimates, though defeated by 367 to 133 votes, is far nearer realization than the bare figures of the division would lead one to imagin. The apparently imposing majority of 367 is easily analyzed. It includes the members of the Right, who are anxious that the republic should continue to pay the clergy, and are equally anxious that the clergy should remain hostil to the republic. Add to these a few Republicans, who imagin that with a few kindly words a modus vivendi may be established between church and state, or, at all events, that the enemies of the existing constitution may be effectivly disarmed. Add, again, the important group of which M. Paul Bert is the mouthpiece, and La Republique Francaise is the accredited organ, which is eager to maintain the Concordat as a weapon against Catholicism itself, an Erastian system in which the clergy will be held in a state of bondage and weakness. Finally, the majority includes a number of Liberals, who believe in the separation of church and state, but who are reluctant to carry it out in the course of a Budget debate. M. Paul Bert is evidently seeking to govern the church in order to annihilate her; but it is evident that the state can exercise but very little influence on the action of the clergy, from the highest to the lowest. The Chamber has suppressed the annual subvention granted to the Catholic Faculties of Theology, but has reaffirmed its decision to maintain the Protestant Faculties—the former, to the number of five, being frequented by no more than thirty-seven students."

M. C. DWIGHT, of Clearwater Harbor, Florida, has the thanks of all connected with THE TRUTH SEEKER office for a large box of some of the most delicious oranges that ever grew in the everglades—if they did grow in the everglades, of which we are uncertain.

"CHRISTIANITY A REWARD FOR CRIME" is the title of a pamphlet just issued from this office. O. B. Whitford, M.D., is the author, and the price is ten cents.

The Milwaukee Exposition.

Milwaukee, as well as New Orleans, has an Industrial Exposition, and the same question of Sunday opening comes up. New Orleans has wisely decided to open the gates of its big fair on the first as well as the last day of the week. And if the efforts of the "League for the Protection of Personal Liberty" of Milwaukee shall be successful, the working people and tradesmen of that city will be enabled to obtain the benefits of the Exposition. Mr. P. A. Stuart, the corresponding secretary of the League, has sent to all the stockholders of the Exposition (the directors having voted against Sunday opening) a circular in which the following points are made in favor of liberty:

MILWAUKEE, January 5, 1885.

To the Stockholders of the Milwaukee Industrial Exposition Association.

GENTLEMEN: As our letter of August last to the Board of Directors of the Exposition Association was referred to the Stockholders, to be voted on at their next annual meeting, we desire to present the following reasons why the Exposition should be kept open Sundays:

First. There exists a natural and growing desire on the part of a large percentage of our citizens in favor of Sunday amusements and resorts; hence, the most instructiv, educativ, as well as attractiv places should be provided, where those inclined can spend at least a portion of their Sunday in a desirable and profitable manner.

Second. Sunday is the only day during the entire week on which business men and the working class are free from labor; it is their accustomed holiday, when they feel free to enjoy themselvs in such ways as their inclination may dictate. A large proportion of this class would gladly avail themselvs of an opportunity to visit the Exposition with their families and friends if found open on Sundays. Working people as a rule prefer to attend the Exposition in the day time. Further, the average working man is too tired after an arduous day's labor, and feels little inclination to seek recreation in the evening. To attend on week days would involve the loss of at least a half day, which but few can afford. It is true that heretofore a few manufacturers hav kindly allowed their workmen a half day's leave of absence, but such cases are not numerous.

Third. Would a Sunday Exposition prove profitable, and would it be well patronized? In proof of this, and in order to show the popularity of Sunday resorts in general, we cite the Academy of Music, Opera House, Stadt Theater, Dime Museum, Slensby's Theater, and other places where large crowds are wont to assemble every Sunday afternoon and evening, the attendance on those occasions being larger and yielding a better income than on week days. We also direct your attention to the Reading Room of the Public Library, also to the Public Museum (in Exposition building), both of which are open to the public during a portion of Sunday, with a larger attendance than on other days. A Sunday Exposition would induce regular excursions into the city from neighboring cities and towns, thus affording thousands of people, including country merchants (whose stores are closed on that day), a convenient opportunity to visit the Exposition, of which they would gladly avail themselvs.

Fourth. It has been urged by a few former exhibitors that a Sunday exhibit would involve extra expense and labor. At the low wages that average clerks receive in this city, there are few but who would gladly avail themselvs of any extra pay that might be tendered them. We are confident that the Sunday attendance would be so great that exhibitors would feel amply repaid for the outlay. While, perhaps, a few former exhibitors might decline to make exhibits on account of a Sunday opening, there are others in the same line of business, more charitably inclined toward their fellow-men, who would gladly fill their places.

Fifth. In order to show popular public sentiment in the matter of Sunday Exposition openings in other cities, we would direct your attention to the following, which we clip from the Milwaukee Sentinel of a recent date:

"SUNDAY AT THE EXPOSITION.—NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 21, 1884.—A large number of visitors were present at the Exposition to-day. The day was bright, the air mild, and from an early hour in the morning people began to enter the gates in crowds. Much opposition has been manifested by a portion of the Protestant clergy to the opening of the Exposition on Sunday, and when it was announced that the management had decided to keep it open in the interest of the working classes who could not attend any other day, many were curious to see what the result would be. It entirely justified the wisdom of the course of the managers. A larger or more orderly crowd has not been seen on the grounds since the opening day. In order that their limited means might not serve to prevent the working classes from taking advantage of the opportunity, the price of admission had been reduced from fifty to twenty-five cents."

The Evening Wisconsin says editorially under date of December 22d:

"The decision to keep the New Orleans Exposition open on Sundays, exhibits a tendency upon the subject which is likely, ere long, to prevail throughout the United States wherever expositions are known."

Der Herold of December 19th favors a Sunday opening of the Milwaukee Exposition as follows:

"SUNDAY QUESTIONS IN THE EXPOSITION.—The position of the Herold is well-known to its readers, but we desire once more to giv the reasons which, in our opinion, necessitate the opening of the Exposition on Sunday. It is impossible for most working men, for whose education the istitution principally exists, to visit the Exposition on week days. In the next place the Exposition could be oftener visited by country people if open on Sunday, as they hav more time for excursions, which could be arranged oftener than heretofore. The proposed innovation would be of great benefit to the stockholders financially, because the Sunday attendance would be very large, and consequently yield greater receipts. The opponents of the innovation giv but two reasons, which can easily be contradicted. One, that it would be a desecration of the Sabbath to open a Sunday Exposition, and induce people to visit it. instead of attending church, can be easily refuted. The Exposition is not a place of amusement in the same light as we view theaters, but, on the contrary, is rather a place of information for the people, which should not giv offense to the most religious: and even if it were classified with theaters, we do not see why these should be open on Sunday and the Exposition closed. People who attend church regularly would not be prevented from doing this, should the innovation be introduced; besides, they hav sufficient time to visit both church and Exposition if they do not want to miss either. At any rate, the experiment could be made, and if it proves unsatisfactory, the old system could be resumed."

Letters from Friends.

GALESBURG, ILL., Jan. 5, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Perceiving many of our opponents seem to be ignorant of the spiritual theory, supposing of necessity it requires supernatural laws and miraculous power, and that there is no existing substance beyond the reach of our five senses through a chemical process, upon these two points I wish to make a few remarks through THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Friendly reader, I wish to call your attention to the following comments on these two questions: 1st. I will name mind and thought. 2d. The power and law that produce form and growth. 3d. The power and law that produce life. 4th. And life itself. What are they, and what are they composed of? They may be considered the powers and laws of nature from the fact there are no powers and laws but that are natural. The powers and laws that rule the universe are adapted to the nature of that which they govern. The power and laws that rule the planets are suited to the nature of that department or portion of the universe, and it is the same with the four kingdoms with which man is connected, the mineral, the vegetable, the animal, and the spiritual; of these man is a compound of the whole; put him through a chemical process and you will find mineral, vegetable, and animal, but his spiritual substance, life, mind, and thought (yet the most essential parts of man), cannot be reached by a chemical process, from the fact that they belong to the spiritual kingdom, which is different in its nature. The powers and laws that govern these kingdoms are adapted to the nature of each kingdom, and it requires no more supernatural law and miraculous power to form and giv growth to a full spiritual organization than to form and giv growth to a potato; each belongs to its own kingdom, all natural and grand, each one in its place.

But what are they composed of—are they material, or hav they only substance? To deny both is to deny they exist; and to admit either is an acknowledgment there is substance that a chemical process cannot reach, which we call spiritual substance (substance proved to exist by the effects produced, and motion is the effect of life); we say spiritual substance to distinguish it from the nature of a rock or tree, yet there is a spiritual substance in both the rock and tree that givs form and growth; this we call life, from the fact that form and growth are the effect of the power and law of life.

As for mind and thought, some claim they are the result of organization. This fails to meet the full demand, from the fact the dead body of a man may hav a full organization, but no mind. The mind stays and goes with the life; therefore, the mind and thoughts belong to his life, which is spiritual; the brain of a live man is only the instrument through which mind and thoughts operate, the same as a man blowing through a bugle—the sound has its origin in the man, not in the horn. The mind and thoughts can easily operate in and through a spiritual, organized brain, as they are spiritual in their nature. Here let me be understood: without organization either physical or spiritual man does not exist; the human organization constitutes the man or woman. Our opponents admit mind-reading to be true, but claim that it is not Spiritualism. What is mind-reading but Spiritualism? Can they tell by what agency it is done, or the power by which the mind and thought of "A" is transfered into the mind and thoughts of "B," so that "B" can speak the thoughts of "A" independent of his own? Why, they say, it is done by electricity, mesmerism, magnetism, psychology, or odic force, all natural powers and laws of every-day occurrence. All right, my friends, I care not what you call the power and law that cause one person's mind and thought to be transferred into another. When this is admitted, Spiritualism is proved true. It's too late for the same man or woman, who admits mind-reading, to say Spiritualism is a lie, as it is by this agency, or power and law of mind, the citizens of the spiritual kingdom converse with each other and with mediums. To the truth of this I giv my testimony. A man, a relation of my wife, in Pennsylvania (I lived in Henry county, Ill.), died, and soon after he informed me, through a medium, of facts as to the cause of his death, and where he was buried (not in the cemetery near by), etc. I wrote to my wife's brother to giv me the particulars as to his death and where he was buried, and found all the facts as claimed by the medium. Here is a case where this man's mind was transferred into the mind of this medium. Mind-reading proves beyond a doubt the mind and thoughts of man exist outside of his brain of flesh, and are transferable, which is the essence of Spiritualism.

All existing things are equally mysterious until understood, when they become natural. This accounts for miracles in past ages, during the childhood of man.

After reading this short explanation of Spiritualism, which is the philosophy of life, the science of immortality, and of endless progression, we trust our skeptic brethren will hav courtesy enough to dispense with their supernatural and miraculous man of straw, and we also ask them, in brotherly kindness, to grant to all who may choose to change their belief in a cold, ice-bound annihilation at the grave, to a glorious anticipation of a future, without being set up as a target to be shot at. ISAAC PADEN.

P.S.—Mr. Editor, please indulge me; it may be the last. I am now in my eighty-fifth year, and quite feeble in bodily strength. I see, for the want of moral intelligence and civilization, a prohibitory law could not be executed. But success to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Amen. I. P.

THREE RIVERS, CAL, Dec. 27, 1884.

MR. EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER (and Truth Speaker): I received postal-card of notice of the small balance to my credit. Please add it to the Lecture Fund, with a promis of more soon. I will also send for more tracts. The statistics given of the religious faiths of the inmates of penitentiaries in the United States and England knock the bottom out of Christianity on grounds of morality. There are many here who, when young, received an orthodox education, but finding a new truth convincing to their minds and quite acceptable, experience great difficulty in letting go the old error from the force of mental habit. And here, let me state to all Liberal parents and guardians, comes in the importrnce of selecting truth from falsehood in the formation of the minds of our little ones, for which reason I must regret not making the acquaintance of THE TRUTH SEEKER many years ago; and I would rather lose my rations now than hav it stopped. I send you a few quotations from one of nature's noblemen, a pioneer of Freethought and mental liberty in Tulare Co., Cal.

SERIOUS REFLECTIONS FOR A CHRISTIAN.—QUOTATIONS FROM DR. B. HAMLIN.

My Bible friend, is it true
You never had your God held up to view?
I mean Jehovah, of your holy Bible,
Not nature's God, for 'twere a libel
On nature's kind, unsullied name
To call these Gods one or the same.
The Bible Gods, we all can see,
Hav passions just like you or me;
And the slightest reasoning or reflection
Shows they are never in subjection.

There's not a moral in the Bible found
To which this compound feels in duty bound.
He says, "Thou shalt not murder," still,
He helped the Jews to murder at their will.
He says, "To wrath thou shalt not giv thy way;"
His anger waxeth hotter every day.
"To bear false witness," says this God, "refuse;"
Still, lying spirits he was wont to use.
"Thou shalt not steal"—this is the next command;
And yet required a theft at Moses's hand.
Each one the Sabbath surely must obey—
Alike he labors upon every day.
Upon adultery he placed an awful curse:
Seduced a virgin then; can aught be worse?

God says, "You should to others do
As you would wish to hav them do to you;"
Yet millions sends unto an endless flame.
Think you he'd like to be dealt with the same?
Jealous, avenging, a consuming fire,
Ah, what a lovely being to admire!
No wonder that you so affrighted stand,
To fall into that kind of monster's hand!
Your God from Genesis to Revelation
Exhibits nothing but his degradation;
Delights in odors foul of frying beasts,
Of slaughter-houses and his gormand priests;
And gloats in meanness that would far outspan
The lowest, basest, vilest found in man.

My Christian friend, now let me say to you,
Freethinkers hav a better God that's true.
He is perfection in the widest sense.
He's infinit omnipotence.
There is no moral precept, small nor great,
That he as God can violate.
To keep his moral laws is perfect bliss,
To break the least will bring unhappiness.
By natural laws, 'tis clearly understood,
They happify and make us good.
Our inclinations must be pure, refined,
Or else we violate the laws of mind.

The laws of mind teach all of us to know
That from our thoughts must every action flow.
All moral acts that can by men be known
In natural laws by him are plainly shown;
And this divine and well-perfected plan
Is God's own revelation unto man;
And 'tis his one and only revelation,
Sufficient unto every race and nation.
When from this Bible one we're freed,
'Twill meet our every want and need;
He says, "Observe my good advice;
'Twill truly make this world a paradise."
It proves how profitless the fable
Of Jesus born within a stable;
Became a man; existence to sustain,
From morn till night must shove a joiner's plane!
Eternal essence, infinit in space,
Born in a reeking stable! Oh, disgrace!

T. J. CONLY.

TONTOGANY, OHIO, Jan. 4, 1885.

MR EDITOR: Your notice received. I am sorry that you were put to so much trouble on my account. It is not because that I hav forgotten you or your paper (or D. M. Bennett, that I hav not sent the money. I would not know how to get along without it), but hard times. You complain of hard times in the city. That you may know something of the hard times out here, listen to me. As it is with me, it may be with thousands of others in some respects. I don't wish to boast, but just mention facts. I hav eighty acres of land well stocked with all the machinery that is needed to run it to good advantage. (You are the only man that I owe a dollar) To show that my land is not the poorest, I will refer you to the medal and diploma I received at the Centennial for collection of vegetables.

I hav some fat stock on hand, also grain, but to sell now I would hav to sell at a loss. Therefore I am holding for better prices. A great many farmers are borrowing money in hopes that times will change, and others are losing their land. A great deal has been said upon the land question, but it is not a very desirable thing to own at present, and I would say to those who hav no land, if they hav any way of making a decent living, be contented. I hav money coming to me, but I don't think it worth while to ask for it. I received three dollars the other day, and thought that it would just pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but just then I had to hav a barrel of salt to salt my pork. That's the way the money goes. You must hav a more honorable, honest corps of subscribers than many of the Christian editors, for they stop their papers when the subscription expires. Any man that trusts to my honesty shall hav his pay if it takes my last cent.

There are a good many Liberals about here, but I am the only one that takes your paper that I know of. It is hard to get subscribers when it takes nearly a barrel of pork or twelve bushels of potatoes to pay for one year's subscription. I am trying to make all the Liberals that I can. I don't talk to the ignorant except in public, as was the case at our "literary" the other night, when we discussed, "Resolved, That nature proves the existence of a supreme being without the aid of a divine revelation." As I was on the affirmativ, it gave me a chance to show the reliance we could put in the "divine revelation." I spoke rapidly, and put in all my allotted time, which I could not hav done if I had not read THE TRUTH SEEKER, D. M. Bennett's "Interrogatories to Jehovah," "Resurrection of Jesus," and a few other works from THE TRUTH SEEKER office. I hav been showing the above works to a leading Presbyterian preacher. He is well-read in his line. One day I called on him with a fresh lot of documents when he was preparing a sermon on the "Resurrection of Jesus." As luck had it, I had in my pocket "The Resurrection of Jesus," by W. S. Bell. I informed him that I had a work on that subject which might be a help to him. He accepted it with thanks. The next time I saw him his countenance was fallen. He seemed so bored that I had not the face to ask him if he preached from the above text or not. I hav an idea that he chose something else for a text. M. BROWN.

BOSTON, Jan. 2, 285.

MR. EDITOR: I do not believe in Liberals resorting to the same means as Christians, and be continually bickering among themselvs, but, with your kind permission, I will say a few words in reply to friend Koezly, and then I will let the matter drop, as far as he is concerned, for I do not believe that there is another person holding the same views that he does who would not be converted after being presented with the facts, but if he sees fit I will enter into a private correspondence, and would be pleased to receive a letter from him.

Now, friend Koezly, you must admit that the general name of a thing as Sunday is greatly different from the counting of anything, and that the name of Sunday is far from being the same as the actual passing of a year, and, as regards that day, if you hired a man to do a day's work for you on Sunday, I do not think you would be satisfied to pay him if he merely worked the first hour of that day.

I agree with you, and you are right in thinking that each day following the 31st of December is a part of the year, say, 284; that is what I claim; it is a part of that year, and should be called such, and help make up the whole—see?

It is fortunate that we hav a few "wise mathematicians" here in the Hub, and if what you hav already learned from here is of no avail, then, indeed, I hav a hopeless task as a teacher. If you hav a son, did you call him one year old the day he was born, or did you wait until he completed the twelve months of that year? You are right, no one disputes but what common people begin to count with one, but not at one, but at nothing—see? If not, I will giv up the task, and say that there is one great unteachable.

Friend Koezly must be either very young or very old, or else he would know that the Fourth of July, '76, would not do for a universal day as an epoch. Does he think that America's traditional enemies would use the date of our independence in dating their documents? National pride would prevent, but the death of Bruno, for the cause of science, will be readily taken by all.

A good enough reason for my adopting the new calendar is because I can refrain from using the date that Christians boast that Infidels must use, the supposed birth of a supposed Christ.

Friend Koezly, did you not know that the National Liberal League of the United States has already voted to adopt the new calendar? If not, let me tell you that they did more than two years ago. Now, good-bye; if this will not convince you, nothing can. But I believe the above is plain to all but you—Christian or Liberal—and I would be pleased to receive letters or cards on the subject from all who feel interested. It is a subject that should be agitated, but I do not feel like taking up the space of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours fraternally, REMLY S. SIDELINGER.

PIKE, N. Y., Jan., 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I herewith send you a graphic pen-picture of hell, which I heard in Newburn, N. C., in 1864, while doing blockade duty there. I belonged to the gunboat Reno, commanded by Captain Gordon until his death in Swift's Creek, and then by my friend (?) J. S. Donnelly. The boys used to go ashore occasionally, and attend public worship, and frequently, in speaking meetings, your servant would represent his company, and speak for them. It was upon one of these occasions that the writer, with many of his comrades, listened to the following dramatic as well as fiendish and hellish accounts of what is going on in the lower or infernal regions. After asserting that the sufferings of the body are not to be compared with the sufferings of the lost—the proportion being less than infinity to unity in time as well as in intensity—the speaker said: "Come, Brother George," taking my arm, "let us go down to the regions of hell, and take a look at the lost to-night." Crossing the stage, and pointing his finger away to the right, he began in tones that almost made one's blood curdle: "See! see yonder that delicate female, with disheveled hair thrown over her shoulders as she paces to and fro with bare feet on red-hot iron grates; see how she wrings her hands! how she pulls her hair. Hear the piercing cry of that lost girl, as she struggles in the toils of the worm that never dies.

"Look ye again; she is coming this way; the blood is boiling in her veins; you can see the tears that are scalding her cheeks, and her pitiful cries are enough to melt a heart of stone. But the gulf is getting hotter and hotter with her every breath that fans the flames, and the marrow begins to boil in her bones, her brains to scald and seethe in her skull, and as she stops and kneels, with hands and eyes uplifted to heaven, and cries in the wildest insanity of despair, 'How long! oh, how long! shall I suffer these awful torments?' when the voice of God answers in a sharp peal of thunder, 'Wrath to come! wrath to come!'

"See yonder," pointing his long, bony finger in another direction, "see that woman as she comes to the surface of the sea of fire. How she throws up her long white arms! how she screams when the tide drives her head against the red-hot rocks of dark damnation; and again and again she, too, cries, 'How long shall I suffer in this horrible place?'" Again the speaker sent his voice into the top of the house, with a pitch and emphasis that made one's nerves painfully jerk, repeating three times those terrible words, "Wrath to come."

In commenting upon the duration of eternity, the speaker said: "Take a steel ball as hard as a diamond, and as large as the sun, and let an ant crawl over it until it was all worn away by the mere friction of his 'toe nails,' and eternity would be only just begun; the sun in hell would not be half an hour high."

He would put the "not elect" upon a comet, and run them into the heat of the sun, many thousand times hotter than red-hot iron; after keeping them there long enough, he would shove them out into space, where the atmosphere was many thousand times colder than the bleak and frozen bosom of Neptune, where one moment's cold, like theirs, would pierce the bone, freeze the heart's blood, and turn us all to stone. Some of the boys were badly frightened, and it may hav done them good, but there was one, at least, who was thoroughly disgusted, and began to doubt such things soon after, if not then. That doubt has increased in force, until reason, observation, and experience hav taken the place of blind credulity; and I hav come to believe only that which is not self-contradictory, and for which there is a sufficient reason.

As an average specimen of Christian stupidity and bigotry, the writer of this note recollects hearing a Free Methodist dignitary state in class-meeting, with a wonderful nasal twang on every word, to wit: "I am aware that there are many in this room, this afternoon, who are far better, both by nature and practice, than I am, who, on leaving this world, will go down to the bottomless pit to suffer the pains of eternal torment, while, thank God, I shall be saved by divine—" while a score or more voices echoed, "Yes, thank God." S. A. M.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, Jan. 5, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: What the great mass of the people want is the best and soundest knowledge how to be prosperous and happy now, and not when dead. Life is the time to experience every joy and pleasure which humanity can secure. And the way to secure it is to avoid every degrading vice, to keep the brain clear of every puzzling and bewildering subject, and hav the conscience at rest; to rise early, and eat in moderation, and never keep late hours, and abstain from all narcotics, all frenzies, excitements, and strong drinks. If we would hav present happiness we must shun those evils which lead to misery. Our life must be calmed down to a steady tone of sound, solid sense. Then this life and world are good enough for everyone, and all that folly and silly nonsense of fussing, fuming, and demoralizing the mind with a doubtful fable of a second life and a fictitious world is the essence of absurdity. All the religions of the whole earth can never make a dead man a live one; neither will it ever giv to humanity more than one world. It is time the whole world should know that all pedlers in the dogmas of a future world and a second existenco are the deceitful promulgators of this falsehood for the millions of money which flow into their plethoric coffers.

Thousands of those who propagate these dogmas hav no real faith in them. They know them to be popular, and they realize money, and such being the case, on goes the muddle, confusion, and all pandemonium of clashing creeds and bloody-minded hate, wherein one man stands ready to spring on his fellow-mortal, and crush out his life because his better sense tells him that when he is dead he is dead all over, and never again returns to life or goes anywhere but to dust or ashes, if cremated, which is the fit and proper way of disposing of the dead.

Sir, Yours fraternally, THOS. WINTER, Materialist,

SOUTH BARRE, N. Y., Dec., 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Yours of the 31st inst is received. I am very sorry to report so unfavorably as we are, from necessity, obliged to. We hav farmed for forty years, and hav never known such general hard times. All business is at a deadlock, farm produce is very low, and we cannot pay our debts. My motto is, More money and less misery. And how shall we get it? Never until those who are read up and better informed, both Spiritualist and Liberal, shall lay off their party strife in the old dominant parties, and meet the great issue of our time, which is, "Capital and Labor." I am quite surprised that Liberals of all classes do not better harmonize on the great question of the day. In church and state we hav an immense power to meet. But if all Liberal men and women would act as one, then we would be equal to the task as against the church, which, being conscious of this, is making a tremendous effort to join issues with the politicians.

But as true as the great law of evolution, the church must step down and out. They can never reproduce the Dark Ages again. Large bodies move slowly, but they move. The great mill of truth grinds slowly, but exceedingly fine.

Now, friend Somerby, we fully appreciate all you say in relation to our situation in the Liberal cause, and the danger that may surround the success of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and we do hope all who are in arrears to you will come forward at once and pay up. And to prove that we mean what we say, we hereby remit three dollars, twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL for 1885, the balance to apply on THE TRUTH SEEKER.

M. B. DELANO.

BURLINGTON JUNCTION, MO., Jan. 6, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Your modest little dun came to hand, and happened to catch me with the filthy lucre necessary to at least purchase a ticket on the old ship for a passage, not to heaven, but to the plains of Freethought, free speech, and freedom of religion. We are very hard run financially, but it seems that poverty and Infidelity are inseparable companions. Notwithstanding the mighty efforts made this winter by the sky pilots of this place, Freethought is rapidly growing, and we long for the time to come when the great apostles of liberty, Watts, Putnam, or Reynolds, may pitch their tent in this beautiful Nodaway Valley, and proclaim the glad tidings of death to superstition and priestcraft. During the late revival in the Christian church, there were forty accessions, but the entire lot were either children or imbecils, and we heard one Christian say that such things were enough to disgust any sensible person with revivals. The same little boys, before the baptismal water had fairly dried, were swearing "all samee like Melican man" on the school grounds.

We hav a very desirable accession to our town in the person of Mr. J. G. Kuhn of Parkersburg, W. Va. Mr. Kuhn is a splendid musician, a German by birth, and an outspoken Materialist. To all such we extend a hearty welcome. Mr. Kuhn desires THE TRUTH SEEKER changed from Parkersburg, W. Va., to this place. Giv us plenty of quail on toast in the shape of John Peck's philosophy and Remsburg's "Bible Morals," and the kingdom of man will soon be here.

Yours religiously, GEO. W. MAY.

P.S—As a letter is not perfect without a postscript, I will add this to say giv me credit for three dollars, and send the "Story Hour" for the balance. G. W. M.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., Jan. 1, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Please allow us to inquire, Does man possess both a "natural" and a "spiritual" body? Is the spirit body and the spirit brain the most refined perfect material substance in the universe? Can any power of God or man disintegrate and destroy it? Are the materials which compose it without beginning or end? Is spirit a good and true representation of the production and perfection of the eternal powers and laws of an infinit universe? Is not the universe the only infinit in existence?

If matter should disorganize and change, will spirit, mind, and thought continue to exist? Is organized spirit indestructible, and destined to spirit felicity and eternal progression? Is not spiritual philosophy (communion with spirit beings) the only positiv and absolute proof of immortality? Is it not the most delightful experience of mankind that spirits sometimes visit this world and man, to giv assurance of immortality, to enlighten the mind, to direct our steps, and to warn of impending dangers? Are not departed ones sometimes with us when we are quite unconscious of the presence of our friendly mysterious guardians? Hav they not great spirit anxiety for our welfare and happiness? Will they finally conduct us to numerous spirit friends that we may engage in their employments, their enjoyments, and their holy attractions, so that we shall become more exalted, refined, and purified, and be forever increasing in knowledge of unerring and perfect laws of a grand, eternal, boundless infinit universe?

Is not the eternal evolution of the universe the true and only cause of immortality, eternal development, and progression? And is not spirit philosophy infinitly above "death ends all?"

Go ahead, dear TRUTH SEEKER, in your illustrious career? Expose all the terrible, horrid, blasphemous hell doctrins. Hold up the dreadful picture of priestcraft and hellcraft to the gaze of nations, until mankind are disgusted with it, and begin to use common sense and damn cruel orthodoxy and the devil forever. Light and knowledge are continually increasing, and mankind will gradually reject priestcraft, fraud, and humbug, and finally become as absolutely joyful, happy, and free as the birds of the air. But truth alone, and truth only, will accomplish this most desired and glorious result.

THE TRUTH SEEKER we read
And love. We will not sever.
TRUTH SEEKER will succeed.
The truth will liv forever.
Truth seeker, look at that!
You publish truth's defenses.
But we will "pass the hat,"
And pay all your expenses.

We do most sincerely hope and pray to God (if there is one) that all your delinquent subscribers will now settle up for the year or years that are past, and thus "do as they would be done by."

He surely is not
A very good man
Who don't pay his debts
As soon as he can.

Happy New Year to all in THE TRUTH SEEKER office, and to all human bipeds on earth. And now three cheers for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Fraternally yours, E. N. KINGSLEY.

BOSTON, MASS., Jan. 1, 285.

MR. EDITOR: There seems to be some little controversy concerning the dating of my year of science or Freethought calendar, which calendar I made to begin on the first day of January, A.D., 1600.

To settle the matter, all that is necessary is for a person to subtract sixteen hundred from to-day's Christian date of A.D. 1885. The result is two hundred and eight-five, which thereby becomes the figure for my calendar for all this present year. It seems as though everyone could understand that.

Very truly yours, GEO. N. HILL.

MOLINE, MICH., Dec. 27, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: You would oblige and please this subscriber by printing a statement of the reasons to be proposed and history of the events on which the "era of science" as an annual date may be adopted. Having no respect for the fabulous "A.D.," I would be glad to exchange that fiction for a notable fact.

Reported proceedings of the Liberal Club in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 20th inst. are very readable; and in reference to the treachery of Butler to the Democracy of the United States, an "old soldier" like the writer, who voted for Andrew Jackson for president, could add incontrovertible proofs of treachery and reasons to show he has forfeited his claims, if he ever had any, to the votes of intelligent, honest Democrats for the high office of president. In 1860, as a Democratic delegate to the Nominating Convention, he opposed and defeated the nomination of Stephen A. Douglass, a statesman high in the estimation of the party, causing a division of Democratic votes resulting in the Abolitionist, Lincoln, and the suicidal civil war. Also his despotism as military governor of New Orleans and other circumstances hav so tarnished his public fame with the suspicion of mercenary "spoons" that one must seem over-credulous to believe him to be an honest, trusty politician.

DEMOCRAT.

BELLEVILLE, KAN., Jan. 7, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Please find with this eighteen dollars, to be used as per accompanying order. I had hoped to send you a much larger order for one of the best Liberal papers (THE TRUTH SEEKER) published in the world. For the spirit of candor, truth, and fairness with which it deals with all questions and persons cannot help but command the respect of all. Even its orthodox opposers admit its honor and honesty of purpose, though damning its want of religion. We hav many, perhaps the majority, of our people here are so-called Liberals, but far too many are yet in the transition state, not having attained fully to the "courage of their convictions." We very much need a good lecturer and organizer to come among us, and gather the scattered fragments together, and set us at work. We hav enough to form a live activ society, if we only had a suitable leader. Say to the brethren, "Come over into the Garden of the World, Kansas, and help us." My own health has for some time been too poor to do activ work for Liberalism, or for anything else, and in consequence our cause languishes here.

Should my health improve so as to permit, I will try to gather what I can for the National Campaign Fund, and also, if possible, add to the list of subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

DR. H. PATRICK.

CARROLLTON, ILL., Dec. 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I see in TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 20th an attempt to criticise, by Remly Sidelinger, some remarks made by Frederick Koezly in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 6th, where he accuses Frederick Koezly of not being very well posted in arithmetic. I think that if Mr. Sidelinger will look Mr. Koezly's article over again, he will see that the latter is about right, and that Mr. Koezly did not say the present was 285 only on condition that Mr. G. N. Hill was right in commencing his new calendar with the year 1600, which is an error in Mr. Hill. If he was correct it would be 285, which, as Mr. Sidelinger says, is not correct. But I am inclined to believe that Mr. Koezly is as near correct as Mr. Sidelinger, if he is so well posted in arithmetic, when he says it was not the year 1 until the twelve months of the first year had actually passed away. Will Mr. Sidelinger be kind enough to inform me what was the number of that year if it was not No. 1? I fear it will take more than a schoolboy to tell. According to Mr. Sidelinger's calculation, this year would be only 283. But the whole trouble is that Mr. Hill is wrong; he does not start with 1600, but from 1600, which makes twelve months' difference. Mr. Koezly is right when we understand him.

Yours fraternally, WM. BLACK.

NEW MILFORD, PA., Dec. 27, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please find three dollars for your paper. I hav taken it most of the time since it was started. It helps to enliven the long winter evenings in the country.

I see our friend from Ohio, in the last TRUTH SEEKER, speaks of Governor Hoadly being a Liberal. I saw his Thanksgiving proclamation, and thought it was the most sensible one I ever saw put out. He appoints it as a public holiday for the people to join in thanksgiving for the blessings of the year, on the principal that it is more blessed to giv than to receive; so gifts bestowed to the needy in kindness may enable all to share in the spirit and feelings of the occasion. Now, as humanity is the first help we seek for in sickness and distress, why not spend our time and Thanksgiving money on our fellow-man, rather than spend it on costly churches to worship an unknown God, who cannot change his laws to help in time of need? May we hav more such proclamations from the rulers of this nineteenth century. MRS. H. GRINNELL.

QUARTZBURGH, IDA. TER., Dec. 26, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I am a little late with the cash to pay for my subscription in advance, but as I hav been on time heretofore I hope to be excused. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER eight years, and if it stays with its principles in the future as well as it has in the past, I shall rustle up the cash every new year to pay my subscription in advance as long as I liv or am able to read. It's a strange thing to me why any Liberal in the land can afford to do without the good old TRUTH SEEKER. The spirit of our old hero, D. M. Bennett, is still marching on, and I hope and trust that it will continue to do so until the light of truth is spread over the dark spots of the earth.

Yours for truth, CHAS. E. CLARK.

BOTLAND, KY., Jan. 1, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1, for which continue to send THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like the paper very much, and am very thankful that you hav sent it since my time expired. I send you a clipping from a newspaper that may be of some interest to the readers of your paper. Will send for the ANNUAL in a few days. A. B. BRINEY.

[The clipping inclosed by our correspondent refers to the late Everett Farnham, of Richfield, Ohio. It was published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 6, 1884. We appreciate the kindness of Mr. Briney, however, and are always glad to receive clippings of interest to Freethinkers.—ED. T. S.]

MENOMONIE, WIS., Dec. 17, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: The Liberals of this city for the past three nights hav listened to Mr. Bell on "Liberty and Morality," "Common Sense," and "The Gods." We had good audiences, probably two hundred each night. A few got up and left on hearing the passages read about the Jewish God. They did not want to know much about him; while the Liberals sat with a smile on their faces. We, the Liberals, would say that this Bell did ring just to our satisfaction, and we part with him to-day with every wish of success in enlightening the minds of men. M. R. CHENEY.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Mouse, a Man, and a Moral.

I knew a little Boston mouse,
That, "once upon a time,"
Went running freely through the house,
Nor thought it was a crime.

He spied a pretty house of wire,
And boldly entered there,
But, though he gained his heart's desire,
He soon was in despair,

For as he turned about to go,
He could not find his way,
And in the cage, despite his woe,
He found that he must stay.

Plenty of cake, and pie, and cheese
Was placed before his sight,
But all attentions failed to please.
He lost his appetite.

His captor, large in form and heart,
Said, "Well, my little friend,
I see you wish from me to part,
And so your fright I'll end.

"Like human minds, I think you've found
No prison, however fine,
Can compensate for freedom's ground,
Or nature's life divine."

This said, he opened wide the door—
Poor Mousie's eyes grew bright,
Then swift he fled across the floor,
Nor stopped to say good-night.

Dear children, take this lesson now:
Be careful where you go;
Let no temptation cloud your brow
With future fear and woe.

Don't haste to taste of things unknown;
Keep self controlled by thought,
Lest fetters should be round you thrown,
And wisdom sadly bought.

Part not with freedom. Each thing wrong
Is but a cage or chain.
Let reason guide, be brave, and strong,
And happiness shall reign.

Baby's Letter.

"I wis I could wite a letter!"
Said the baby with a sigh,
"But the pencil don't go wight a bit,
'Tisn't any use to twy.
But," thoughtfully, "I know one sing—
I can make one, two, fee.
Wouldn't 'at be a letter, mamma?
I should sink 'at it would be."

"I should think so, dear," said mamma,
So he made a l z g.
"You see," he said, "I love Aunt Sue,
And I want to wite to she."
And Aunt Sue wrote (the baby's eyes Glowed with triumphant glee),
"The nicest letter I ever saw
Was the baby's 'l z g.'"

My First Days at School.

At this time my parents resided in a newly settled place where there were but few families for several miles around, and I had never been to school, and knew little of the great world outside until I was nearly ten years old. But on moving into a more settled part of the country, we were told one day that a school was to begin on the next Monday morning, which was in the pleasant month of May.

Although it was over two miles distant, three of us girls were fitted out with books and new gingham dresses and sun-bonnets to attend school.

Most anxiously did we look forward to the day when, with satchel in hand, we were to start out on our first venture to ascend the mount of Knowledge, on the top of which was pictured, in our spelling-books, the goddess of Fame, with the fabled golden apple of reward. At length the day came, and we started on our way to school. The sun seemed to shine with more than usual brightness, and the birds sang their sweetest notes and would fly on before us as if to keep us company.

Most of the road was new to us, but we followed the directions our mother had given us, and on coming to a turn in the road, there was presented to view a large peach orchard in full bloom. Never had I beheld such a lovely sight. The morning sun shone upon the dew drops sparkling on the carnation robes of the trees, making them look like diamonds, the loveliest picture I hav ever seen, and one I hav never forgotten.

Soon after we came in sight of the schoolhouse; and near the gate where we entered the grounds was a rose-bush with several roses in bloom. I stood and gazed upon the unrivaled beauty of this queen of flowers, for I had as yet only known the wild flowers and a few pinks and pansies of our little garden at home.

It took all the courage I had to go up to the school-house door, and enter the room where sat the "schoolmarm," a perfect picture or female loveliness, who came forward with a smile, and seated us on a low bench with several other little girls, and put away our bonnets, and opened our new books, showing us our lessons, when she found, by asking us, that we could read. She then left us to set a copy for a big boy.

I did not look at my book that day half as much as I looked upon that sweet-faced woman. How the young and plastic mind takes on impressions of good—would these were all such—and to strive to imitate their superiors! When walking along by her side on our way home, often hav I tried to step with her stately grace, or speak in her gentle tones, or to make my flaxen hair lie in the wavy manner of her dark, silken tresses. This influence is felt in all our lives, even to its close. How pleasant is the memory of those long, bright summer days going to and from school, watching from day to day the wild flowers by the wayside, especially the blackberry-bushes with their white blossoms, as these turned to green, then red, and at last black berries, ripe and sweet, soon picked off and eaten, or put into our dinner-baskets to take home to mother.

"Oh, would that life were always thus
So beautiful and gay."

At length the last day of school arrived. Sadly, on a bright October morning, we started out for the closing day of the term. The sun looked down through a hazy atmosphere, the air was filled with "the ghosts of the thistles," while the grasshoppers hung lazily upon the woodside, and few moved at our approach.

We took a peep into the different birds' nests in the bushes, where nothing was to be seen but the nice lining of hair with a few downy feathers on the edges. The rose-bush by the gate had turned to russet-brown, with a few red buds that showed where flowers had been.

When the exercises of the day were over, she presented pictures and little primers to each scholar, giving those first choice who had the most "credit marks" for study and good behavior in school. As we passed out one by one, with tearful eyes and trembling voices, we bid "Good-bye" to our dear, first schoolteacher, whom I never saw again only in my dreams.

Our Puzzle Box.

ENIGMA.

In ewe, in lamb,
In wether, ram,
In these I am,
But not in mutton.

In heifer, cow,
In ox to plow,
You see me now,
But not in beefsteak.

In dog, in cat,
In mouse, in rat,
But not in these, nor this, nor that.
When they're in sausage.

In pig, in sow,
In swine, I trow,
Yet all allow
I'm not in bacon.

With letters four
My name you score,
But Bible lore
Givs you no more
Than three score and a plus-age.

REKAB SEMAJ.

ANAGRAM.

"The rents are high, liv in tent, lock, key, c."
The result of a reduction of wages
Caused the troubles here told;
But to x-press the facts more closely
Would increase my puzzle tenfold,

WHAT'S THIS.

Eight letters a deadly weapon disclose,
But two middle letters if we transpose
Reversely, the very same weapon it shows.

The exterior letters of this inclose
A word that means to open, disclose,
Which, by the same process, reversely goes.

The last includes, our puzzlers to pose,
An elliptical sentence that everyone knows,
Two abbreviate words on filios,*
That backward must read, like those.

With fifth backward reading, see one of your beaux,
Or, better, your friend, and the foe of your foes;
But after the fifth, if the fourth you transpose,
The same is read forward, as you may suppose.

Now banish the fifth as the worst of all woes
To one who has brought you such double-faced beaux,

*Books.

Begin what your heart to this last act owes—
Like the blood from the heart, it outward flows.
'Tis "ended," 'tis "finished," and so's

ANSWERS TO PUZZLES IN CHILDREN'S CORNER, JAN. 10, 1885.

1. To-ma-to—also called love apples.

2. First letters read downward "Menagery." Line 2 contains the animal Eland; Line 3, Lion; Line 4, Manis and Goat; Line 5, Bear; Line 6, Marmot; Line 7, Onager; Line 8, wild cat.

In the puzzle to which the above is the answer, the compositor printed "school-ma'm" for "schoolmarm." As printed, the word "marmot" is destroyed. It should read "schoolmarm."

Correspondence.

PACOLET, S. C., Jan. 11, 1885.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav been reading the "Story Hour," and I hav come to loving it very much. The beautiful stories you hav written ought to be read by all little boys and girls. I think it would make them think more about being good than when they read the books which talk about nothing but God and Jesus, and a world up yonder above the stars. I was very sad when I read about the death of little Susie. I want to buy one of her photographs. Please let us know through THE TRUTH SEEKER how we may get one. Papa bought us all a polyopticon for the Christmas holiday, and we hav a rich time every night looking at the pictures.

The answer to the puzzle No. 1 in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 10th is "Tomato."

I am just nine years old, and I am going to school to-morrow with my two little sisters, Essie and Mellie, and Sammie, my older brother. Yours truly, ZULEMMA THOMASON.

[Not many little girls of nine years can write a better letter than that above, or spell more correctly. We are proud of our little friends, and can truly say that in goodness and intelligence they compare favorably with any children in the land; and in our opinion they are superior to those who are not taught to exercise reason and common sense. We thank Zulemma for her sweet sympathy and interest in little Susie, whose photo she would like to hav. We hav had a large call for her picture, and the supply is nearly enhausted, but in a week or two we will hav some new ones printed, and will then be able to furnish them to those who hav desired copies. Cabinet size, fifty cents, and card size, twenty-five. In reply to inquiries, we would say that the frontispiece in the "Story Hour" is a faithful likeness of our Susie at four years of age.—ED. C. C.]

1246 FULTON ST., CHICAGO, Dec. 28, 1884.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for three years, and since the addition of the Children's Corner we are all much interested in it. I hav two brothers and two sisters, but only three of us are old enough to read the stories. Papa and mamma read aloud to us, when they hav time, from THE TRUTH SEEKER and Scientific American.

We are going to celebrate New Year's, for that is our papa's birthday, and we think it of more importance to us than Christmas, and something we know really happened; and there is no one we know of that is as kind and good to us as he is. Mamma hopes soon to get us some Liberal books. We make out some of the puzzles, but think most of them quite hard. If you ever come to our city you must be sure and come to see us and take a ride on our lovely boulevards. Wishing you many Happy New Years and success to the Children's Corner, I am,

Your friend, ALMA WINEMAN.

P.S.—Mamma and all join in sending our love and best wishes to you. ALMA.

[Thanks, Alma, for your lovely letter. We agree with you that it is far more sensible to celebrate the birthday of one we know and love than it is to celebrate the birthday of somebody who was born so long ago that he cannot possibly know or care about us who liv in this bright world to-day. Your papa and mamma are more to you, hav more thought, care, love for you and your brothers and sisters, than anyone else can possibly hav, therefore it is right to observe their birthday, and to do all that you can for them. Our love to them, and to all the family circle, and we assure you if we should come to Chicago we will be sure to call and see you, if only for a moment.—ED. C. C.]

A Plucky Young Man.

Here is a true story of successful energy. A young drug clerk wrote from the far West to a prominent pharmacist in New York, saying he would like to come to the city and enter a store. He came, but when the pharmacist questioned him personally he found that his visitor had never put up prescriptions written in Latin; consequently he could not get a situation. He did not know a soul in the great city, not even the gentleman to whom he had written (until he met him at his store). He sought in vain for a place, and finally found a subordinate position, where he was given five dollars a week and had to board himself. He was a studious, pushing, activ young fellow, and soon managed to attend the lectures at the College of Pharmacy. The gentleman with whom he had corresponded took an interest in him, and invited him to come to his store and assist in the manufacturing of fluid extracts. Once he showed his employer what he could do in that line. The man was surprised. "Why can't you do something of that kind for me?" he asked. The clerk said he could, and his salary (which in the meanwhile had been slightly increased) was raised to very respectable proportions. He worked for a time in this way, eventually receiving a salary of $50 a week; finally he opened a laboratory of his own, and to-day he employs forty or fifty hands. And yet, when he arrived in New York he did not hav a dollar, and was without influence and without friends.—St. Nicholas.

STATUETTE OF THOMAS PAINE.

This Statuette of the author-hero is a fac simile of the model of Prof. Richards for the monument proposed to be erected in Lincoln Park. It is admitted to be a fine work of art, and is the only correct outline of Thomas Paine's head and face in existence, being executed from a mask taken at the time of his death, and sent, with other effects, to a friend in France, from whence Prof. Richards procured it for his design.

Size 20x16 inches, weight 35 lbs.; finished in the same style as Rogers's groups.

Price reduced from $14 00 to $10.00. Sole agent, E. A. STEVENS, 480 W. Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

Read the indorsement of COL. R. G. INGERSOLL, who gave the first lecture in aid of the Monument Fund:

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 30, 1882.

David Richards, Esq.:

MY DEAR FRIEND: Your Statuette is incomparably the best I hav ever seen. It is in perfect taste. The position, the drapery, the surroundings are all admirable. You hav given to Paine a noble, a reflectiv, and kind face. The whole work shows MERIT OF THE HIGHEST ORDER, and I am delighted with it.

I thank you more than I can express—not only for presenting me with the statuette, but for having made it. I feel under a personal obligation to every man who in any way assists in rescuing the name of that great thinker—a disinterested patriot, and an intellectual hero—from the malice of superstition and from the calumnies of those who hav enjoyed, and who are now enjoying, the fruits of his labor. Thanking you again and again, I remain,

Yours always, R. G. INGERSOLL.

Poetry.

Good Lord, Deliver Us.

I went to church and with my aunt
Knelt where the richest people kneeled;
I listened to the rector's chant
Oft broken as the organ peeled—
"Good Lord, deliver us."

Stained glass, and gilt, and velvet stools,
With many a saint in fresco work
I saw, and thought (O fool of fools!)
"Of our plain, whitewashed village kirk,
Good Lord, deliver us."

I whispered, "Who is yonder man
Gray-haired and praying so devout?"
Quick glanced my aunt, as woman can,
And said, scarce turning head about,
"Good Lord, deliver us."

"Director—bank," she whispered me;
"Defaulted—million dollars, dear—
Heads every public charity."
I clutched my purse and gasped in fear,
"Good Lord, deliver us."

"But he, dear aunty, over there,
Who worships with such pious look;
The one with apostolic air,
Who chants so sweetly from his book—
Good Lord, deliver us?"

"Stock broker, love—a Cræsus, too—
Appropriated funds, they say;
He'd make a splendid catch for you."
I hid my country face to pray,
"Good Lord, deliver us."

I glanced around. There must be one
Good man amongst these wicked men.
"Pray what has that fair Christian done?"
If such a face knows thieving, then,
Good Lord, deliver us.

"He's no one, pet. I'm half afraid
The fellow keeps a bucket-shop."
"At least," quoth I, "an honest trade."
My aunt quite out of place let drop,
"Good Lord, deliver us."

All in a Lifetime.

The book, "All in a Lifetime," came to hand, and the first leisure I had, which was on the Sunday following, I devoted to a careful reading of it. My opinion of it may be expressed as well as anyway, by saying that I laid it away only to eat and drink until I finished it, from the time I commenced it.

I read it critically, to see the scope, plot, and method, and I must say it is a good, straightforward, well-planned, and practical work, hitting hard and palpable blows at the every-day occurrences of sectarian professors and deluded people.

The constancy of Regina's character may be a little prolonged; that is, continued during a somewhat lengthy course of years, considering that she must hav been cognizant of her husband's infidelities, and few women of spirit would hang on to a forlorn hope with such tenacity, while evincing such contempt for the doctress. And, perhaps, an opportunity for a little more dialog between Philip and herself, in which the arguments used would hav turned against his frivolous character, would hav satisfied the reader better than the short and abrupt method of turning her away. If it should be dramatized at any time, he should be made to wince under her just and candid rebuke, to do which it would be necessary to invest her with a little more of the fire of human nature under just provocation. As a character, she enlists one's pity rather than one's admiration. Hers is the heroism of suffering, who seems to be too innocent to understand her true woman's position. Then, I cannot for the life of me see why Lolo did not make at least some effort to inform Regina of Philip's character. Though she might hav been unsuccessful at the time, it would hav been a splendid climax to her character when she came to defend her in court, and would hav told in favor of her true womanhood. The rest of her role is remarkably well brought out.

Mr. Ropemin is good, the name is so suggestiv. Taken all in all, it is a very entertaining, instructiv, and useful story. My daughters read it and are delighted.

I am waiting for the "Story Hour," and hope Miss Wixon may meet with the success she deserves.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER,

ALL in a LIFETIME,

A ROMANCE.

BY MISS SUSAN H. WIXON.

"The great charm of this novel is its absolute fidelity to nature. Its personages are those one meets with in common life, and are portrayed with a vividness and perspicuity I was scarcely prepared to expect to find, in such a marked degree, even from so gifted a pen as that of Miss Wixon, whose brilliant and lucid style is familiar to most readers in the Freethought ranks. . . . But what pleased me most in this charming story was the unflinching honesty with which its author holds up to the derision of the world the rottenness of average ministerial character, particularly that of revivalist type. I hav not space here to treat, in detail, of the characters of this truly absorbing novel. Suffice it to say that it is safe to predict that anyone who reads its first chapters will be loth to lay it down till the denouement is reached. Miss Wixon has long been doing a noble work in educating our children into the ranks of true Liberalism, thereby robbing the church of hundreds of those who, in after years, might hav become its willing dupes and servil tools, and she certainly deserves the generous and substantial recognition of all Freethinkers. Let everyone send for a copy of 'All in a Lifetime.' It will yield a liberal reward for the outlay.

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR

Parallels in Other Religions

Being a Comparison of the Old and New estament Myths and Miracles with those of heathen nations of Antiquity, Considering also their Origin and Meaning. With numerous illustrations.

The object of the work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning.

"It has long been acknowledged by the most eminent biblical students that the Hebrew scripture contain a large mythical element; but, so far as we know, the present is the first complete and scholarly attempt to trace these myths to their source, and ascertain their original signification."—Boston Courier.

"Never before has there been given a volume to the reading world that shows the research for the origin of these myths as does this one just published by J. W. Bouton, of New York."—Boston Times.

"It is unquestionably true that the results of a rationalistic study of the Christian scriptures are nowhere else so accessible as they are now made in the work before us.—N. Y. Sun.

PROSE POEMS

And Selections,

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued.

It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author.

The work is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph facsimile, has been prepared especially for it.

In the more elegant styles of binding, this volume is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

In workmanship the volume is a masterpiece. The type is large and beautiful; the paper heavy and richly tinted; the presswork faultless; and the binding, as perfect as the best materials and skill can produce. The book is quarto in size, and contains 248 pages. No item of expense has been spared to make the work worthy of author and public.

PRICES:

Silk-cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side,	$2 50
Half-calf, mottled edges, elegant library style,	4 50
Full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitely fine,	7 50
Full tree calf, highest possible style and finish,	9 00

Gems of Thought.

YOU should lead good lives because it is right, and because it is your pleasure to do so, rather than from the fear of any angry or malicious being. He who abstains from doing wrong from fear of punishment or of being cast into hell, deserves little more credit than he whose life is spent in evil doing. —D. M. Bennett.

FOR the man Christ—for the reformer who loved his fellow-men—for the man who believed in an infinit father, who would shield the innocent and protect the just—for the martyr who expected to be rescued from the cruel cross, and who at last, finding that his hope was dust, cried out in the gathering gloom of death: "My God! My God! Why hast thou forsaken me?"—for that great and suffering man, mistaken though he was, I hav the highest admiration and respect. That man did not, as I believe, claim a miraculous origin; he did not pretend to heal the sick nor raise the dead. He claimed simply to be a man, and taught his fellow-men that love is stronger far than hate. His life was written by reverent ignorance. Loving credulity belittled his career with feats of jugglery and magic art, and priests, wishing to persecute and slay, put in his mouth the words of hatred and revenge. The theological Christ is the impossible union of the human and divine—man with the attributes of God, and God with the limitations ond weaknesses of man. —R. G. Ingersoll in the Christian Religion.

IN Spain despotism might rule in safety over ignorance, but the French had eaten of the tree of knowledge, and they demanded to eat of the tree of life. A bread-riot became a rebellion; the rebellion became a revolution. Maddened by resistance, frenzied by fear, they made their revolution a massacre. Yet in spite of mummeries and murders, and irreligious persecutions; in spite of of follies perpetrated in the name of reason, and cruelties committed in the name of humanity, that revolution regenerated France, and planted principles which spread over the continent of Europe, and which are now bearing fruits in Italy and Spain. With the nineteenth century a new era of history begins.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

IT is our deliberate opinion that the French Revolution, in spite of all its crimes and follies, was a great blessing to mankind. But it was not only natural but inevitable that those who had only seen the first act should be ignorant of the catastrophe, and should be alternately elated and depressed as the plot went on disclosing itself to them. A man who had held exactly the same opinion about the Revolution in 1789, in 1794, in 1804, in 1814, and in 1834, would hav been either a divinely inspired prophet, or an obstinate fool. Sir James Mackintosh was neither. He was simply a wise and good man, and the change which passed in his mind was a change which passed in the mind of almost every good and wise man in Europe.—Macauley.

FOR that other loss,
The loss of confidence in social man,
By the unexpected transports of our age
Carried so high, that every thought—which looked Beyond the temporal destiny of the kind—
To many seemed superfluous; as no cause
For such exalted confidence could e'er
Exist; so, none is now for fixed despair;
The two extremes are equally disowned
By reason; if with sharp recoil, from one
You hav been driven far as its opposit,
Between them seek the point whereon to build Sound expectations. —Wadsworth's Excursion.

WHAT I must do is all that concerns me, not what the people think. The rule, equally arduous in practical and in intellectual life, may serve for the whole distinction between greatness and meanness. It is harder, because you will always find those who think they know what is your duty better than you know it. It is easy in the world to liv after the world's opinion; it is easy in solitude to liv after your own; but the great man is he who, in the midst of the crowd, keeps, with perfect sweetness, the independence of solitude.—Emerson.

WHEREVER the repetition of any particular act or operation produces a propensity to renew the same act or operation, without being impelled by any reasoning or process of the understanding, we always say that this propensity is the effect of custom. By employing that word we pretend not to giv the ultimate reason of such a propensity. We only point out a principle of human nature which is universally acknowledged, and which is well known by its effects. Perhaps we can push our inquiries no further, or pretend to giv the cause of this cause, but must rest contented with it as the ultimate principle which we can assign of all our conclusions from experience. It is sufficient satisfaction that we can go so far without repining at the narrowness of our faculties, because they will carry us no father.—Hume's Inquiry Concerning Human Understanding.

Assume a virtue if you hav it not;
That monster, custom, who all sense doth eat,
Of devil's habit, is angel yet in this,
That to the use of actions fair and good
He likewise givs a frock or livery,
That aptly is put on. Refrain to-night,
And that shall lend a kind of easiness
To the next abstinence; the next more easy;
For use almost can change the stamp of nature
And either master the devil or throw him out
With wonderous potency. —Shakspere's Hamlet.

So long as the universe stands, and so long as there is an intelligent being in the universe, so long there must be religion. As well might the ship-master think to outsail the horizon that encompasses him on every hand; as well might the lark, rising into the morning air, think to outfly the atmosphere in which it flutters its wings, and the movements of which constitute the liquid beauties of its song, as humanity think to outliv religion.—M. J. Savage.

IT was impossible for Milton to handle the dry bones of a divinity compendium without stirring them into life. And divinity which is made to liv necessarily becomes unorthodox.—Mark Pattison's Milton.

The political aim of THE TRUTH SEEKER is to enforce the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

In philosophy, THE TRUTH SEEKER advocates the upbuilding of a rational system that shall lead to better lives on the part of the people, and that shall yield to its adherents all the social and emotional enjoyments of the churches, without any mixture of superstition, or the use of rites and ceremonies degrading to manhood and womanhood. This philosophy must be a growth, an evolution from lower forms, and this growth THE TRUTH SEEKER hopefully fosters. It is, therefore, both destructive and constructive.

Among the contributors to THE TRUTH SEEKER are the most eminent men and brilliant writers in the Liberal ranks of the United States, including Courtlandt Palmer, Charles Watts, T. B. Wakeman, S. P. Andrews, T. C. Leland, C. B. Reynolds, S. P. Putnam, J. E. Remsburg, W. S. Bush, Elliott Preston, John Peck, J. L. York, Susan H. Wixon, Helen Gardener, Mrs. Slenker, and many other able men and women. THE TRUTH SEEKER also makes a feature of reprinting the ablest English essayists and philosophers, and during 1884 has given its readers several papers from the pens of Frederic Harrison and Herbert Spencer. The home contributors are legion, and the communications embrace the widest possible range of subjects—religious, philosophic, Anarchistic, Socialistic, land reform, tariff and political reform.

EVERY LIBERAL IN THE COUNTRY WANTS THE TRUTH SEEKER.

DEPARTMENTS:

In the League Department is recorded the news of the National Liberal League, furnished to our columns by the secretary, and other officers of the National and auxiliary Leagues.

We also have an able correspondent in Canada, who furnishes weekly news of the Freethought movement in that dominion.

Our Children's Department is edited by one of the best and most successful writers for children in the United States. Miss Susan H. Wixon is widely known, not only in the Freethought ranks, but as a writer for popular papers and magazines. We have from all sides the strongest testimonials to the efficiency of her work in THE TRUTH SEEKER. She will continue the Department through 1885.

Through the department of "Letters from Friends" hundreds of subscribers have made pleasant acquaintances and lasting friendships. Its two pages are a place for exchange of thoughts, relation of experiences, and whatever the friends of Freethought find occasion to say. This department is a "talk together" of great and varied interest.

TERMS FOR 1885:

Single subscription, - - - - - - $3 00	One subscription with three new subscribers, in one remittance, - - - - - $8 50
One subscription two years, in advance, - - 5 00	One subscription with four new subscribers, in one remittance, - - - - - 10 00
Two new subscribers, - - - - - 5 00	Any number over five at the same rate, invariably with one remittance.
One subscription with one new subscriber, in one remittance, - - - - - 5 00
One subscription with two new subscribers, in one remittance, - - - - - 7 00

It is thus seen that any of our friends who will take the trouble to get a new subscriber at the regular rate ($3), will get his own for $2; by getting two new subscribers he will get his own paper for $1; by getting three new subscribers he will not only get his own free, but will have fifty cents left to pay cost of money order; by getting four new subscribers he will have his own free and gain $2.

This makes THE TRUTH SEEKER, with its sixteen large pages, cheaper than any other Liberal paper. If anyone chooses, or if by so doing he can easier secure partners in taking the paper, he can share with them the advantages of the club rates.

Odds and Ends.

"WERE you at church, to-day?" asked the landlady of her wicked border last Sunday. "I was." "What did the minister preach about?" "He preached about two hours and a half.

"I WISH I was an owl," said the young lawyer. "Why?" she asked. "Because then I could stay up all night, you know, dear," he replied. "What would you want to do such a ridiculous thing as that for?" she tittered. "To wit: To woo."

"I AM shocked, Bobby," said his mother severely, "that you should go to see a game of baseball on Sunday. Think how grieved your father will be when I inform him of it." "Oh, you needn't do that," replied Bobby, "he knows it." "Oh, you told him, did you?" "No, he saw me there."

BUBBY stubbed his toe and came in crying to his mother. "There, there, Bubby, she said after she had ascertained that the injury was trifling, "you are too big a boy to cry over a little thing like that." "B-but what a-am I to do, mamma?" he asked sobbingly. "I ain't b-big enough to s-swear.

"WHERE did you get this French Bible?" asked Smith, taking up a book from Black's table. Black: "French Bible! I havn't got any French Bible. The only Bible I hav is the one you hav in your hand. Had it ever since I was married." Smith (holding up the book): "What do you call that but French?" Black: "By gracious! so it is! Funny I never found that out before!"

"IN soft, adumbrant meshes of sieved silver the sunbeams melted through the leaves and dipped in spangles of gold upon the brown and black moquetrie of shadows that led to the ragged edge of the curb where a fragil little fragment of humanity lay moaning." "That's all right enough," said the managing editor, "but it's a little too long. Make it shorter." "But what shall I say, sir," asked the blonde reporter. "Oh, I'd just say, 'Hennessy Mulcahey's little boy Pat fell into an open sewer and broke his nose.' That'll do."

A LADY of Ohio being examined as a candidate for school-teaching, was asked the meaning of respiration and replied, "the perspiring of the body," and another candidate defined emphasis to be the putting more distress on one word than another. An English medical student defined hypothesis to be "something that happens to a man after death," and another defined irony to be "a tincture of iron."

"NOW," said the business man to the pr m Boston girl, whom he had engaged to do his type writing, "Adress this letter to Messrs. Jones & Jones, Amster. dam, N. Y." The types clicked for a moment, and then the fair operator stopped and blushed till her glasses fairly glowed. "I cannot swear, sir," she said, timidly, with her soft Athenian accent. "May I not write it 'Amsterdash?'" The merchant leaned forward as if to imprint a fatherly kiss upon her chaste brow, and touched the keys. "There," he said, "I hav written 'dam.' Now you go ahead.'

POET.

I've a verselet on a leaflet,
A dain'y little screed;
What will you giv me for it
To fill a long felt need?"

EDITOR.

I've a damulet on my tonguelet,
A good one tried and true,
Which I always giv to poets,
And I'll be as kind to you.

A MARRIED lady recently sent a note to a newspaper to get a recipe to cure the whooping cough in a pair of twins. By a deplorable mistake a recipe for pickling onions was unconsciously inserted and her name attached, and she received this answer through the "Answer to Correspondents:" "Mrs. L. H. B.—If not too strong, skin them pretty closely, immerse in scalding water, sprinkle plentifully with salt, and immerse them for a week in strong brine." She didn't do it, however, as she thought it would kill the cough nineteen times out of twenty, and the children nine times out of ten.

THE young people of Tenderfoot City, Arizona, had a masquerade ball a short time ago; and an envious journal of a neighboring town had the following paragraph about it: "We understand that several young ladies were dressed as Indian maidens, in pink hosiery, kid slippers, diamond necklaces, with peacock feathers in their hair. We don't like to shatter this beautiful ideal of an Indian maiden, but duty compels us to say that no Indian maiden ever sported such a layout. The genuin article wears an old plug hat, a dirty army blanket, and a discarded pair of trousers. For a necklace she wears a string of pale face's teeth, and carries a considerable amount of real estate with her wherever she goes."

"HAV you a revised copy of the New Testament in the library, Miss Smith?" asked the young minister who was making an evening call, partly parochial and partly otherwise. "No, Mr. Longprayer," she replied, "I regret to say we havn't." "What's a revised copy?" asked Bobby, who had been permitted to sit up beyond his usual hour. "You are rather young yet, Bobby, to understand such matters," said his sister, kindly. "A revised copy means that certain changes hav been made in the Bible that were considered necessary to a better understanding of the text. Now you had better run off to bed; that's a good boy." The young minister could scarcely conceal his admiration. "Well, if that's what it is," said Bobby, "our family Bible is revised, 'cause pa changed it the other day. He scratched out the date of your birth and made it three years later. He told ma something about you and the minister, and said that it wouldn't do no harm nohow, and if ever Mr. Longprayer wanted to look at it, it might do a good deal of good." Presently the minister went away and a family consultation was held. It resulted in Bobby's passing a sleepless night on the pit of his stomach.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 12. No. 5. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY.} New York, Saturday, January 31, 1885. {33 CLINTON PLACE.} $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE coroner at St. Louis, Mo., recently investigated a faith cure hospital in that city. He found that a baby had just died there which had received only prayer for treatment. The keepers of the hospital are religious fanatics.

A CIRCULAR has been generally distributed among the Hebrews of this city calling attention to the fact that, with a population of at least 60,000 Israelites in this city, the synagogs are deserted, and the rabbis preach to empty benches.

IT appears from statistics recently published that the annual bill for bread, meat, cotton, and woollen goods of the American people foots up a total of about 1,250,000,000, and its annual bill for whisky, beer, and the taxes thereon is $1,400,000,000. So we drink $150,000,000 worth more than we eat and wear.

"I SEE there are a number of counterfeit Bank of England notes circulating in this country." "Yes; and what is worse, I think I hav one of them." "So? What are you going to do with it?" "I don't know. That is what troubles me." "You might put it in the church contribution box." "No, not yet. I'm not dead sure it's counterfeit."

AMONG the movements in the churches the Dawson county (Neb.) Herald chronicles the leaving town of Frank Odell, superintendent of the Unitarian Sabbath-school and grand chaplain of the grand lodge of Good Templars of Nebraska. Mr. Odell was escorted to the depot by some dozen or more creditors, whose grief at his departure was greatly deepened by their failure to get a cent of their several dues.

THE papers tell a story of a Birmingham man who had a sudden attack in the night, of rheumatism, which his wife cured by the application of holy water blessed by the pope, which she brought from the Emerald Isle. The next morning they found she had showered him with blue washing-fluid, and the holy water bottle was as tightly corked as ever. He was very blue in spots, but his faith had made him whole.

THE proprietors of the London post-office directory hav "experienced religion" to such an extent that their publications are seasoned with texts. Thus facing the "Court" section occurs, "Thou God seest me." "What is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world," etc., precedes the list of "Commercial Persons," and "A false balance is an abomination to the Lord" serves as an introduction to the "Trades" division.

MRS. MARTHA SPRINGSTEEN sued for a divorce in the courts of Brooklyn recently. Her husband has for some years been in the habit of recreating himself by beating her, smashing dishes, and kicking things around generally. For eight years there was not a time when she did not bear bruises upon her person. This she bore without public complaint, but when Mr. Springsteen joined the Methodist church, his outrages increased, and the first thing he did on returning from prayer-meeting was to thrash his wife. Justice Cullen granted the divorce.

THE Rev. Heber Newton counts it a "signal illustration of the advance which has been made in so-called Infidelity, that its spirit is clean and pure." But, says the Winsted Press, its spirit was always clean and pure. The Infidelity which the clergy are forced to recognize and respect to-day is the same Infidelity at which they hav hooted, as owls hoot in the darkness, for a hundred years. It is the dirt in the eyes of the clergy which has made Infidelity seem to them unclean, not any lack of purity in the spirit of Infidelity itself. But there is an Infidelity that goes far beyond the kind they are forced to recognize—that despises them and their superstitions too much to combat them or laugh at them. This is really "the advance which has been made in the so-called Infidelity," and it will giv the parsons trouble after they hav conquered the old Infidelity by surrendering to it.

EVERY little while, says Peck's Sun, the papers giv accounts of people who hav become insane through the work of the "Salvationists." Mrs. Robert Collins, of Akron, Ohio, is one of the latest victims. It seems that at their "carnivals" (appropriate name) the impressible ones get the "power," fall into a comatose condition, and lie down on the floor unconscious, while the others walk over and on them. Men, women, and children bunk down together, and it is suspected that they do not all hav the "power," but are in for a regular pow-wow. A committee of investigation should be appointed in every town where these carnivals are held, to prevent forgery and carry off the wounded.

PEOPLE who indulge in what they consider substitutes for profanity do not realize that they frequently use the oaths of the ancients. In ancient Rome, Castor and Pollux were the favorits among the demi-gods to swear by, and when the people said by Gemini, they meant to swear by Castor and Pollux, the twins. This oath has come down to us, even to the present day, when the expression "By Jiminy!" is frequently heard. "The deuce!" is a very ancient oath, indeed, as will appear from the derivation to which it is referred—the Latin Deus—God. Nowadays it is considered a mild oath to say "the deuce;" and it is a curious thing that the deuce is generally supposed to mean the "devil." So people say, "Go to the deuce!"

THE New York correspondent of the Buffalo Express tells this story: "The girls of Trinity College, New York, were practising some chorals for the Christmas service. Brother Dix is nothing if not intensely literary in his worshipful duties, and he was just tickled almost to death because he had been able to borrow some ancient music written in the missal style of the sixteenth century. A huge page of the precious melody, with notes as big as plaques, and embellished with heads of saints and angels, was displayed on an easel in front of them. They were expected to enthuse mightily over this treasure of art and religion, and raise their voices reverentially to the mummified tune. There was one girl, a high, squeaky soprano, who seemed to hav a vocal explosion at a certain point, sending one note up like a sky-rocket. Dix was a little startled, and let her try it over and over again, and ever with the same phenomenon. 'I beg your pardon, Miss Sophie,' he said, blandly, 'but where do you find that note away up in high G?" She gazed fixedly at the ornate sheet of music, with its conglomeration of notes and cherubim. Then she emitted a te-he and said: 'Well, doctor, if I havn't been singing the head of that bald angel every time I came to it!'"

THE Christian Union relates this pitiful story: "Christmas morning, one of the police courts in New York witnessed an unusual scene. A young woman, miserably clad, pale and thin, came before the judge, leading by the hand a pinched, hungry-looking girl of four years. The mother, with tremhling lips, asked to hav her little girl sent to some charitable institution, because she could not support herself and the child. While she was waiting for the necessary papers to be made out, she clung to the baby, kissing it again and again, while tears dropped on the face and hair of the little one, to whom the whole scene was a mystery. Suddenly an elderly gentleman came into the court room, gazed eagerly about, fastened a most searching look on the face of the young mother, who was entirely absorbed in her grief. A sharp cry, 'My child, my child, but how changed!' and he clasped the mother in his arms. After a time, in the judge's room, the story was told; it is not new, and without doubt will be repeated again and again in other lives. Five years ago the young woman was a much-loved daughter in a home that was more than comfortable. She insisted on receiving attentions from a young man to whom her father and mother objected because he drank to excess." The New York Sun, calls this tale a "cheap lie," and ruthlessly prints the callous facts thus: "Without prejudice to the barrelful of morals that can be obtained from this story, it may be stated that the story is an invention, and a very hackneyed invention it is. Several New York morning newspapers printed it, nevertheless, on Dec. 29th. The inventor of it christened his invented elderly gentleman Rufus Stone, and his invented young mother Kate Barry, and found for the former a street address not in the directory, but on the North River, and, by way of a finish, clapped Kate's husband in Sing Sing. The beauty of this sort of stuff, in the eyes of some of the Sun's contemporaries, is that it comes cheap."

THE London Standard says that King Thebaw has given up drink, to which he has hitherto been greatly addicted. "As is usual with unfortunate drunkards," comments the Standard, "he is not satisfied with becoming sober himself, but he insists on every one else becoming sober. His methods are not exactly those of the Temperance Alliance, but there is no reason for supposing that the teetotal zealots of England would hesitate to adopt such methods had they only the power to carry them into effect. The Jesuits and missionaries of Spain were so anxious to benefit the souls of the nativs of the West Indian Islands, of Peru, and of other countries, that they burnt their bodies alive. The Alliance is no whit behind the Jesuits in zeal and fanaticism. In Mandalay hammering appears to be the punishment adopted for drunkenness. A Burman has been hammered to death, and the companion of his drunken spree, a Jewish British subject, is dying in jail, with several bones broken. Thus it will be seen that the customs introduced by Thebaw differ widely from those which prevail here. In Burmah drunkards are hammered to death; in England they hammer their wives to death. The Burmese method clearly possesses marked advantages; but we fear that Sir W. Lawson will never succeed in inducing the House of Commons to legalize it here."

THE current number of the New Englander has an article on "Inspiration" by Dr. John Bascom, president of the Wisconsin state university. The Religious Herald thinks the "article will open the eyes of some good men pretty wide. It repudiates all evangelical views on the subject, and reduces the divine guidance of the Biblical writers to 'the normal activity of the mind under the truth.' If this is not stark Rationalism, it is impossible to conceive what Rationalism would be. It is the Rationalism of Theodore Parker over again—who believed in a religious genius, i. e., natural genius employed on religious subjects, 'the most complete action of human powers, though free from no one of their ordinary accidents or liabilities' (as to error). Professor Ladd's view is said to 'almost, if not quite,' amount to the same thing. The motto of the New Englander declares that it swears in the words of no master. Yet its founders abode by the words of Christ as their 'master'—holding them to be final and of supernatural authority. It still claims to be 'an exponent of New England views.' Is denial of the inspiration of the Bible to be recognized as one of these 'views?' How many more articles like some published of late is the New Englander to send abroad on a mission of evil before the inquiry will everywhere arise, whether it is any longer conducted in the interests of the Christian religion?" And the Presbyterian Banner says: "The Wisconsin State University must hav a rationalist out-and-out of the Theodore Parker school at its head. Its president, Dr. John Bascom, has an article on inspiration in the New Englander for January, which repudiates all evangelical views on the subject, and reduces the divine guidance to which the writers of the Old and New Testaments were subjected to 'the normal activity of the mind under the truth.' 'The doctrin of inspiration springs from vague thought,' according to this writer. The Christian people of Wisconsin are to be commiserated for having a man at the head of their state institution who proclains such views with respect to the inspiration of the Word of God. But what shall we say of Yale College, where Professor Ladd, of the theological department, teaches and publishes just about the same thing? It is difficult to see how Christian parents can consistently place their sons under such influence."

News of the Week.

OWNEY GEOGHEGAN, one of New York's most notorious disreputables, died last week.

THE World's Exposition at New Orleans is in financial straits, and has been obliged to borrow $60,000.

THE grand jury at Chicago hav indicted two hundred and forty-nine judges of elections for complicity in the frauds on the ballot in that city.

THE Rev. George Spencer, of Norfolk, Va. has accepted a call from the sheriff, and gone to jail. He broke into a house and committed larceny.

LORD GARMOYLE, the young scion of English nobility who has just paid an actress $50,000 in a breach of promis suit, is in New York. He is said to be a typical "dude."

ONE hundred and twenty men were thrown out of employment by the burning of a building last Saturday belonging to the Winchester Arms Co., at New Haven, Conn. Loss $60,000.

A ROW took place between opposing factions in a Catholic church at Fall River, Mass., last Sunday, which necessitated the calling in of the police to preserve order while the services were in progress.

JOE COOK lectured in this city last week on Mormonism. He would suppress the evils of the system by not admitting polygamists into the country, and by passing a national law abolishing polygamy.

THE Sunday law is being enforced with more rigor than at any previous time. Front doors of saloons are kept tightly closed, but there has been no Sunday when those unwise enough to drink liquor could not obtain it by going in at side entrances.

THE Rev. Anthony Walker, of Marshall, Texas, departed this life on the 23d. He was hanged for murder, having killed a man to gain possession of fifty dollars, one hundred and fifty acres of land, and the wife of his victim. Death loves a shining mark.

A WARRANT for polygamy was recently issued for the arrest of C. W. Penrose, editor of the Deseret News, the Mormon church organ, at Salt Lake City, Utah. The polygamous editor was not found. A man named Angus Cannon was arrested on a similar charge, and held in $2,500 bail.

THE Tombs Police Court is a place in this city where those are tried who break the law. There is a law in New York against Sunday labor. Painters and grainers were at work all day last Sunday varnishing and graining the wood-work of the Tombs Police Courtroom. Thus was law "violated in her own temple."

DYNAMITE was exploded in the Parliament buildings in London last Saturday, doing great damage to the structure, and wounding about thirty-five people, men, women, and children, some of them seriously. No clue to the identity of the persons who placed the explosivs in the buildings is known to hav been discovered. The affair causes the greatest excitement in London.

A CONCERT for the benefit of the miners of Hocking Valley, Ohio, on strike against a reduction of wages, was held at Steinway Hall in this city last Sunday evening. It was called a "sacred" concert, and, considering its object, was probably as sacred as any. Most of the music was furnished by trades unionists and all of it was good. The hall was full, and something like five hundred dollars was realized for the benefit of the miners.

REPORT from San Francisco says that the Piute Indians are starving on their reservation in Youma, Nev. They hav not yet received a dollar of the $9,000 appropriated by Congress. The winter in Nevada has been very severe. The reservation is so barren that nothing could be grown on the land. The Indians number seven thousand. Almost their sole means of subsistence has been pine nuts, fish from Pyramid Lake, and rabbits, latterly the only game on the reservation.

Money.—No. III.

A NEW MONEY AND A NEW BANKING SYSTEM NEEDED.

1. The government should decide how much money per capita should be put in circulation, and this amount, or more, should be printed in various denominations and on good paper.

2. A banking department should be established at Washington, and branches should be established in all business centers, as we now hav post-offices. The whole system should be under the control of salaried officers who should be made to furnish ample security for all sums intrusted to them. Branch banks should be compelled to report monthly to Washington.

3. These banks should loan the national money to all citizens who could furnish the required security, and at a uniform rate of interest to all. They should never refuse to loan to any person offering the required security. They should also accept deposits for safe keeping, and should pay interest on all deposits left in the bank more than one full month.

4 No money, except the national money, should be legal tender for debts, but all other good money, or money that is now national, should be accepted at the banks at par, and sent monthly to Washington, where the paper money should be burnt and the specie converted into bullion.

5. The rate of interest should be changeable monthly and should affect all borrowers and depositors alike. No borrower should be required to pay the principal so long as he kept the security good and paid the interest charged for the time he had the money.

6. The rate of interest should be increased monthly when the volume of money per capita in circulation tended to run above the sum fixed upon as desirable to put in circulation, and it should be lowered when it tended to fall below that sum.

7. The rate of interest paid to depositors should be lower than the rate charged to borrowers to pay the expenses of banking and compensate for loss from bad risks.

8. Pawnshops should be run in connection with banks, and money loaned at a little higher rate of interest to compensate for expense of storage of security. Goods should never be sold so long as this interest is paid, and when sold, the balance, if any, should be placed to the credit of the borrower.

9. Merchants trading with foreign nations should be allowed to buy gold or silver at Washington, or any other place, at as cheap rates as they can get them, or to take loads of one kind of merchandise with them, and return with another kind of merchandise. Traders should be allowed the utmost liberty.

Let us now suppose we are about ready to start this banking system, January 1, 1885, and let us try to imagin how it will work. Let us decide to put $30 per capita in circulation, and hav the currency printed to do this; and more, for we may sometimes require to use more for a short time. Let us start at three per cent to borrowers, and giv one per cent less to depositors.

Those having money on hand would very rapidly exchange it for the national money, and we may imagin the national money to pass into circulation as follows:

1st	month,	$10	per	capita.
2d	"	15	"	"
3d	"	20	"	"
4th	"	25	"	"
5th	"	28	"	"
6th	"	30	"	"
7th	"	31	"	"

We hav now above the sum fixed upon as desirable to put in circulation. If we should continue to loan at three per cent we would soon hav too much money out, and this would lessen its purchasing power. If we should stop loaning it would cause a panic, and those we loaned to yesterday at three per cent would be loaning to their neighbors to-day at twenty per cent. But let us now raise the interest to four per cent to borrowers, and pay three per cent to depositors. Fewer will then care to borrow, and more will make deposits, and at the end of the eighth month the amount per capita is found to be $29. If we should now continue to loan at four per cent, the amount of money in circulation would become too small, and its purchasing power too great; we therefore lower the interest to three and one-half per cent to borrowers, and two and one-half to depositors, and at the end of the ninth month we find $30 per capita in circulation.

Thus by changing the rate of interest monthly, we can regulate the amount of money in circulation as certainly as the governor on the steam-engin regulates the amount of steam to the engin, and by having a uniform amount of money per capita in circulation its purchasing power will forever be uniform.

In case of war, the government could pay the soldiers from these banks. The effect of war would be to raise the national interest, but the purchasing power of the money would remain the same.

Occasionally there would be fraud connected with the banks, just as there is now with banks and post-offices, but the frauds would be no greater than now, and we do not imagin that the government should sell out the post-offices to Jay Gould because of the frauds connected with them.

The fact is, we might nearly as well hav our army and navy in private hands as our banks. In the one case our lives would be endangered, and in the other our property. J. G. MALCOLM.

Comstock's Anniversary.

There were two meetings last week of great and abiding interest to the Christian people of this city. The first was the meeting between the eminent Mr. John L. Sullivan, of Athens, Mass., and the distinguished Mr. P. Ryan, of Troy, N. Y. The second meeting marked the coming together of Mr. Anthony Comstock and his society to celebrate their eleventh anniversary. Particular friends were invited to partake of the hilarity of the occasion thus:

1874. Eleventh Anniversary. 1885. The New York Society for the Suppression of Vice invite their friends to celebrate with them their eleventh anniversary at Association Hall, cor 23 d street and 4th ave, New York city, Jan. 20, 1885, at 8 o'clock P.M. Addresses by the Rev. R. S. McArthur, D.D., of Calvary church, and the Hon. Peter B. Olney, late district-attorney of New York county.

150 NASSAU ST., N. Y., Jan. 16, 1885.

DEAR SIR: The board of managers of the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice most cordially extend an invitation to you personally to attend the eleventh anniversary of this society. We feel sure that the facts to be presented will be regarded by you as of special importance and interest, and we bespeak your presence. If you cannot be present, will you kindly extend the accompanying invitation and admission card to some gentleman of influence? Yours very truly.

The foregoing document having been received at the office of THE TRUTH SEEKER, it was turned over at once to the vice-suppressing editor, who, of course, gave the matter his special attention.

"Association Hall" is the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association. The building stands at the corner of Twenty-third street and Fourth avenue. It cost a million dollars, more or less, and has never paid any taxes. Within a stone's throw of the structure are a number of huge churches, valuable, on account of the ground they occupy, to the extent of two or three millions more. These pay no taxes. At the front of the hall flaming posters announced that the Rev. Joseph Cook was soon to lecture there on Mormonism. A spectral doorkeeper took the ticket away from the visitor as he passed in at about a quarter before eight. Two or three hundred men were present. Kiliaen Van Rensselaer, the treasurer, brought a female with him and ensconced her in a little room beside the stage, where she could hear without seeing or being seen. The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher soon came in, and took a seat beside this writer, to whom he tendered a how-are-you-young-man kind of nod. The nod was returned in very much such a same sort of a similar style. The young Christians gathered around Mr. Beecher and extended to him their distinguished regards. The way they walked over everyone in the vicinity in order to get a word with the great man was rather fatiguing to the vice-suppressing editor, and he got up and moved away. Interest culminated when President Colgate arrived, in company with Mr. Olney, Lawyer Beecher, Dr. Crosby, the Rev. Mr. McArthur, and numerous other influential citizens. Behind these came Anthony Comstock, walking with a swagger that was decidedly "tough." These gentlemen all took seats on the platform.

President Colgate, whose name has great weight, as is evidenced by the deep impression which it has made on many cakes of hard soap, opened the meeting by telling the audience what they were there for. He then remarked that it was the custom to precede business with prayer, and introduced Dr. Howard Crosby. "Almighty God, our heavenly father," said the doctor by way of a starter, "thou hast had compassion upon us, sinners that we are. Thou hast given us of thy holy spirit. We thank thee for the society whose anniversary we celebrate to-night. We pray that thou wouldst bless this association. Arouse us to a greater sense of the evils around us. Giv zeal and discretion to thy people. Hear us, we beseech thee, in these our supplications, and grant us grace for thy son's sake." The reverend gentleman further expressed a desire that these suggestions might take effect immediately.

Anthony Comstock was next presented. He has grown fatter and balder during the past year, and the scar on his cheek is more conspicuous than ever. Mr. Comstock felt constrained first to giv thanks to almighty God, who, in spite of the hard times and the presidential election, had signally blessed "your secretary." He then read his report, which was a cross between a sermon and a police gazet. The year 1884, he said, was a thing of the past. He had made 120 arrests and seized 34 tons of obscene matter. This included books, stereotyped plates of classic works, and several confectioners' stocks of prize candy. One gambler had endeavored to corrupt the society by an offer of $25,000 on the condition that his business should not be interfered with. In spite of the great work which might be done with that sum, it was indignantly rejected. The gambling concern, however, continues to do business at the old stand. The report included no reference to the Infidels, who hav figured so conspicuously therein heretofore. With further acknowledgments for divine assistance, and an appeal for pecuniary aid, the secretary subsided.

Kiliaen Van Rensselaer had his turn next, and shot off the treasurer's report. Killy's jaw has not lost its wobble. He reported the society $644 in debt. Nine thousand dollars had been expended. The report was interlarded with various muddled comments, emanating apparently from the treasurer's stomach. The treasurer is a most amusing person.

The late District-Attorney Olney was here elicited from a huge ulster that had been occupying a chair, and was discovered to be in full dress. He said he was unprepared to make a speech, and his subsequent performance bore out the assertion. He seemed to hav a large stock of assorted gestures and attitudes on hand, which he displayed in great profusion. He addressed the chair and the audience in a way that led them to believe that what was to come would be nothing short of tremendous, but his energy spent itself in physical exercise. The other orators fidgeted uneasily in their seats, and were visibly relieved when Mr. Olney finally sat down.

The Baptist preacher, Mr. McArthur, peeled off his coat, and did the religious clown act. His gestures were remarkably powerful. At the close of one of his wildest periods he struck the stand with both hands clenched, and only his agility in grasping it prevented that useful piece of furniture from being effectually knocked out. The speech was laudatory of Comstock, who was characterized as a nineteenth century savior walking in the footsteps of Christ.

This would hav closed the proceedings if somebody had not shouted "Beecher." The shout went around the room, and the Plymouth pastor ascended the platform. He is a large man, turned seventy, with long gray hair, a heavy but good-natured face, a barrel-like trunk, and rather short legs. Mr. Beecher said this eulogizing Anthony Comstock was all right in its way, but did not go deep enough. The trouble was that the Christian churches exerted no moral influence. In the best society, so-called, there were moral cannibals who devoured the character of their neighbors. There was so much corruption in the church, Mr. Beecher intimated, that the vice which the vice association was endeavoring to suppress seemed insignificant in comparison. Those who tried to reform the community were usually treated to nominal rotten eggs. "As for myself," said the speaker, "I stand where rotten eggs are plenty. I expect nothing else." This reminded him of an incident in the life of William Lloyd Garrison. Garrison was presented with a watch by his admirers. He took the watch and said: "Gentlemen, I am overcome. It is a watch! If it was a rotten egg I would know what to say." As for Anthony Comstock, Mr. Beecher knew nothing about him. He had always compared that person to a ram butting at everything he saw. Then he told another story. There was an old farmer who had a ram that couldn't seem to get butting enough. He found no opportunity to do himself justice. So the farmer hung up a beetle in a tree one day, and let the ram loose. The ram butted away industriously until nightfall. The next morning there was nothing left of the ram but a little piece of his tail, and that was still butting away at the beetle. The audience were left to infer that such was to be the destiny of Comstock.

Mr. Colgate made an appeal for money.
Mr. Comstock " " " " "
Mr. Van Rensselaer " " "

During which the audience adjourned. A man stood at the door receiving contributions in a basket. Into this receptacle the vice-suppressing editor dropped one small but efficient cent.

Edgeworth.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In the name of the devil, I remark with satisfaction, in a recent issue, your mild rebuke to a Southern correspondent for speaking disrespectfully of this world's spiritual chieftain; though I could wish you had given more political point to it, in comparing his majesty with that certainly mischievous creature, the president of the United States; witness at this very moment the defeat, by his perverse discretion, of one of the very few measures of any possible use that the last Congress has passed, to wit, that for the creation of a Labor Bureau.

The devil, however, interests me more particularly; he is better worth saving than the president. In paddling up the river of Time, I once found the devil in a woman named Tari, an Asiatic sister, I suspect, of Mrs. Grundy. She was the goddess, not of fashion or morality, but of caprice generally. The Khonds of the mountains of Hindoostan propitiated her malice with sacrifice of handsome youths fattened expressly with every indulgence. Her husband, the good-natured Boora, amused himself without heeding mortal affairs. It was not considered worth while to worship him.

A similar conception of forestalling malignity by propitiation seems to hav been at the bottom of the popular devil-worship in France and other countries, but the devil plays a more interesting part in the old Slavic legend, which George Sand revives by the Zdenko of her "Consuelo." Their devil is he who has been wronged or defamed; he is the genius of liberty and self-reliance, a sort of Prometheus. Goethe's conception, perhaps, based upon this Slavic as well as on the Grecian myth—they are, indeed, perhaps, originally one and the same—is a poem into which he has thrown all his fire. It is the same Prometheus who underlies Milton's diabolic conception, which, although trammeled by sinister impressions from the Bible, renders Satan the hero of Paradise Lost.

Bearing this dual character of the devil as the principle of evil, yet the genius of Freethought and manly daring, in my mind, I had occasion, on my first visit to the North, to enter, for the first time, a great cotton mill and other machine shops. On recovering from their bewildering impressions, I felt that I had witnessed the modern incarnation of the devil. There was the audacious power, there the subjugation of humanity, the triumph of intellect allied with wealth, and there, beneath the cruelest slavery, lay the hope of this world's final emancipation by its own effort from the curse of drudgery.

Philosatanists hav devised several schemes for the salvation of the devil. Let me add mine; it consists in giving capitalism the choice between expropriation, and contentment with a modest allowance, after labor is served and made comfortable.

EDGEWORTH.

Death and Funeral of the Child of Mr. and Mrs. Ross.

Just as we were starting from home to fill our engagements in Potter county, Pa., we received a telegram from Mr. Ed. Ross, of Montezuma, N. Y., announcing the death of his darling baby (six months old), and requesting we should conduct funeral services on Thursday morning.

Few persons, in these times of supposed religious liberty, hav been called to pass through a more fiery ordeal than Mr. and Mrs. Ross. The Christians had announced and prophesied some terrible affliction, some fearful manifestation of God's wrath, would come on Mr. and Mrs. Ross for bringing Infidel lecturers to the village. The dear little one was in usual health when we arrived, in company with Mr. Remsburg, last Thursday, but caught cold and was quite sick on Saturday morning when we left there. The baby had suffered from a severe attack of measles when two weeks old, which left its lungs in a weak and impaired condition, so that the severe cold while cutting teeth was more than its little strength could resist. Taken sick, the "I told you so" was flung to Mr. and Mrs. Ross on every side. Soon as it was known baby was dead, instead of words of tender sympathy, the good Christian friends went to that poor, sorrowing mother and declared the death of her child was the just judgment of God upon her and her husband. When they learned Mr. Ross intended to telegraph for that Infidel Reynolds to conduct the funeral, their denunciations were outrageous, cruel, and inhuman. Only that Mr. and Mrs. Ross are both great-hearted, broad-minded, true Liberals, they would hav expelled these miserable bigots from their house by force.

No amount of opposition or cruel abuse, even in the hour of their bereavement, could daunt or cause either Mr. Ross or his brave, sorrowing wife to falter. Notwithstanding the fanaticism and bigotry that raged so fiercely, the fact of the exemplary life and kindness to all in need ever manifested by Mr. and Mrs. Ross had so won the esteem and respect of the people—and this was the worst charge brought against them, they had won the respect of the community, and hence their rejection of Christianity was having so great an influence—there was a request made to the trustees for the use of the Baptist church for the funeral; and as Mr. Ross's house could not possibly accommodate a tithing of the number who desired to attend, he consented, but insisted on its being distinctly understood he should hav Mr. Reynolds to conduct the services. The choir kindly volunteered, and informed us they had selected two pieces with no sentiment at variance with Mr. and Mrs. Ross's views.

The majority of the trustees of the Baptist church, and the choir, are deserving of the highest encomiums for their brave and kindly action.

Just as we stood up to commence the address, the minister of the church rushed breathless into the building, and when half-way down the aisle panted out, "Stay, one moment, sir; I wish a word with you;" and coming on the rostrum, he, in an excited whisper, protested against our presence in the church or our officiating in his pulpit on such an occasion. In pity for his youth, for he is a mere theological duckling, we pointed out to him that it would raise a fearful feeling against the Baptists, make division in his church, and giv the other denominations, although just as bigoted and heartless as his own, a pretext to join in the general cry of indignation against such inhuman conduct; that he might be assured that as soon as we announced to the people his protest he could bid farewell to his ministry, and to every hope of every getting another call, for the disgrace it would bring on the Baptist church would all be laid to him, and cling to him through life. This scared him so that he entreated we would talk very low, and act as though he was only talking in a very friendly and confidential way. He said he made the protest under pressure that he would but dared not resist; that Mr. Ross had been very kind, and helped him when others would not, and he begged we would not let the people know he had made the protest, and that we would be careful and say as little as possible against Christianity. He then took a seat with the choir. Alas! that a naturally honest and kind-hearted young man should, by Christianity and sectarianism, be made a self-confessed ingrate and hypocrit.

And yet our Christian friends ask us, "Who was ever injured or made worse by reading the Bible and embracing Christianity?"

SYNOPSIS OF THE FUNERAL ADDRESS

"Baby is dead!" More pitiful words cannot be framed by human lips; the joy, the glad, gleesome, sunlight of the home extinguished, and we realize, as never before, all must die; no matter how fondly cherished, how precious to our hearts, how beautiful to our sight, all that livs must die; love alone is immortal. Death is the immutable law of nature; a few more years, and all our places will be vacant. From the blank chaos of the past we sprang into existence, and soon, very soon, we shall be resolved back to the elements from which we evolved, and all that livs must share our destiny. On every side we see life and death, organization and decay, following each other as regular as day and night, spring, summer, autumn, and winter. When our loved ones die, we weep and mourn, we do so pity them. Much of our sorrow is only selfish. Not for this darling baby, calmly sleeping, sweetly resting, all pain ended, never more to know care or sorrow, need we weep. For our dead, in any case, all is well with them. In the language of Eliza Cook:

"'Tis a long, 'tis a last, 'tis a beautiful rest,
When all sorrow is passed from the brow and the breast;
And the lone spirit truly and wisely may crave
The sleep that is dreamless, the sleep of the grave."

In the presence of death, how beliefs and dogmas wither and decay. Death is a wonderful equalizer; saint or sinner, Infidel or Christian, death enters all homes. We do not wonder when our neighbor's house is made desolate, but when death enters our own home we stand appalled, and realize, as never before, that we are all travelers on the same journey. Oh! how much we all need each other's tender, pitying love. In the language of that noble champion of universal mental liberty, D. M. Bennett, the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER: "Those lead the happiest, most peaceful lives, who seek most to benefit those around them. Our highest duty lies not above the clouds over our heads, nor in the depths of the earth beneath our feet. Neither can we do aught to benefit or affect any being supposed to exist in either locality; our duty and field of action is here among the sons and daughters of men. In no case can we so well prepare for another life as by doing all in our power to make those around us happy." The parents of this sweet babe realize these truths, know that the laws of nature are immutable, and, assured our hearts' sympathy with them in their cruel bereavement, need no words of comfort. But in their hour of grief, of deep heart sorrow, they would fain spare dear Christian friends needless mourning on account of erroneous impressions. All that is good or of love, in Bible or any other book, they believe; only what is of hate or evil do they reject. You all hav your different beliefs; our dear friends could not be in harmony with you all, could not be Catholics, Free Methodists, Baptists, and Presbyterians, and so agree with you all. Which is right? You all differ. You claim it is your right to do so. Yes; and you should be respected in your honest convictions. Should you not award the same to others?

Truth is always truth, falsehood always falsehood, whether found in the Bible or any other book. Friends, let us no more feel unkindly to each other on account of creeds, but let us mutually realize our duty to study those questions which most nearly concern ourselvs, our race, this present world. Let us make secondary metaphysical disputations in regard to an ideal world beyond the clouds, and devote our best intelligence to practical questions pertaining to this present world in which we do now liv. Seek to inspire men and women with love of right, love of truth, love of each other, and with a spirit of fidelity to duty. Learn what is right, here and now, and do it. Giv liberally of our means to diffuse the light of science and positiv knowledge, and thus help dispel the dark mists of error, ignorance, and superstition. Liv lives of love instead of making long and loud professions of faith. Practice justice and mercy in lieu of forms and ceremonies, and, above all, constantly endeavor to promote the happiness and welfare of those around us in preference to constantly praying to a God to do it for us, confident that none of the glorious attributes of humanity can ever cease to exist, for all that is grand and noble is secure from the moldering touch of time; no disinterested deed, no generous impulse of the heart, but shall survive the stars. And in this assurance we bid farewell to this beauteous babe, and consign it back to the bosom of Mother Earth in the hope its little life, its o'er soon death, and somewhat unusual funeral service, may lead honest hearts to earnest thought that shall inspire better, kindlier, and happier lives.

Never did we speak to an audience who gave more earnest attention; all were at times deeply moved, tears falling from nearly every eye. And we feel confident that impressions were made that will result in greatly Liberalizing the community, and enabling honest hearts to free themselvs from the cruel bonds of priestcraft and superstition. For the benefit of those who are called upon suddenly to officiate on like occasions, we giv the remarks at the grave, for much of which we are indebted to the talented Susan Wixon, authoress of the beautiful and instructiv child's book, just issued, entitled the "Story Flur."

The mother has claims upon the child of her bosom, but nature has a higher and a stronger claim, and she will be heeded. The stem is broken ere the lovely lily has fully bloomed. We catch a glimpse of its beauty, and it droops and dies. Back to the bosom of Mother Earth we consign this darling little one, here evermore to sweetly sleep. Let the birds sing above her, the flowers bloom over her, the sighing winds sing her requiem; and from her sweet form may violets spring. O snow! fall gently on the spot that covers her dear form. Blow gently, chilling winter winds, above her resting-place.

"The summer sun and summer rain
Sweet flowers to life shall kiss,
And thoughts shall bloom, that she is free
From sorrow such as this.

"But through the tears that fall for her,
Through sorrow-laden hours,
Through deep regret that clouds the day,
Shall blossom fragrant flowers."

In behalf of the relativs we desire to thank friends for their sympathy and kindness. And now, baby, precious darling, we leave thee here,

"Calmly sleeping; sweetly sleeping, ever,
To wake to pain and sorrow, never, never."

CHAS. B. REYNOLDS.

A Sample Church Institution.

The following extract from the Christian at Work, copied by many of our religious and secular papers, shows an amount of bigotry hardly conceivable, and that the day has not yet past when "the truth of God hath more abounded through a lie:"

"If Col. Ingersoll were to lose his eyes, would he seek refuge in the Voltaire Blind Asylum? If Mr. Charles Bradlaugh were to become insane, would he be sent to the Tom Paine Insane Asylum? If Mr. G. C. Miln were to be struck with an incurable disease, would he resort to the Hume Hospital? If any uncared-for vicious child belonging to a Freethinker were to be found at large, would it be sent to the D. M. Bennett Society for the Suppression of Vice? There are no such institutions. No! Well, friends, continue to abuse Christianity, and when you or your friends become blind, or lame, or sick, or deaf, or insane, or intemperate, then send them to some good Christian institution. They will be taken care of free of cost and reproaches thrown in."

Now, I would like to ask the Christian at Work where are those good Christian institutions it speaks of? While in a Southern city, a short time since, I saw a large and beautiful hospital for the sick, which bore the name of St. Mary's Infirmary, and which, I also learned, was under the supervision of one of the Christian denominations of the city. I was further informed that it was open to all, and that the poor and weary traveler, sick and far away from home, might find here nourishment and rest, the kindest attention, and the most skilful medical attendance, and, of course, was deeply impressed with this seeming benevolence, and in spite of my natural aversion to the sect under whose name this institution was maintained, drew a long mark to its credit. But, alas! how often do our brightest fancies vanish, and, we, in place of the noble structures we hav reared, see only bare and shaking timbers! For upon inquiry I found that all patients at the hospital who could, in any possible manner, pay for the privilege of being there, were required to do so, in sums ranging from $6 a week up to $4.50 a day, and that the others—those who could not pay—the city provided for, paying to the institution over $2,000 a month, which came from a direct taxation of all the people, Christian and Infidel alike. Morover, being a seaport, the marine service paid to the hospital management about $2,000 monthly; besides, both the city and the marine service each provided a physician. Thus we found St. Mary's Infirmary to be a paying institution, bringing into the church coffers many hundreds of dollars each month. This is Christian charity with a vengeance, while the food and care were well on a par with the boast of benevolence. I hav since become acquainted with many other institutions of like character run by Christian denominations or Christian ass'n, but all under one and the same principle, that of making money, while each and every one of the great asylums for the insane, the hospitals for the sick, and homes for orphans, with which I am acquainted, and that are for the poor and needy, are under the government or state patronage, and to them our Christian friends hav no more claim than the veriest sinner who walks the earth. Will those interested in the advancement of Christianity ever learn that it requires something more than mere pretension to substantiate their claims? ADDISON ELLSWORTH.

Was Christ Crazy?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Heber Newton, who would be a historical critic and a holy churchman if the two characters were compatible, admits the possibility of doubting the sanity of Mr. Jesus Christ, yet he credits him with the unique personality of having been specially fashioned by God to bring the divine order of humanity out of a chaos unfathomable by other men, and thinks that such a consciousness might make one crazy.

To the mind of one who has escaped the influence of nursery tales, the belief of a man that he was thus possessed of extra-human power and office, is sufficient proof that he was off his mental balance, and the acceptance of such belief by another as the foundation of philosophy evinces that he, too, is short on reason. JOHN P. GUILD.

"Myths from the Catechism."

Heber Newton's sermon last Sunday was upon "The Trinity" and "Original Sin." It is so radical that the Sun, in reporting it, asks if the Rev. Mr. Newton's head is aching for a martyr's crown. The following are some of the more heretical passages:

"Let it be frankly conceded from our standpoint within the church that the doctrins of Christianity present, in their traditional forms, fair objects of denunciation. It requires no great learning to discover in the material woven into their outward bodies bits of very ancient pagan superstitions, fragments of the flamboyant metaphysics of decadent Greece, relics of medieval scholasticism. The whole structure presents to the modern mind a quaintly antiquated appearance, like that of some building whose type of architecture has forever passed away, and whose usages hav became well-nigh forgotten in the changes time has wrought. As a venerable antiquity, a rather ruinous tower, well overgrown with ivy, is sure of our respectful interest, but an invitation to make it our home must receive our courteously firm declination, while a command to build no other house for our souls will only provoke us, unless a rare grace checks our speech, to frankly point out its utter lack of modern improvements. It is not our fault if our eyes are open to the fatal defects of the traditional formulas, as the interpretations of the infinit and eternal mysteries to the mind of an age whose conscience has been educated by eighteen centuries of Christian aspiration, and whose reason has been illuminated by a knowledge of nature unprecedented in history.

"What an utterly baffling arithmetical puzzle is the conventional dogma of the trinity! What a moral monstrosity is the God of Calvinism! How fiendishly wicked the decrees which predestin a mass of men to unescapable damnation! How thoroughly commercial is the traditional doctrin of the atonement! How frightfully beyond the dream of insanity is the vision of the orthodox hell! How thoroughly unethical is the ordinary statement of justification by faith! These are the dogmas against which the sharp arrows of a merciless wit are leveled fair and straight. They deserve every blow they receive. As formulas of faith, their best service now to mankind is to gently die, and so leave room for a nobler growth of thought around the heart of these old and sacred faiths.

"The popular notion of the trinity is undoubtedly utterly grotesque—a sort of midsummer-night's dream of a divine being, at once one and three, of whom no conceivable thought can be formed better than that which the popular imagination of India has cast into the monstrous form of an image with three heads. The average man can hav no thought at all concerning this dogma unless it be that of a veritable triad of deities, and the conception of three gods is a distinct heresy against which the Athanasian Creed terrifically warns us. The average man can hav no conceivable thought of this dogma, for the simple reason that it is a pure piece of metaphysics.

"But is the dogma of the Trinity an utter absurdity? Before leaping rashly to this conclusion remember that this curious dogma is no invention of schoolmen. The wise men of Egypt fashioned it as a symbol of a mystery in the divine being, upon which they came in all their studies of nature. The profound thinkers of India, musing over the same mystery of the divine being, fashioned the very same notion. A doctrin of the divine trinity in unity is the underlying idea of the venerable religion of the Brahmans. Christianity, in fact, owes this doctrin to the influence of Egyptian and possibly of Hindoo speculation in the early church. Our dogma was born in Alexandria. It was probably nurtured at the hands of men from the far East. If it be an utterly unsubstantial notion, then the deepest thinking of the human mind in different lands and ages is faulted. The true philosophic thought, so saw the ancients, allowed for a variety of divine forms or masks, while holding to the conviction that all were but the changing phases of one power which preserved thus beneath a manifoldness an eternal unity. They meant that the divine being is one substance in many persons, or, as we say now, in many forms. This is the clue to the doctrin of the trinity, a doctrin which is lifted in Christian thought into a moral belief, an expression of ethical and spiritual realities. We say in answer to the question:

"'What dost thou chiefly learn in these doctrins of belief?'

"'A. First, I learn to believe in God the Father, who hath made me and all the world; secondly, in God the Son, who hath redeemed me and all mankind; and, thirdly, in God the Holy Ghost, who sanctifieth me and all the people of God.'

"Doubtless a higher statement of the trinity will be made in due time. That time has not come, however. Meanwhile let us be honest and modest enough to believe that while it is easy to poke fun at the superstitious notion of a trinity as held by good folk in the churches, it is a task too hard for the most brilliant orator or the most finished critic to do away with the facts which our fathers tried to express in this dogma, or to shape a better formula for this mystery.

"Let us look at another dogma of the churches—original sin. This is a very charming subject to consider. Through the eating of the forbidden fruit our first parents 'became dead in sin and wholly defiled in all the faculties and parts of soul and body.' They being the root of all mankind, the guilt of this sin was imputed and that same death in sin conveyed to all their posterity.

"This all looks like a nightmare dream to us in the light of our day. It lacks any historical ground. The vista of history through which our fathers looked back to an original Adam, who six thousand years ago, in his lovely Eastern garden, ate an apple which not only disagreed with him so seriously, but continued to disagree fatally with all his innumerable posterity, has forever faded out in a vastly larger and grander vision of the past. We see now quite clearly that in this traditional vision we were mistaking a poem for a fact. The God whose grandeur science reveals to us surely never thus started the human race on its career. The Father whom Jesus revealed to us surely never was thus driven to mortgage his child's soul to the devil at its very birth. Reason sees now in this story, as a literal page of history, folly, and conscience sees in it blasphemy. It is an outrage upon human nature and a libel upon God."

Our London Letter.

Prophets hav not such an easy time of it now as in the days of Jonah, and they are become as naught, a by-word, and reproach to the sons of man. Jonah appeared to successfully work on the credulity of the Ninevites, inasmuch as every living creature in the city was, in token of repentance, clothed in sackcloth, which must hav made business good for the dealers in that description of wearing apparel; and as the prophet, by his own unaided efforts, could scarcely hav caused a panic in the minds of "six score thousand persons that cannot discern between their right hand and their left hand, and also much cattle," it is fully open to surmise that he was helped by a syndicate formed to corner the sackcloth market, and it is to be hoped Jonah had his commission on the trade done.

Herbert Percy Freund, who for some years past has been prophesying the doom of this city, has had all his work for a different reward. This unfortunate prophet, unfortunately for himself, came into the world a few centuries too late, and, for denouncing the sins of the people in the Metropolitan Cathedral, has been sentenced to two months' imprisonment. The lord mayor, before whom he was brought, is a god-fearing man, as all lord mayor's are, and consequently does not believe in heavenly messengers, and told him he was talking nonsense; and yet if an Atheist were to to tell the mayor (who does a little preaching himself) that he was talking nonsense, the chances are that twelve months in Holloway jail would be the result. I don't know why Jonah should hav been considered a genuin prophet, and Freund a false one, but I suppose one must be possessed with the "light of the gospel" to be able to distinguish. The poor unbeliever, with only reason to guide him, is unable to tell the difference. What a lot we lose by having so little faith!

A few days back I had occasion to call on a true Christian, the deacon of a chapel, so he must be a good man. I only went to see him on a matter of business, but he always likes to drag his religion into everything. He knew our late friend, D. M. Bennett, when he was in England, and had seen copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He wanted to know if the paper was still being carried on, and I informed him that it had a larger circulation than ever, which rather grieved him to hear, and he waxed warm in his denunciation of unbelievers, stating that Atheism encouraged immorality, while Christianity upheld and taught the purest morality. I agreed that doubtless such was the case, and mentioned the lives of some of the Old Testament worthies in support of his statement, and also cited certain revelations regarding foreign missions, together with instances of clergyman here and in America who, being so full of the spirit, and not minding worldly things, had mistaken other men's wives for their own occasionally. I admitted that probably I was wrong, but from my benighted point of view I should rather imagin, judging from results, he must hav misplaced the terms. I regret to say that the man of God became full of "righteous anger," and told me I was a liar, and an infernal liar, and all my statements were damned lies, and I wilfully perverted facts. I thereupon thanked him for the gentle and kindly manner in which he had pointed out where I was wrong, and expressed my pleasure at seeing the good effect Christianity had upon him, and could only express regret that I had not at the time a vacancy for a religion, or I might be inclined to accept the one he offered, I am sorry to say my soft answer did not turn away his wrath, and I do not know what would hav been the result had not a white-chokered individual come in at the time, when my opponent desired me to refer the matter to him, but as I h[illegible] quite enough of one Christian, I discovered I had to keep an engagement, and peacefully retired, full of admiration for a religion that had such a delightful effect on one of its noisiest professors. Up to time of writing I hav not been converted, which may perhaps cause you some surprise. J. D.

"Carrying Coals to Newcastle."

One of the correspondents of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Mr. Bedell, reports himself recently as having asked a clergyman, who expressed a hope that the government would send the army and exterminate the Mormons, why they (the clergy) did not send missionaries among the Mormons instead of sending them to the isles of the sea, a pertinent question truly, but one which did not, as we learn, receive an answer.

Allow me to suggest in substance the reply which the interrogated clergyman might truthfully and consistently hav made, to wit: "Why, my friend, you see the Mormons would hav the decided advantage of our missionaries. They, as well as we, accept the Bible as the word of God, the Mormon scriptures being to them simply a later revelation, in harmony, of course, with the earlier contained in the Bible. Let us suppose our zealous missionary, Bible in hand, approaching the erring Mormon with denunciation of his polygamous habit. He would, with perfect consistency, reply, 'Friend, I see you hav in your hand that good book whose divinely-inspired prophecies in regard to God's people hav, as we think, a striking fulfilment in our marvelous guidance, growth, and prosperity in this naturally steril and desert country. Please point out to me chapter and verse in that word of God making polygamy a sin. On the contrary, does not the Bible direct that when a man dies, leaving a wife, his brother, no matter how many wives of his own he may hav, shall take the brother's widow to wife, and raise up seed unto his brother? And did not David, one of our model godly men, whom we mutually hold up for the emulation of our Sunday-school children as a man after God's own heart, hav more wives than Brigham Young ever dreamed of attempting to support? And did not Solomon, our mutually-acknowledged wisest man, to whom God gave wisdom above all his fellows, hav a plurality of wives, taking no account of his three hundred concubines (a possession with which we think he might hav wisely dispensed) that would hav completely and irretrievably swamped the finances of the wealthiest of our Mormon brotherhood? Did these worthies and others, think you, my Bible-believing brother, liv in continual sin by having a plurality of wives, and at the same time maintain specially friendly relations with Jehovah, as they evidently did? What God approved in Palestine, does he anathematize in Utah?' Now, to all this and much more of like tenor, what could our perplexed missionary say or do except to sadly tuck his Bible into his pocket and say, 'Well, friend, I'll think this matter over, and see you later.' And as he turns on his heel to depart, the Mormon will quite likely gleefully clap his thumb to the end of his nose, giving to his four digits a wag more significant than polite, and with a self-satisfying smirk overspreading his bland features, soliliquize thus, 'I guess that fellow don't read his Bible much.'"

No, friend Bedell, Salt Lake City is not favorable missionary ground. The belief mutually held by Christians and Mormons in the divine inspiration of the good old book deprives the church of all leverage, and she is therefore powerless to lift those Bible-believing Mormons up to any higher plane of living. I repeat, the only way is for the government to send forth some Joshua with an army and convert the whole pestiferous tribe of Mormons, as Joshua of old did the heathen of his time, men, women, and children, into food for worms. The Liberal Club.

Dr. William G. Mayo, president of the Newark, N. J., Liberal League, was to hav addressed the club on the evening of the 23d, but death in his family prevented. The subject chosen was "The Evolution of the Religious Sentiment of Mankind." At the request of Dr. Mayo, Mr. Wakeman took his place, and spoke upon the subject. Courtlandt Palmer presided. The discussion which followed was participated in by Mr. King, Mrs. Leonard, Dr. Eccles, and others.

News and Notes from the Field.

On Sunday, Jan. 18th, I again lectured at Hamilton. New faces are seen, and there is constant growth. On the anniversary of Paine's birth there will be a celebration under the auspices of the Secular Society. I hope the whole land will be lighted up with these bonfires of freedom.

On Monday evening I lectured at Eastwood, where entirely new ground was broken, and there was great excitement in the community. Under the management of Richard Hooper, who is a pronounced Liberal, and all the time pushing ahead, a very successful meeting was held. Eastwood is a small village, but round about are many Secularists, especially among the farmers; and from miles away, in spite of the cold, they came and the hall was crowded. There were many orthodox also present. Indeed, I think about half the audience were orthodox. It was rumored that a bright young Baptist minister was to answer my discourse, and I suppose that brought many to witness the fray, and see how the Infidel would fare at the hands of an embassador of God.

I gave my lecture on "The Glory of Infidelity," in which I showed that, as a spirit of inquiry and a result in truth, morality, and art, Infidelity was a mighty regenerator of the world and the source of its perpetual advancement.

My Baptist opponent answered quite glibly, and spoke for nearly an hour and made quite a sermon. Most of his speech was exhortation, and "Come to Jesus" was the main gist of his "argument." He had the old-fashioned replies all at his tongue's end, and he did not seem to realize how wide they were of the mark, and how fearfully he laid himself open to attack. He said that Guiteau was a Freethinker, and that his crime was the result of making his reason the supreme arbiter.

I answered that it was just the other way, that Guiteau, according to his own confession and defense, was not a Freethinker, but obeyed the "voice of God," an authority outside of his own reason. If he had freely obeyed his individual reason he would not hav committed the crime.

My opponent showed himself wofully ignorant of the nature of Freethought; as if Freethought had ever justified crime. I referred him to Remsburg's excellent work "False Claims," where statistics show that almost every criminal professes to belong to some church.

He asked if "two and two make four," was not a finality beyond which Freethought could not go.

I answered that he would be a very foolish mathematician who would be satisfied with such a finality and think that he knew all about mathematics, simply because he had grasped this one axiom. The nature of Freethought is to accept what truth we hav and press on to still more.

He asked if children should not submit to the authority of their parents. I said, "Yes; if the parents could make the minds of their children realize the justice of that authority. To make a child submit merely by brute force, with no appeal even to the reason of the smallest child, was a great wrong.

He told the audience they could no more be trusted than unruly colts. I answered that I did not think my audience were unruly colts, but even so far as colts are concerned they must be trained according to their nature, no matter how unruly they are. My clerical friend did not expect a colt to be "born again" in order to make a good trotter. So with man, whatever he is by nature, it is only through the cultivation of his nature that anything can be made of him.

"Well," said my clerical foe in his grand climax, "what these Freethinkers want to do after all is to get rid of God and the Bible."

Exactly so, I replied. We do not wish to get rid of truth or morality, or order, or justice, or humanity, or nature, but we do mean to get rid of God and the Bible as authorities over the human mind. To do so is necessary to human growth and happiness. This is our supreme purpose.

The minister retired with a somewhat serious aspect, as if he didn't know exactly how to understand the Infidels, while even the orthodox portion applauded the points made in favor of Freethought and humanity.

While my orthodox friend was speaking, the building caught fire. This might hav been an indication by a "special providence" to the clergyman to put a little hell-fire into his reply. However, he wisely refrained. He didn't refer once to the hot place. This shows a great improvement. A hundred years ago the place would hav been sulphurous. Whatever this "divine interposition" might mean, it was promptly frustrated by a couple of stout Infidel arms, and the "angry deity" disturbed us no more.

The waves of discussion started by this meeting will not cease for many a day, and such agitation is the life of Freethought.

After the lecture I had a glorious sleighride of about eight miles over the sparkling snow, and beneath the wonderful and starlighted canopy, and behind a couple of Canadian horses that knew how to travel. The thermometer was below zero, and the keen air made the blood tingle; but if there was any superstition in a man's brain, this bright presence of nature must hav taken it all out of him. How little and contemptible orthodoxy seemed in view of this vast immensity of sky and earth, so rich with life, so orderly, so beautiful so beneficent.

We came to the home of Thomas Malcolm, of Innerkip, and spent the night. Thomas Malcolm is one of the most pronounced Liberals in Canada, and one of its most famous agriculturists. He knows how to cultivate the land, and is an authority far and near. He has one of the most valuable farms in Innerkip, cleared by his own hands. He has a large family, and all are stalwart Liberals, both men and women, fine representativs indeed of the good time coming, when humanity shall be "good, and great, and joyous, and beautiful, and free."

There are about a dozen of the best farms in Innerkip owned by Secularists, and this does make the heart of the country parson ache, for he does like to levy for his stomach's sake upon a good farm. The farming population of Canada is thoroughly penetrated with Liberal ideas, and if our friend Reynolds should pitch his tent among them, he would receive a cordial welcome. The Canada farmers are very scientific in their methods; they raise the best horses and cattle and the best cheese and butter and honey, etc., and are awake to every new invention, and import the best stock for breeding, and are on the lookout for every new thing, and no wonder they get outside of orthodoxy with such a disciplin and constant advancement in material prosperity.

On Tuesday evening we had a sociable meeting at Mr. Malcolm's. The neighboring Liberals came in, and we had a most enjoyable affair. I gave no regular lecture, but we had readings by myself, Mr. Malcolm, Sr., and others; music by Thomas Malcolm, Jr., who could make the violin giv forth some of its most exhilarating notes; and conversation and a general good time. This was better than a lecture would hav been under the circumstances, for it brought us all together in a most profitable and agreeable manner, and created a lasting bond of fellowship. Where no hall can be procured, we should hav these sociable entertainments at our own hearthstones, and thus the world will be made fairer and better.

I was at Seaforth on Wednesday night, and though the audience was small, on account of the stormy weather, I enjoyed the occasion very much indeed. After the lecture, no one appearing to dispute what I said, we had a friendly conference among ourselvs, and discussed many points of science, philosophy, and history. The Secularists of Seaforth are among the most intelligent I hav met, and are the leading citizens of the place, and will make a strong society. Wm. Campbell, W. N. Watson, Dr. Coleman, and others are veteran Secularists, and are determined to make Freethought a moral and a practical power.

I had the good fortune to meet with Alf Roe at Wingham, an enthusiastic worker in the cause, and whose brother, A. H. Roe, now dead, was one of the most brilliant Secularist speakers in Canada, a coadjutor of Allen Pringle in his great contest with bigotry at Napanee. Through Mr. Alf Roe arrangements are made for a series of Freethought lectures at Wingham, Brussels, and other places, and thus the campaign will be vigorously pushed.

There are quite a number of Liberals at Walkerton, Ont. G. G. Bobier has been for years a pioneer worker. His son, J. H. Bobier, is to-day one of the most activ supporters of our cause. He is called the "Infidel Yankee," as he was born in Michigan, and, though legally a British subject, is an ardent admirer of republican institutions. John Chambers, Wm. Sutton, I. J. Cooper are pronounced Freethinkers, and occupy prominent official positions. George Bradley, Wm. Farquharson, of Queen's Hotel, George Etsell, James Jackson, J. B. Jickling, and others can be depended upon for plenty of good work in the future. The Opera House was quite well filled on Friday evening, although, as usual, the churches appointed special religious services for that evening, and thus tried to keep the sheep who might desire a little progress from going with the more venturesome goats. However, we had more than all their prayer-meetings put together could muster—two or three times as many, and several campaign guns were fired that the enemy will not soon forget.

SPECIAL NOTICE TO LIBERAL FRIENDS IN PITTSBURGH.

Charles Watts and myself will be at Pittsburgh Sunday, Feb. 8th. Will all friends of the cause please interest themselvs in this matter—come themselvs and do all in their power to induce others to come, that we may hav a grand rousing meeting? Fraternally yours, SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Potter County, Pennsylvania.

From Montezuma we started to Potter county. The funeral had disarranged appointments, but we hav ever held it better to disappoint in regard to lecture appointments than to fail on funeral occasions; for the orthodox are ever ready to take most ungenerous advantage, and after forcing their services on the bereaved family, turn round and declare Liberalism was well enough to liv by, but in hour of sorrow and death Liberals are glad to beg the aid of the church.

For the cause's sake, better to bury our dead with only the broken utterances of loving hearts, although but one indistinct sentence, than the eloquent effusions of ministers.

We much regretted the disappointment to Brother G. S. Ladd, of Bingham Center, but there was no possibility of reaching there on time advertised; arriving at Cuba on Friday morning; narrow gauge abandoned; went on to Friendship, thence to Ceres, and had to remain over-night. Saturday afternoon, had a twelve-mile stage trip in open sleigh; poor sleighing, terrific wind, and fearful cold; arrived at Clara, and the hospitable home of that stanch and true Liberal, I. L. Allen; had telegraphed them from Parma, but they thought we could not get there on account of storm. It was five o'clock; no meeting announced. With an energy and alacrity beyond all praise, the word was sent out in every direction for meeting at school-house, about a mile away, at eight P.M.; found we were advertised for Roulette, eight miles over the mountain, and roads unbroken, on Sunday evening, so made appointment at Millport, two miles from Brother Allen's, for Sunday morning, so as to make most of our opportunities. Had large attendance at both meeting. At Millport the fair and efficient secretary of the Clara League was in attendance, and seven new members paid and were added to the League, and five more promised. All greatly encouraged.

After a sumptous repast at the happy home of Brother and Sister Glines, we started over the mountain to Roulette, and found a large school-house crowded, awaiting our arrival. Delivered another lecture there on Monday. House could not hold all who desired to get in; first Liberal lecture ever delivered there.

Mr. Albert Green had very judiciously and thoroughly advertised. The entire expense of these meetings at Roulette was borne by him; this is not as it should be, and we earnestly hope efficient organization will remedy the wrong of willing ones bearing all the burden, and others, claiming to be Liberals, being willing they should.

We disposed of quite a number of pamphlets at both places, but there is scarcity of money, and lack of sleighing makes prospects dismal This prevented our obtaining subscribers for our periodicals. People were willing—anxious—but had not the money.

Tuesday we came to Port Allegheny; found some good Liberals here, and decided to deliver two lectures in this place. We go from here to Frackville, Schuylkill county, for Saturday and Sunday, Jan. 25th and 26th; from thence, Ho, for Altoona! to assist in preparations for the great Pennsylvania state meeting, Jan. 30th and 31st, and Feb. 1st. Let every man and woman who really desires the secularization of the government thus affording equal rights to all, regardless of religious faith or the lack of it; everyone who desires to promote scientific knowledge and sociability; all who would put an end to ostracism and persecution on account of honest convictions; all who are interested in the Tent effort this coming summer; make earnest, self-sacrificing effort to attend the Altoona meeting

Friends of universal mental liberty, let us assemble and consult together. Come one, come all. C. B. REYNOLDS,
Chairman of the Executiv Committee.

Lectures and Meetings.

THE Freethinkers and Spiritualists of Maquoketa hold a celebration of Paine's birthday on the 29th, to which ministers are invited to hear how mean their church has been through all these years in slandering Paine.

GEORGE CHAINEY has begun the publication of his lectures in pamphlet form, issued weekly, under the title of Independent Pulpit. Price, $1 for lecture season of eight months. Single copies, five cents. His address is 310 Shawmut avenue, Boston, Mass.

W. F. JAMIESON has just returned from his second trip into Wisconsin. He will be engaged the remainder of the season in Nebraska, Dakota, Iowa, and Minnesota. Liberals wishing to engage him for unfilled dates should address him at Pipestone, Minn.

HARRY HOOVER, secretary of the Pennsylvania State Liberal League, writes that "owing to the fact that Messrs. Watts and Putnam, as well as Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel, will be detained at Linesvillle, Pa., until the 30th inst., as also the postponement of the local celebration of Paine's birthday at Altoona, the meeting of the state convention at the latter place has been changed from Friday, the 30th, to Satuaday, the 31st inst., at 10 A.M., in the Opera House.

THE Friendship Liberal League, of Philadelphia, will commemorate the anniversary of Paine's birthday on Sunday, Feb. 1st, at their hall. Talented speakers hav been engaged, and arrangements made for vocal and instrumental music, besides a supper. The League will hold two sessions, at 2:30 and at 7:30. The supper will be eaten at 5:30, tickets to which are 50 cents. The feasts of reason and flow of soul will be free. The League extends a cordial invitation to all Liberals in Philadelphia and vicinity to attend.

THE City Council of Keokuk, Iowa, hav adopted a resolution declaring that the Prohibitory Liquor law was a failure. It says that moral suasion with a rigid license law is the only remedy. The city clerk was instructed to forward the resolution to Gov. Sherman, asking that a special session of the legislature be called to repeal the prohibitory law.

A Warning.

From the Christian Advocate.

We inform all whom it may concern that the Rev. A. W. Lightbourne, a member of the Wilmington Conference, was tried some months ago, and suspended for neglect of duty and refusing to attend to the work assigned him. In contempt of that suspension he is at present preaching to a few persons in the Congregational church in New York of which Dr. J. P. Newman has claimed, and, so far as the advertisments are concerned, is still claiming to be pastor. That society will get a reputation soon of being a Cave of Adullam for disaffected or disciplined Methodist pastors.

"WELL, well!" said Mr. Jarphly. "Well, what?" asked his wife. "I'm just reading of the American missionaries' attempt to introduce the Bible in China, my dear," replied Mr. Jarphly. "What is strange about that?" inquired Mrs. Jarphly. "Oh, nothing particular, only I've seen it in calf, and in Russian leather, and in cloth, and I thought I would like to see it in China," and he innocently scratched his nose. "Jarphly, you're a fool," said Mrs. Jarphly.—Pittsburgh Telegraph.

The Colloquium.

EXPLANATORY CIRCULAR.

To the Members of the Colloquium, and to the Public interested in the Affairs of the Colloquium:

The season of the year having arrived, and being already a little past, at which the Meetings of the Colloquium hav been usually convoked; and conditions existing which seem to render it imperativ that those meetings should be suspended for a term of time which cannot now be definitly fixed, I issue this circular for a friendly explanation of the circumstances; and also as the next best means of forwarding the purposes of the Colloquial enterprise.

The Colloquium was founded for the purpose of initiating and illustrating a new, and, it is believed, a very important principle of societary life—that of bringing together persons, especially representativ persons, not as usual, on the grounds of their agreement in views, but upon the opposit ground of their honest differences; for full and free, but courteous, discussion, social acquaintanceship, and mutual advancement in the investigation of truth; for, in a word, planting the new element of intellectual-diversity-in-the-midst-of-a-friendly-and-sentimental unity. It has continued in operation for, proximately, the term of three years, and has held twenty-six consecutiv meetings. It has published one pamphlet volume of its TRANSACTIONS, and has accumulated the materials for another. It has already, to some extent, become a parent society. The Nineteenth Century Club, under the guidance of Mr. and Mrs. Courtlandt Palmer, was, I think I am authorized to say, originally suggested by the existence of the Colloquium. The Sunset Club, less directly traceable to this source, has sprung up since, and has adopted the same general principle of association; and other similar institutions hav arisen, or are known to be contemplated. The sessions of the Colloquium hav been unusually harmonious from the first, and I think that those of you who hav attended most regularly will bear me out in saying that they hav been in a high degree interesting and instructiv. The interest and confidence in the movement hav steadily increased; the last two meetings especially, the first at which ladies were received as members, having been the largest and most enthusiastic that hav occurred—at one of which the Delsartian System of Art-Expression was discussed, and at which "The Artistic Society" was largely represented; at the other of which Mr. A. Wilford Hall's religio-philosophical doctrin of "Substantialism" was represented by himself and others, and discussed. Mr. Baralt, president of the Artistic Society, and Mr. Hall, having received conditional promises that their subjects should be resumed in the Colloquium this season, are, therefore, especially entitled to the apology and explanation now to be given.

The following extract from The Transactions of the Colloquium (1882–3) will place the reader to whom the subject is new, most immediately at the point of view for readily understanding what follows:

1. "The Colloquium, as a consultiv body, took its origin, somewhat incidentally, out of the operations of the Manhattan Liberal Club, which is an arena for the free discussion of all subjects and views. Rev. Dr. George W. Samson, of the Baptist church, took frequent part in those discussions, lecturing from time to time from the platform of the Club, to the mutual satisfaction of himself and friends, and of the general membership of the club. So much genuin respect and good feeling grew up out of this free interchange of ideas between parties of the utmost diversity of religious, philosophical, and political views, that Mr. Samson conceived the purpose of reciprocating the courtesy of the club, and of inaugurating somewhat similar discussions, upon religious subjects more especially, in the conference room of his own church. Accordingly, early in the year 1882, he issued invitations to members of the club, and other known or supposed opponents of his own theological views, including T. B. Wakeman, acting president of the club (James Parton, the president, residing at a distance), S. P. Andrews, vice-president, and others, deemed in some sense representativ, to meet him and such friends as might assemble, for earnest discussion upon subjects of vital interest, on given evenings, at his church.

2. "Many years earlier Mr. Andrews had conceived a somewhat similar idea, and about the year 1873 had visited several of the leading clergymen, Jew and Christian, of the city, to sound their willingness to enter into an organization for such purposes. The time did not seem to be ripe for so radical a measure, and no immediate result came from that effort; except that, in an interview with Rabbi Adler, Sen., he suggested to Mr. Andrews the term Colloquium (a talk-together) as the appropriate name for such a congress of representativ and dissident thinkers.

3. "On the later occasion referred to, Mr. Andrews visited Dr. Samson and conferred with him upon his project. The result of that and subsequent interviews between those two gentlemen was that they concurred in the idea of making the call more select, on the one hand, and more widely representativ, on the other; to giv to the meetings more of the character of a friendly conference in earnest search after truth, than of an arena for adverse discussion; and to adopt the name suggested by Dr. Adler. Mr. Andrews being willing to devote time and labor to the business of inviting and organizing such an association, which could not so readily be done by gentlemen commanding less leisure, Dr. Samson gave him, as a first step, a letter to the Rev. Dr. John P. Newman, of the Congregational church, who entered at once and heartily into the idea. From him an introduction was taken to Rev. Joseph H. Rylance, of the Episcopal church, who also committed himself without reserve to the project. Mr. Andrews, armed with the full authorization and free use of the names of those three gentlemen—Mr. Samson, Mr. Newman, and Mr. Rylance—and by their advice and consent, visited and invited other parties, and the enterprise was launched.

4. "The first meeting of the Colloquium was held in the study of Rev. Dr. Robert Collyer (Church of the Messiah), the afterooon of March 8, 1882. Present: Dr. Louis Elsberg, Rev. Robert Collyer, Stephen Pearl Andrews, Caleb Pink, Rev. John P. Newman, Prof. S. J. Sedgewick, Emory P. Andrews, J. Storer Cobb, Esq., and Alonzo E. Newton. Several letters were read apologizing for absences, especially from Episcopal clergymen urging the inconvenience of attendance during Lent.

5. "A short statement of the general idea and purposes of the Colloquium, and of the history of its inception, was made by Mr. Andrews, and discussed by the parties present, all of them expressing freely their views in relation to the nature and prospects of the enterprise. The meeting then adjourned, to reassemble after Lent, at time and place to be specified, at the call of Mr. Andrews.

6. "The second meeting of the Colloquium was held in the vestry of Rev. Dr. John P. Newman (in the Madison avenue Congregational church) the evening of May 12, 1882. Present: Rev. Dr. Joseph H. Rylance, S. P. Andrews, Rev. Cornelius B. Smith, Dr. Louis Elsberg, F. F. Cook, Prof. Henry Kiddle, S. P. Putnam, Dr. Joseph Rodes Buchanan, Rev. Dr. John P. Newman, Rev. Dr. John Forsyth, Prof. S. J. Sedgewick, Rev. Dr. (Rabbi) Kohler, and Caleb Pink.

7. "A restatement was made by Mr. Andrews of the general nature of the objects of the Colloquium, of what had occurred, and of the prospects of its success. Mr. Andrews also submitted, as a working basis for the Colloquium, the following, which should be marked as 'Colloquium Document No. 1.' Platform-Motto: IN THINGS PROVEN, UNITY; IN WHATSOEVER CAN BE DOUBTED, FREE DIVERSITY; IN THINGS NOT TRENCHING UPON OTHERS' RIGHTS, LIBERTY; IN ALL THINGS, CHARITY."

The Platform-Motto was submitted by me, was vigorously and variously discussed, was finally tacitly accepted as the basis of our consociation, and has remained the sole constitution of the Colloquium, if we except Colloquium Document No. 2, which has also had a guiding influence in the matter.

The third meeting of the Colloquium was held in the parlors of the Windsor Hotel (Fifth ave., N. Y.), at the invitation of the Rev. Dr. Newman, whose guests we were for the occasion. The fourth meeting was again held at the study of the Rev. Dr. Rob't Collyer. The fifth meeting was held in the elegant church-parlor of the Church of Our Savior, Rev. Dr. James M. Pullman (Universalist); and all the subsequent meetings, with one exception—the twentieth meeting, held in the private parlors of Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr.,—hav been held in the same luxurious quarters, where we hav been made welcome by the kind hospitality of Dr. Pullman.

Three important subjects came early forward for consideration. These were, 1. The mode of administration; 2. The presence of women (whether women should be invited to become members); and 3. The degree of publicity or privacy which should be given to our deliberations. Soon after we had settled at what seemed to be our permanent headquarters, at the Church of Our Savior, I stated to the Colloquium that up to that point of time, including some two or three months of almost continuous labor visiting and explaining the purposes and prospects of the Colloquium, I had, from the necessities of the situation, assumed an almost unlimited leadership or head-centerism in the promotion of the idea, and in the organization and temporary management of the institution; but that now, this preliminary stage having been passed through, I surrendered my self-imposed office, and submitted the whole matter to the control of the body itself, and I stated that I desired that they would either assume the future administration, or would giv me such instructions as they might deem requisit.

The whole subject of administration or governmental device for such institutions, and inferentially for institutionism at large, was thus brought up for discussion, and was quite fully ventilated. The diversity of views was very great. The sense of the difficulties in this particular enterprise, and of the almost utter hopelessness of any method of administration being adequate to hold the balance of harmony between such seemingly incongruous elements, bore apparently upon all minds as a heavy burden. All seemed to respond to a statement made by Dr. Louis Elsberg to this effect, that the most astounding phenomenon of my experience (he said) is that we find ourselvs here at all! Is it possible, he asked, that we can continue to cohere? A dozen different propositions were made and debated in regard to the best method of organizing and conducting this novel enterprise. Objections were found to them all. I took no very prominent part in the discussion, watching carefully the drift of opinion, and the obvious embarrassment which beset every proposition. The result was, however, a unanimous expression of the choice of the Colloquium (without any vote, but simply by viva voce expression) that the future administration of the Colloquium (unless, of course, that body should find subsequent cause to withdraw its assent) should be intrusted to me, and that I should continue to act, as I had acted previously, at my own discretion. The members seemed to come spontaneously to the conclusion that the real purposes of the Colloquium and the true direction to be given to its operations were still matter very much within my individual conception, and that, as in the case of an inventor or discoverer, I ought to hav the opportunity to expound the idea in action, aided and supported merely by those who concurred in the general design. They, however, added their recommendation that I should select two or three of the prominent members of the Colloquium as advisory counsel, with whom I might consult when I should feel the necessity of such advice.

This remarkable result was exactly what I had myself in mind as the right thing, and what I had planned for the future, when I should hav had my opportunity to become known, and as implicitly trusted by this new body of men, many of them strangers to me personally, as I am by the closer body of my own students and those by whom I am immediately surrounded. I did not dare to hope that so speedily and spontaneously my ulterior purpose in this respect would be realized. It was not with me a mere gratification of a personal ambition, but a sense of the absolute fitness of things, in order that I might hav the untrammeled opportunity to introduce and exhibit in practice something of my own special understanding of the true science of social organization, including the organization of popular assemblies and consociations. From the first I planned and intended the Colloquium as a sort of Vestibule to the Pantarchy, or, otherwise speaking, as a small working model of a future world-wide system of administration for all human affairs, now scientifically discovered and demonstrated, and only awaiting this and similar opportunities to be practically illustrated. I do not, of course, mean that I did not duly appreciate the great and unique honor of being called to preside over a selected body of the representativ men of the metropolis of America, but merely that I had ulterior purposes, scientific and practical, far more important than any question of mere personal consideration.

I selected and invited as members of the Advisory Counsel the Rev. Joseph H. Rylance, Frederic F. Cook, Rabbi Gustav Gottheil, and the Rev. John P. Newman. Mr. Cook and Mr. Gottheil declined for special reasons. Mr. Rylance and Mr. Newman accepted. This, with what has been previously stated, constitutes all in the nature of organization which the Colloquium has had or required. Mr. Newman said, "We must make of this Colloquium our University," giving expression to what seemed to be a prevalent feeling, that out of this rare combination of great diversities some new and important social institution was destined to be evolved. The mode in which this Higher Institute of Humanity is to arise is a subject to which I hav given long, continuous, and intense consideration, and I was grateful for the opportunity thus offered me to giv a partial illustration of my ideas of administration or control. Overtly there has never been the slightest expression of dissatisfaction with the management of the affairs of the Colloquium, and I hav never been made aware of the existence of any private grievances. So much of government as has been requisit has been in the nature of what I technically denominate Guided Spontaneity, and so little in the form of government that no one has seemed to feel it as either oppressiv or offensiv in any sense.

The question of the membership of women in the Colloquium was from the first one of those which were discussed with the utmost interest. The Rev. Dr. Rylance persistently urged their admission. The Rev. Dr. Newman objected especially on the ground that the presence of ladies in the early stages of the enterprise would tend to giv it a societary character rather than to keep it in the fixed ruts of high intellectual investigation and discussion, which he deemed exceedingly desirable. For myself, it is hardly necessary to say that my ulterior purpose looked to the full, free, and equal participation of women with men in the labors and further development of the Colloquium itself, and of all to which it was destined to lead. But I saw and stated other and, with me, leading objections to the idea of immediately associating ladies with the enterprise. The first was that their presence, with our present somewhat childish views of propriety, would necessarily be, to a certain degree, a hindrance to the free discussion of delicate social questions which might naturally arise in the course of our deliberations. The second was that the mixed assemblage of the two sexes would giv greater prominence and publicity to an enterprise which it was desirable to keep for a time somewhat in shadow until we, as men, should at least hav demonstrated our capacity to cohere. The third was that the wives of members, and especially the clergy, must be considered as entitled to membership, not on the ground that they were necessarily themselvs representativ persons, but simply from their associated rank as wives, and that any attempt to choose out representativ women, leaving them aside, might lead to domestic criticism. In the early stages of the Colloquium, this question of the admission of women was postponed, and it was, as has been stated, at the last two meetings only that the wives of all the members, and other ladies selected for their representativ character in some department of the great field of social interest, were invited to be present and participate on the same footing as men as members of the Colloquium.

In connection with the membership of women, a word should be said in respect to the general significance of the term membership as applied to the Colloquium. It was never intended to be very strictly defined, or in any sense formal, especially at the present stage of the growth of the institution. All who were continuously invited to attend, and who did attend with some regularity or frequency, were regarded as members. Others, who were invited for a special occasion, or who failed to attend otherwise than incidentally, were regarded as guests merely. The type of the institution was rather that of an individual inviting friends to his own private parlors to consult and act upon a given series of subjects.

Of course, in a body so loosely organized, nothing was contemplated or attempted of a formal disciplinary character. The nearest approach to the necessity for considering even questions of that order arose when, on one occasion, conduct by a member, who happened to be a reverend doctor, which aroused the indignation of the whole, threatened to demand a reprimand or reply. The next day brought, however, a very ample apology, explaining that the source of irritation which caused the explosion was something wholly apart from the Colloquium, with the request that I should submit the apology to that body, which was done, and the matter passed as incidental and unimportant.

The next matter of great importance which had to be considered was the degree of publicity which should be sought for, or permitted, with respect to our deliberations. Our operations were never for a moment regarded as secret, nor hardly, indeed, as private, inasmuch as new parties, sometimes almost entire strangers, were freely invited, and as no restrictions whatever were put upon the scope of our discussions, and no pledges required of any kind. It was, however, mutually understood that it was not desirable, at the commencement of such an enterprise, that it should be preceded by the blowing of trumpets. I had, indeed, at the first, made an arrangement with our fellow-member, D. W. Craig, Esq, an accomplished professional phonographic reporter, to make somewhat full private reports of the discussions for such future uses as might be desirable; but I soon found that his presence in that capacity disturbed the free flow of expression on the part of some of the members present, who could not speak without a reminder that what they said might survive and recur unpleasantly at some future day. The services of the reporter were therefore dispensed with, and I took upon myself the labor of condensing from memory the general occurrences for future reference and use. Still, upon the general question of the degree of publicity or privacy for our proceedings, which was desirable, or, under the circumstances, possible, I took great pains, by privately sounding the individual members, to arrive at a proximate concensus. The result of my inquiries was that I found a very general readiness to intrust the matter to my individual discretion, or to the contingency of events, letting it, as it were, take its chances, with no special urgency to bring it before the public, and with no effort to guard any special privacy. There seemed to be no desire, on the one hand, to court publicity; and, on the other, no shrinking from it, if, in the natural course of events, it should occur.

At present, and in this document, I am taking the responsibility of giving to the world a more formal statement of the fact of this institution, and of its past career and present status, than has elsewhere transpired. As it is now for a time to be suspended, it has seemed to me all ways safer and better to make, frankly, this statement, than to leave the subject to the random investigation of interviewers and sensational writers, from whose hands it is only by the merest chance that we hav so long escaped. I am fully aware of the great delicacy of the task which is thus self-imposed upon me, and I can only hope and endeavor to draw the line with deftness and propriety between what should be revealed and concealed, or covered by the mantle of confidence, in so momentous and difficult a matter. The fact of the existence of such a consultativ body, and some features of what it has accomplished, seem to me too important to the world's interest to be wholly repressed through any overstrained sentiment of delicacy; while, on the other hand, nothing would grieve me more than to be deemed ignorant or disregardful of the implied social sanctities which are involved. I can only, therefore, go forward, trusting to the guidance of my better genius in the endeavor to hold the true balance between the rights of mankind and the rights of the individual in so delicate a conjuncture.

First in relation to the personnel, and to individuals to whom I hav been especially indebted for co-operation and support, something has already been said; but the picture will be appropriately enlarged. To the entire membership of the Colloquium I am in all ways indebted and grateful. Some hav been more activly, and others more passivly, co-operativ; but there has been, on all hands, a wonderful atmosphere of geniality and sympathy, which, considering the diversity of views represented, has been little less than marvelous.

In further mention, and in addition to the parties named of gentlemen who hav been members of the Colloquium, and to whose co-operation and sympathies I hav been greatly indebted, the following names and designations are requisit: Dr. Louis Elsberg, professor in the Medical Department of the University of New York, president of the Laryngological Society, and Universologist; Professor S. J. Sedgewick, the distinguished educationist and accomplished mathematician; J. Storer Cobb, Esq., LL.D., mathematician, teacher, and Universologist; Emory P. Andrews, the energetic teacher and advocate of Tonic Sol Fa, the new and improved system of musical education; Alonso E. Newton, a pioneer and representativ philosopher of Spiritualism, and enlightened educationist; F. F. Cook, journalist, the subtle thinker, and critical investigator of spiritual philosophy; Professor Henry Kiddle, late secretary of the New York Board of Education, and representativ Spiritualist; Dr. Joseph Rodes Buchanan, the distinguished anthropologist, and scientific discoverer in new and occult spiritual and anthropological spheres of learning; Rev. John Forsyth, of the United States army, Newburgh; Rev. S. S. Seward, of the Swedenborgian church; Rev. N. Bjering, of the Russian Greek church; Rev. Dr. (Rabbi) A. Huebsch, since deceased, and greatly regretted; Rev. D. M. Hodge, of the Universalist church; Rev. C. H. Eaton (successor of Chapin), Universalist church; Elder Giles Avery, of the Shaker Community, New Lebanon (by correspondence); Rev. (Rabbi) M. Brown; Rev. Charles Higbee, of the Methodist church, Westchester Co., N. Y.; Rev. Jas. Lightbourn, of the Methodist church; Ex-Rev. S P. Putnam, secretary of the National Liberal League; Professor Isaac L. Rice (Columbia College); Porter C. Bliss, of the New York Herald staff; T. B. Wakeman, late president of the National Liberal League; Dr. William H. Atkinson, dentist, natural scientist, and Universologist; William Frey, Russian thinker, author, journalist; Professor David S. White, Universologist; Hon. Nelson Cross, representativ journalist; L. S. Metcalf, editor of North American Review; Edward King, representativ of the Workingmen's party; Edward M. Searing, Esq., Positivist; Isaac N. Forbes, inventor; J. O. Woods, business manager (Wheeler & Wilson); Courtlandt Palmer; E. A. MacLean; Franklin Burlingame, Universologist; Doctors E. B. Foote, Senior and Junior; Herman H. Shook, Esq., Clinton Furbish, representativ Greenbacker: Dr. David Engel, dentist and Universologist; Henry F. Randolph; Charles Frederic Adams, Esq.; Dr. Wm. McLaury; John Henry Johnston; J. W. Frankel; William Hanson, reviewer of Henry George; A. Van Deusen; S. H. Wilder, an able thinker, and subtle defender of Christian philosophy; Charles L. Andrews, dentist and Universologist; Dr. T. S. Lambert, physiologist and Universologist; George W. Renton; William M. Boucher, representativ student of the science of money; J. B. Brown; Henry J. Thomas; E. W. Chamberlain, Esq.; Professor A. L. Rawson, artist, illustrator of Bibles, Beecher's "Life of Christ," etc.; Dr. G. H. Eccles; E S. Dean; Dr. Caleb Weeks.

Of the more or less distinguished guests of the Colloquium, those who hav been present at the meetings on a single occasion, or only seldom, the following may be mentioned: Rev. William R. Alger, Boston; Rev. George W. Gallagher; Charles Bright, of Australia, for the New Continent of the South what Bradlaugh is for England, and Ingersoll for America; Alfred E. Giles, Esq., Hyde Park, Mass.; Louis F. Post, Esq., late editor of Truth; Henry George, author of "Progress and Poverty;" M. Naumberg; George A. Fowler; W. Dannmeier; Hon. William S. Andrews; Samuel Leavitt; Wilson Macdonald, sculptor and art critic; Edward Russell, artist and Delsartian; Louis Baralt, president of the Artistic Society; Talma Drew, Delsartian.

The ladies who were invited as members or guests, having only been present at the last two meetings, and having taken no activ part in the discussions, I do not feel authorized to make public mention of them individually. I regret that the opportunity should not hav been more ample for developing the kind and degree of interest which they would hav taken in the affairs of the Colloquium.

In relation to the occurrences at the meetings of the Colloquium it is not much of detail which will be required. The discussions themselvs hav been, as was to be expected, among the most brilliant, earnest, and profound which could hav been heard in any presence, or on any occasion anywhere. It is a matter of regret that they could not hav been fully reported and preserved; but even then, the accentuation which they received by the delicacy and novelty of the situations occupied by many of the speakers could not hav been communicated on paper. Wit, as well as wisdom and eloquence, sometimes abounded, and occasionally some one's forgetfulness of the conditions and surroundings, gave rise to a touch of uproarious mirth. On one occasion Mr. Thaddeus B. Wakeman, temporarily oblivious of the fact that he was not haranguing the New York Liberal Club, began indulging in an outburst of invectiv against the narrow-mindedness and conservatism of the clergy, when Rev. Joseph H. Rylance promptly called him to order, reminded him that he had forgotten the presence he was in, and appealed to the chair. Mr. Wakeman, awaiting no decision, promptly and amply apologized. Five minutes later, Mr. Rylance, having got on his feet, and perhaps equally prompted by an old habit, was making a caustic assault on Infidels and their methods of reasoning, when Mr. Wakeman as promptly called him to order, and Mr. Rylance as promptly and amply apologized, and the whole occurrence "brought down the house" with a roar of applause, while a welling up of deeper feeling seemed to whelm the hearts of all present, and tears glistened in the eyes of some as if at the thought that a new era of genuin human sympathy and courtesy had opened on the world. On another similar occasion Mr. Rylance exclaimed, "You are all the best of Christians, no matter what you call yourselvs." He, from the first, while doubting what he called my Utopian views of ulterior results, prized the Colloquium especially for the social and sympathetic element, as manifesting itself among persons intellectually arrayed in opposit camps, but a year or two later he said to me that he had far more faith in my Utopias than he had at the beginning.

At the fifth meeting of the Colloquium, the first at Mr. Pullman's church, events occurred which mark it as a real epoch. The conference spontaneously resolved itself into a sort of "love-feast" or mutual confessional, in which all in turn recited, in unrestrained confidence, the causes which had fixed their several religious states of conviction, and their struggles and efforts to obtain the truth. It appears that many eminent churchmen had been racked by doubts, or by other difficulties of their position, and that, on the other hand, many of the leaders of radical reform had either been clergymen, or were trained in early life for the church. The sympathetic interflow of experiences was such, on this occasion, as had probably never characterized a similar assemblage of men. It seemed like the breaking down, or the melting away, of the walls of partition which hav so sternly separated loving hearts by the rigorous behests of dogma and adverse intellectual conviction. Strong expressions were made of a painful sense of isolation from this cooped-up and limited position of the human mind, and of a strong desire for enlargement and mental emancipation. Equally strong assertions were made touching the ultimate forms of truth. One distinguished reverend doctor exclaimed: "My God! I hardly know any longer what to preach; so rapid and sweeping are the changes of belief which are coming among us; but then," he added wittily, "it does not matter so much, for my congregation is so very small, and their small number is not due to Ingersoll, for they had left before he came about."

The expenses of the Colloquium having been almost nil, but slight attention has ever been given to the question of finances. Dr. William H. Atkinson consented to act as treasurer, but his functions hav been of the least onerous character. When funds were needed for the first volume of The Transactions, they were readily contributed, and the other slight incidental expenses hav been borne by individuals without the necessity of any formal statement.

Colloquium Document No. 2, which has served as a sort of suplementary constitution to the Colloquium, has been printed as a separate document, and will continue to be furnished free of expense to the members of the Colloquium and others who may order it. It can be ordered direct from THE TRUTH SEEKER, and will be forwarded on demand with postage stamp. It has received a profound appreciation on the part of the few; and it is believed that, with a deeper insight into universal principles, it will continue to gain upon the convictions of mankind, and will be deemed an important contribution to the theology, to the New and Reconciliativ Catholicism, of the Future.

The term Colloquium has already given rise to a brood of etymological derivativs which are coming into free use with those who hav made their acquaintance. In addition to the old and familiar adjectiv "colloquial," we hav now in our vocabulary colloquist for one who partakes in a set conversation; colloquian for a member of the Colloquium; and to colloquize or colloque as the verb, meaning to partake in colloquy, set conversation, or the discussions of the Colloquium. For this last and abridged expression, to colloque, we are indebted to the genius of our learned fellow-member, Porter C. Bliss, of the New York Herald.

Under the circumstances now thus fully recited of the growth, harmony, and high promis for future development and usefulness of the Colloquium, I return to the subject, and resume the statement of the imperativ causes which hav led me to suspend its meetings, and the more ostensible forms of its administration—in a word, to prorogue the Colloquium for a season. I hav been, for a lifetime, engaged in the tremendous labor of discovering and formulating the all-embracing unitary science known as Universology; and in elaborating the two most immediately practical outgrowths of this immense discovery, the first of which is Alwato, the scientific universal language, the future vernacular of the planet; and the second of which is Pantarchy, or the new, scientific, universal Government and Social Institute of humanity. The culmination of these great enterprises

The Truth Seeker Annual for 1885.

The labor of issuing "The Story Hour" delayed the publication of THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC a few weeks beyond our desires, but it is out at last, and those who hav ordered a copy will receive it about the same time they do this week's paper.

The ANNUAL is larger this year than last. The articles are all specially written for its pages, and are by the ablest Freethinkers in this country, including Col. Ingersoll, Elizur Wright, Mr. Wakeman, Mr. Watts, Mr. Putnam, Mr. Reynolds, Mr. Palmer, Horace Seaver, W. S. Bush, S. P. Andrews, Dr. York, Elliott Preston, Thomas Mead, Miss Wixon, and George Macdonald. For the subjects upon which they hav written see the advertisment in another place. "Freethought in the United States in 1884" contains facts of interest to all Liberals.

Portrait-making is very expensiv, but in this ANNUAL we hav gathered the men and women now prominent in Liberal work, to which bright company are added three illustrious dead—Thomas Paine, D. M. Bennett, and William Denton. Besides these, the list is: Col. Ingersoll, T. C. Leland, T. B. Wakeman, Elizur Wright, James Parton, Parker Pillsbury, S. P. Andrews, W. F. Jamieson, G. H. Walser, John Peck, J. H. Burnham, J. R. Monroe, H. L. Green, Chas. B. Reynolds, Chas. Watts, W. S. Bell, S. P. Putnam, J. E. Remsburg, Courtlandt Palmer, Lucy Colman, John R. Kelso, Elmina D. Slenker, Amy Post, Helen H. Gardener, Mattie Krekel, Horace Seaver, Luther Colby, J. P. Mendum, J. L. York, Chas. P. Somerby, E. M. Macdonald, Juliet H. Severance, Susan H. Wixon, Mrs. H. S. Lake.

If our friends appreciate this endeavor to make them acquainted with the men and women many of whose names are household words in almost every Freethinker's family we can next year introduce all of America's splendid Infidels who hav passed away, and perhaps go over to England and Europe for their mental slavery abolitionists. Besides the portraits, the ANNUAL contains a few illustrations taken from "The Story Hour," and several smaller pictures of great beauty. The Calendar has been enlarged by the further recording of noticeable events in the Freethought work. The sketch and picture of the D. M. Bennett Memorial will, we feel sure, be highly prized by all the contributors to the structure, and the rest of Mr. Bennett's friends. The history of the National Liberal League is resumed by the new secretary, and a full report of all its important proceedings is given by him.

The ANNUAL is finished in the same elegant style as last year—tinted paper, heavy antique covers, and printed and bound in the most skilful manner. Although containing more reading-matter than the ANNUAL for 1884, the price is the same, 25 cents. We are ready—and even anxious—to receive orders, and Mr. Somerby is willing to sit up all night, if necessary, to fill them.

Instead of the usual lecture and discussion at the Liberal Club on the 30th, the evening will be set apart for a celebration of the birth of THOMAS PAINE. There will be speeches, and music, and recitations, and everybody is invited to attend and help to make the occasion a memorable one.

Remember the date and place—Friday evening, Jan. 30th, at German Masonic Hall, 220 East Fifteenth street.

How the Treasuries of the States are Robbed.

Below will be found some further figures giving the immense amount of church property in the country which is exempt from taxation. Unless otherwise stated, the figures are from the United States Census of 1870, that for 1880 not being yet complete. Those of 1875 are the different state censuses, and from the churches' own Year Books. That for New York is for 1870, 1875, and the last sum (101,105,765), is the estimated sum of the present values of property used exclusivly for church purposes, as given last week. By comparing the figures for 1870, and those (where given) for 1875, say New York, for instance, the per centage of increase is seen. This increase in the older states is largely due to the rise in value of real estate; in the newer states and in the territories the increase is due to new buildings and the acquirement of more real estate. The census of 1880, when completed, will probably show a church property valuation of nearly double these figures:

Alabama,	$2,414,515
Arkansas,	854,975
Arizona,	24,000
California,	7,404,235
Colorado,	207,230

The six leading sects in this wholesale public robbery are the Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Episcopalians, and Roman Catholics. The amounts respectivly credited to them by the census of 1870 are:

Methodists,	$73,975,581
Baptists,	41,608,198
Presbyterians,	53,265,256
Congregationalists,	25,069,698
Episcopalians,	36,514,549
Catholics,	60,985,566

At least forty per cent can be safely added to these figures, representing the rise in value of property (which, in cities especially, is very large) and the further acquirement of property by church organizationt. If our professional soul-savers were as honest as pious they would walk up to the collector's office and settle. But there is no likelihood of this being done until they are compelled to do it by the force of public sentiment.

A Plain Truth.

Last Sunday the Rev. Dr. Patten, president of Howard University, preached a sermon in the Congregational church of Washington on "Women and Skepticism" in the course of which he expressed the opinion that when women receive too much liberty they branch off into skepticism and immorality. He said, among other things, that the lives of such women as George Eliot, Mme. Roland, and Harriet Martineau exemplified the truth of this assertion.

Among his audience were Miss Susan B. Anthony and Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, and on the conclusion of the service these ladies walked to the platform and upbraided Dr. Patten for his utterances.

Miss Anthony said to him that if his mother were living she should take him across her knee and spank him; and Mrs. Stanton, interrupting her, said: "On the contrary, let me congratulate Dr. Patten. I hav been trying for years to make women understand that the worst enemies they hav are in the pulpit, and now he has illustrated it beyond question."

We hope the women of the country will seriously consider Mrs. Stanton's remark. It is true. For his slander of George Eliot and Harriet Martineau the Rev. Dr. Potter deserves the execration of all decent people. In some way the ministers should be taught that the pulpit is no longer a protection for them in such malicious calumny.

The Dry Goods Clerk and Soap-Boiler's Society.

The recent activity of Anthony Comstock culminated last week Tuesday in the meeting of the "Society for the Suppression of Vice." His efforts are annually more vigorous a few weeks previous to this event, to the end, doubtless, that he may be advertised, the society glorified, and solid men with cash be induced to attend "your secretary's" gathering and drop generous donations into the empty treasury.

Mr. Comstock reported that during the past year he had made one hundred and twenty arrests. But he forgot to explain the circumstances attending these captures. If they are all like his persecution of poor Conroy, they reflect no credit upon the society, but are a disgrace to himself, and giv the lie direct to his professions of laboring solely for the public weal. Conroy is one of the one hundred and twenty, and the men who support the society ought to know just how he comes to be in Anthony's toils.

Some few years ago Comstock arrested Conroy in New Jersey for selling pictures. Conroy asserts that he sold nothing salacious, but knowing this fact would hav no weight with a court before whom Comstock could substitute anything he pleased, swearing he purchased it of him, Conroy made a desperate attempt to escape, slashing Comstock's face with his pocket-knife. He was, however, sent to Trenton state prison and served his sentence. After his release from this institution began the persecution which has ended in his being one of the one hundred and twenty, though he is at liberty under the nominal bail of a hundred dollars. If Mr. Comstock had told the audience all about this persecution, we doubt if during the next year he had as much as nine thousand dollars to disburse, unless Colgate dived deep into his own plethoric pocket. If he had told them how he followed Conroy when he left Trenton prison and set up a news-stand on Chambers street, this city, and finding some of Col. Ingersoll's pamphlets on the stand, angrily ordered them off, threatening arrest in case of refusal, which was complied with through fear, and because Conroy had no interest in the books beyond what profit he might make; if Comstock had told the audience that on another occasion he forced Conroy to take from his stand a lot of books bought from the American News Co., of which a Catholic Jesuit is the superintendent; if he had told them also that he never said a word to the news company about these books, which company kept on selling them, and may be selling them now for all we know to the contrary; if he had said to the audience that for years he had dogged Conroy and forced him from one place to another by bulldozing the owners of stores on the steps of which Conroy displayed his small stock of wares; how he had insulted him on the street and in the horse cars, calling him a prison bird; how, through Conroy's ignorant fear of "your secretary," he compelled him to giv up selling pictures perfectly legitimate and in the show cases of every art dealer from the Battery to the Boulevard; if he had related all these and a dozen or two more instances of his persecution of an uneducated man, without trade or profession, but with a family which he knew no other way to support, we are inclined to think that the audience would hav had much less sympathy with "your secretary," and been inclined to subscribe to the relief of the victim instead of to the treasury of the Young Men's Christian Association Inquisition.

There were one or two noticeable features in the report of Comstock and the speeches of his supporters. The usual reference to the Infidels and Freelovers was left out, and they were not threatened with a stamping out of their literature. Apparently they are to be let alone, for, as Colgate said, a wider field is opening to the Society, which is to bear a hand in the general regulation of a few of New York's lower strata of humanity, and in conjunction with Crosby & Whitney's "Society for the Prevention of Crime," perform those functions which the state and municipal ordinances impose upon the police. But if our legal guardians submit to be thus snubbed and superseded by these two ecclesiastical societies, the rest of the population can stand it. Between the lower strata, the police, and the agents of the societies, there is not much to choose. All the protest which the Freethinkers and law-abiding citizens feel called upon to offer is against the usurpation by the church, through its inquisitors, Colgate, Crosby, Comstock, and Whitney, of powers properly accruing only to the police. There is danger in this, for it is a practical partnership of church and state, and a tacit recognition by the latter that the former has rights in the regulation of public conduct equal with itself. Such partnership once led to a public inquisition; it now bids fair to establish two tribunals for the punishment of law breakers—our state courts and the Young Men's Christian Association. It is for the people to say whether they will tolerate the jurisdiction of this latter body, whose administration is sure to be one of injustice.

Distinguished Methodists Disagree.

The Rev. W. H. Rayburn, Methodist, is one of the most able prayer-makers in the church. He is the founder of a sect in the West known as the Pilgrim Band, the tenets of which are closely related to those of Methodism. He has a partner named Obenshein. Out in Erwin, Ill., a year or two ago, these pilgrims pitched their tent and made many converts. One evening Obenshein announced that Rayburn was a man sent from God to bring his people into the light. The number of men who hav been sent to bring people into the light is large. Considering the designer of the scheme, it seems strange that so many are still in the dark. Mr. Rayburn was accepted by the Pilgrim Band as a deity, and in their songs they changed "Jesus" to "Rayburn."

"Safe in the arms of Rayburn"

took particularly well with the young women, and many of them knew what it was to be there. One night an unbelieving farmer chopped down the tent-pole and dragged the canvas into the highway. He was arrested and fined. Then Obenshein saw that they needed a more substantial structure, and he forthwith received another divine illumination to that effect. The site of the proposed church was mapped out in the vision, and happened to be located on the premises of the unbelieving farmer who had committed the assault on the tent. The farmer refused to obey the mandate, arguing that the revelation was doubtless of Satanic origin. Many of the faithful sold all they had and gave to the poor prophet. About this time Obenshein sent his lawful wife adrift and took a good-looking local servant-girl as his spiritual wife, and the way the system of praise at their meetings was carried on would make a phallic worshiper blush.

The next vision which Obershein experienced informed him that he was God Almighty, and that a new redeemer was to be born, of which Mr. Obershein, alias the architect of the universe, was to be the father. One of the married sisters here arose and admitted that she was the Mary of the occasion, and would be the mother of the new redeemer. This annunciation was hailed with joy by all, Joseph, the husband of Mary, being especially hilarious. The multitude outside the Pilgrim Band did not relish that sort of thing, and at one of the meetings these scoffers rose up and wrecked the tent. Obenshein was last seen that evening fleeing into the wilderness with the spiritual wife on one arm and the prospectiv mother of the redeemer on the other. Joseph, the husband of the latter, came also. The prophet's hat and Bible were picked up near the scene the next morning.

The Pilgrim Band of Methodists flourished under persecution. They soon built a temple worth $5,000, with a seating and praying capacity for four hundred, and a sleeping capacity for a good many. The structure was burnt down soon after its completion. The creed of this sect was as follows:

"We believe in God, the Bible, and the Holy Ghost. Our creed differs very little from that of the Methodists, who are our most bitter opponents. In organization we differ, for we do not record our converts. When one professes, he is baptized and accepted as of God. He is a member thereafter. Our bishop we accept from God. Rayburn is our bispop now. We hav no church trials or troubles, but we welcome everyone and hav a 'God bless you' for all. If members lose faith and choose to leave us, we let them go, and that ends it. We are accused of free love and Spiritualism, but it is false. We are accused of loose morals and wrong-doing, and yet we cannot act so and retain our healing power. There is a fellowship between two religious souls that the world knows not of, and it is this fellowship they call looseness. We regard our relationship most sacredly. The Methodists fight us because Mr. Rayburn and I were Methodist ministers. They feel that they hav lost their power, and are vengeful. I think our organization will increase and some day become a recognized power."

How any good Methodist can find fault with this doctrin is almost beyond comprehension. Yet that this has been done the sequel will show. The Rev. Mr. Obenshein and the Rev. Mr. Rayburn recently came to this city and began to hold "cottage" prayer-meetings, and hav made many converts to Christianity, thereby saving, of course, an equal number of souls. In spite of this, however, the Rev. Dr. Buckley, editor of the Advocate, and an equally distinguished Methodist, has these unkind words to say of Brothers Rayburn and Obenshein:

"W. H. Rayburn, whose wife got a divorce, and who was deposed from the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal church for various improprieties, and one Obenshein, connected with a disreputable religious society in the West, are now in this city working in private houses. We hav reason to believe that they are sowing seeds of doctrin destructiv to the peace of families, inimical to true religion, and unworthy of the countenance of Christians of any name. Neither they nor their disciples should be allowed to sow their pernicious seed in any of our prayer-meetings."

This is a severe stricture upon the Revs. Reyburn and Obenshein, and bears especially hard, coming, as it does, from a brother Methodist. A reporter went to call upon Mr. Rayburn to see what he had to say in his own defense, but the reverend gentleman was not at home. Three ladies of his household, however, entered heartily in a justification of all he had ever done, and said that the paragraph quoted was attributable to "Dr. Buckley's spleen." It may be remarked that if Dr. Buckley's spleen is in such a disordered condition as to betray him into making unguarded allegations of this sort against his fellow-Methodists, that organ should be attended to at once or the church is doomed.

So the matter rests. The ministers are at war, and honest men should be on the lookout for their prerogativs.

Editorial Notes.

THE Chicago ministers hav lately been very busy "answering" Ingersoll. This is the third or fourth time the colonel has been completely wiped out by Chicago ministers, and yet he still livs. Perhaps the public do not estimate these "answers" at the same high rate the preachers who deliver them do.

"WHAT," asks the editor of a religious paper, "shall be said of a man who will publish, without the explicit consent of the author, what was said to him in private correspondence?' This is a conundrum only Boston or Chicago people could answer, unless it be he who went several hundred miles out of his way to look at the private correspondence.

J. M. ROBERTS writes us that having overcome the difficulties which compelled him in November, 1883, to suspend the publication of Mind and Matter, he will issue the first number of the sixth volume of that publication on January 31st. He wishes to thank his many patrons for their kind forbearance, and hopes to be able to show them that it was not undeserved. The advertisment of the resurrected journal will be found in another column.

"ONE of the hardest-working and most earnestly spiritual pastors in this Metropolitan district" recently called special meetings for prayer. After running them three weeks, he writes to the Independent that he was met by these painful facts: "1. Comparativly few of any church-members are interested, attend the meetings, or are activly engaged in labor for souls. I feel almost alone in this work. Not more than half a dozen brethren, I should say, hav helped in the meetings by prayer or remark. 2. Only a certain class of persons are reached by the truth, viz., young people in the Sabbath-school, from twelve to twenty years of age. As yet, none of the large company of church-going middle-aged men and women among us are interested. And strange to say, notwithstanding I hav for years had a large evening congregation of outsiders, and hav preached to them as plain a gospel as I can, none of them hav been touched. Now, what shall I do?" We advise the earnestly spiritual pastor to start a roller-skating rink. That fetches the young, the middle-aged, and the old, every time.

MR. ANDREWS'S circular to the members of the Colloquium, printed elsewhere, will be read with attention by others than the reverend persons to whom it is mainly addressed. The writer has made provisions for a large number of this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER to be distributed among the clergy of his acquaintance, and we trust these gentlemen will read the rest of the paper with equal attention. Mr. Andrews's closing paragraph is designed as a two-edged sword to cut both ways. It also contains a sort of apology to the clergy for employing so audacious a messenger as THE TRUTH SEEKER to convey his communication into the households of the elect. THE TRUTH SEEKER does not need to second the apology. The religious press, however, has got considerable to answer for. We would extend to the brethren of the cloth the compliments of the season, and wish all good ministers a Happy New Year. For the benefit of those who wish to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER, we will say that our terms are $3 per year in advance; to new subscribers, three months for 50 cents. To clergymen, $3 per year, in advance; three months for 50 cents.

THE publishers of the North American Review forward the following as their opinion of the February number of their magazine: "Whether we agree with Mr. Beecher or not, few men can speak or write on any subject of public interest with so great a certainty that everybody will want to know what they say. In discussing the question as to how far ministers may properly go in politics the great preacher shows himself to advantage perhaps all the more because it is a matter that touches him personally as well as professionally. In the same number of the Review, the question, 'How Shall the President be Elected?' is ably treated by five happily-chosen writers, viz., two United States Senators, Dawes and Vance; a college president, F. A. P. Barnard, of Columbia; a New York lawyer, Roger A. Pryor; and a well-known journalist, William Purcell. The substantial agreement of four of them on the same point is significant. Another notable article in this unusually strong number is a review of 'Holmes's Life of Emerson,' by the veteran historian, George Bancroft; and still another is an essay by Professor C. A. Young on 'Theories regarding the Sun's Corona,' which he skilfully brings within popular comprehension. The Rev. Dr. W. G. T. Shedd defends the dogma of 'Endless Punishment,' and Professor G. Stanley Hall writes on 'New Departure in Education.'"

Answers to Inquiries.

J. L. B., Rock Island, Ill.—See page 66 of TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1884.

F. H. B., Newark.—"The Truth Seeker Collection" is the nearest to what you want.

E. B. R.—Brick Pomeroy was in this city the last we heard of him. The paper is still published, we believe, but not by him.

W. S. W., Rising Sun, O.—We do not know how the error came to be in the "Age of Reason." We know of no explanation.

STYX.—Since Mr. Watts came to this country, W. Stewart Ross owns and edits the Secular Review. He writes over the nom de plume of "Saladin," and guides a quill dipped in gall for his enemies. He is a remarkably able writer.

ONE OF OUR SUBSCRIBERS, Oleander, Cal.—G. W. Foote and his colleagues were indicted and imprisoned for blasphemy. The minister who says the charge was obscenity is a liar. Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant are moral people, and that minister does not dare to go to England and repeat his charges. Mr. Bradlaugh would soon make him regret his evil tongue.

J. S. W., Atwater, Ill.—Yes. The observance of December 25th as the anniversary of Christ's birth is probably due to Julius, bishop of Rome (337-352). The Eastern churches had previously observed January 6th, and some of them celebrated the anniversary in May or April. The Western Christians began their festivities December 25th, and continued celebrating to January 6th. No one really knows when Christ was born.

H. W. J., Moberly, Mo.—Col. Ingersoll himself has answered the lying charges made by the Moberly Headlight by offering $1,000 to any who will prove that he plagiarized from "Hittell's Evidences of Christianity." If "the Hon. Otto Kochtisky, of Ste Genevieve," who first made the preposterous assertion, does not earn that money, he will stand before such small portion of the world as may come to know him a self-convicted falsifier.

J. M. B., Lakeview, Mich.—"He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved" (Mark xvi, 16); "And it shall come to pass that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved" (Acts ii, 21); when Paul and Silas made the midnight hour in the prison hilarious with song, and there was a great earthquake, and the keeper of the prison became frightened, and asked Paul and Silas what he must do to be saved, "they said, Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house" (Acts xvi. 31). By these texts it is seen that belief is all that is necessary to salvation—a previous good or bad life has nothing to do with the matter. And in James v, 15, it is explicitly stated that the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and "if he hav committed sins, they shall be forgiven him."

J. P. SMITH, Clayville.—You say you hav read the article on "Evolution and Christianity" with deep interest, and want "plain, square, positiv, direct answers, either in the affirmativ or negativ, yes or no," to the following:

1. Do (or did) the primordial elements, when in an uncompounded state or condition, possess the inherent principle (or quality) of intelligence? 2. Does organization (or composition) change the nature of aforesaid elements? 3. Was there ever a period in the eternity of the past when matter was in an uncompounded condition? And one more, 4. Is there any sound logic in the idea of an eternal compound?

The man who can giv such answers as you require, and scientifically demonstrate their correctness, in our opinion, does not liv. We can giv you the Materialistic, Spiritualistic, or Christian guess in answer to the first (and all others hang on that), but to say that we know all about the beginning of life, and the condition of matter at that time, would be the most colossal egotism of the century. The hypothesis of evolution is that life is simply complex molecular movement, and that intelligence is the result of organization. If you will giv the works of Haeckel a careful perusal, you will obtain the latest scientific discoveries on this subject, and you can construct any theory you please. But arguing on the questions you propound would be words, words, words, not, perhaps, full of fury, but certainly signifying nothing.

as relates to ultimate elaboration and promulgation, chances to fall in the present year, and in the few years now immediately following. The central work which now overwhelms me, and my immediate corps of assistants, with an unusual amount of labor, is the preparation for publication of The Dictionary of Alwato, and Universal Ideas which will be The Intellectual Revelation—to all intelligent humanity—of those philosophic and scientific solutions toward which the whole current of the development of the human mind has ever been steadily tending.

My first reason, therefore, for proroguing the Colloquium is that it is a waste of time and effort to endeavor to make my real thought and purposes understood by a body of even the most intelligent men, until the new basis of thinking, now matter of complete discovery, shall hav been, in a preliminary way, somewhat completely revealed and expounded.

My second reason is that, immensely important as the Colloquium itself is in idea and in practical development thus far, it sinks into comparativ insignificance, in relativ importance, as compared with these larger and more radical enterprises based on definit new discovery, and world-wide in their far-reaching significance; while the labor imposed upon me by maintaining it in activity is necessarily very considerable, and detracts, by just so much, from my efficiency in the more important work.

My third and ultimate reason is that my scientific discoveries teach me, by the analogies, that ideas, that children of the brain, as truly and really as literal babies, need, and must, and will hav their legitimate period of gestation, before they can be fairly born into the world, and that the effort to hasten their ulterior publication and general adoption in advance of the operation of this law, is disturbing and hindering to, rather than truly forwarding of, the ultimate triumph of the truth. It is therefore with me a matter of confident knowledge that when the operations of the Colloquium shall be resumed at some, it is hoped, not very distant day, the ideas which hav through it been planted in the minds of a remarkable body of representativ men and women will be found to hav culminated in a vigorous growth of new convictions, prompting them and others to an energy of co-operation which could by no possible means be improvised or commanded at present, and which would hardly be in any manner hastened by continuous exertions ad interim.

In conclusion, I must add a word in respect to my reasons for selecting so radical and audacious an organ as The Truth Seeker for communication with a body of persons, a large and, perhaps I may say, the leading, portion of whom are church-members, clergymen, and even the most distinguished doctors of divinity. I should regret exceedingly that it should be supposed for a moment that I hav done so with a deliberate purpose of wounding their sensibilities or unduly assaulting their cherished convictions. The same reasons which hav prompted me to prefer that the meetings of the Colloquium should be held in the churches, rather than in halls or private parlors, would hav caused me to prefer that this document should hav first met the public through some one of the great religious organs of thought, but I was in despair of finding a sufficiently generous hospitality for new and startling ideas in those quarters. It is to the Radicals and Secularists that innovators must in the main look for prepared conditions broad enough to tolerate the fermentation of the new wine. Dogmatic instruction is necessarily more exclusiv; but for that very reason the teachers of that order should seek purposely to keep themselvs personally familiar with the rudest and severest forms of criticism directed against their dogma, lest they, as teachers, ensconced in the pulpit, which the old Abolitionists with some truth denounced as the "coward's castle," and its echo, the religious press, remain or become retro-actionists and bigots. It is doubtless as distasteful to the readers of The Truth Seeker that I should be constantly hob-nobbing with the clericals as it can be to them that I should hobnob with the Infidels, but as my purpose covers all ground, and as the Infidels are committed to the issues of the pure reason, I can better afford without apology to thrust the distasteful side of me upon them than upon the ecclesiasticals. They (the Infidels) will keep. If offense is given, I shall not be personally discarded, and a later opportunity for more radical explanation will suffice to remove superficial and first-blush misinterpretation. They, too, hav their sins of hardness, and of the narrowness which mistakes mere free thinking for right thinking. With them I shall reckon from time to time at my leisure. It is with the ecclesiasticals that I am now apologetically dealing for sending this my communication to them through a channel which they probably would not hav selected for me; while, on the other hand, their courtesy would not hav extended to the degree of tendering me a channel of communication of their own.

Letters from Friends.

QUINCY, ILL.

MR. EDITOR: Orville G. Hursen, my son (who has had to educate and care for himself since he was fifteen), and myself came here to Quincy, Ill., about Sept. 1st, he to attend a business college, and I to keep house for him, being unable longer to work and earn my own living. We were Spiritualists, and avowed ourselvs such whenever and wherever attacked. We attached ourselvs to the little band of workers here, he being appointed secretary the second Sunday of our attendance at the hall. He was told at a circle we attended, through the medium, that E. V. Wilson and other intelligences of a higher order wanted to use him as a speaker for the bettering of conditions of humanity generally, that if he would sit for development he would make a conscious medium, and they could do a good work through him. With that object in view, he commenced sittings for development, intending his business capacities to make our living, that he might be able to giv gratuitously to the world what higher intelligences were able to giv through his organism. During his development I became sick and unable to leave the room for two weeks With the care and anxiety for me, together with his study at the college, besides the sittings (which he could not be induced to abandon), the equilibrium between the soul and body became unbalanced, causing a diseased condition, which acted upon the brain and nervous system, and during absence of complete control of the reasoning faculties there was advantage taken by spirits, and he was kept talking, or rather speech-making, nearly incessantly for two or three days and nights. On the morning of Tuesday, Dec. 30th, he was getting quiet, had slept for three hours, awoke hungry, asked for chicken which I was preparing for him, when a student from the college, accompanied by one of the assistants, called and induced him to go out to the college under the pretense of seeing the professor. He went along, unsuspicious of any wrong, saying he would be back by the time the chicken was done, and in twenty minutes from the time he left the rooms he was locked in the jail, pronounced insane by a jury they had already impaneled. The complaint was made by the professor of the college, and he is a Methodist; the physician was a Presbyterian; the jury were a mixed pack of ignoramuses who know nothing except the ordinary affairs of life, hav not the least conception of the science of psychology, mesmerism; neither of obsession or spirit control in any form; and the judge, though ordinarily a good man, said to me very emphatically, "I don't believe there is such a thing as psychology," when I tried to explain to him that the boy was laboring under psychological spirit control; besides, he is very much prejudiced against Spiritualists. The sheriff, whose hands the boy was placed in, is a Catholic, and instead of allowing me to care for him, my own child, or sending him to the hospital, or allowing responsible men to take charge of him (who went there and offered to take him out in the country, and become responsible for him until such time as the sheriff could get returns from the asylum for insane), he refused all these requests, just because the boy was a Spiritualist, and the parties who were willing to take charge of him were Spiritualists. I was forbidden to come near the jail, also forbidden to send any Spiritualist there, but they would giv the boy up to any responsible person's hands that was not a Spiritualist. He was locked up, not in a room by himself, but in a common criminal's cell, with near a dozen dirty criminals, and was kept there from Tuesday morning, Dec. 30th, until Friday evening, Jan. 2d, then taken to Jacksonville, to the insane asylum, where he now is at this present writing. There are magnetic healers here who went to the jail to treat him, having faith that they could relieve him, having done such cures before, but were not allowed to treat him. I claim it is Spiritualism being tried, as well as the boy, and they care not whom they crush so they gain their object. Every officer of the law took undue advantage of the power invested in them on account of the boy being a Spiritualist. The boy will make a fine speaker, and wield a power in this country, if not held in those insane elements by the opposing forces until he is ruined. I claim the whole business has been done by designing spirits to crush his mediumship. This city is governed by ignorance, bigotry, and superstition, with the aid of whisky; therefore that class of spirits hold the forts. I am a poor woman, broken in health, and among strangers, and alone can do nothing, but I appeal to all Spiritualists in the name of the cause we all know to be just and right, as well as for the sake of my child and what the world may eventually be benefited through him, to use their united forces in righting this great wrong. Must we, as Spiritualists, submit to such injustice in this much-boasted free country? Hoping and praying to the higher powers that this may reach the hearts of all my brother and sister Spiritualists, I am, as ever, a true Spiritualist,

MATTIE E. HURSEN.

I omitted to say that the boy, while under control, delivered speech after speech on different subjects clear beyond his own conceptions, as he never has had any time or opportunity to post himself on scientific matters, and he did this with the voice, manners, and gestures of an orator, while he in his normal condition is very retiring and inclined to bashfulness. And still another remarkable feature in the case: from birth he lacked the organs of time and tune, never being able to whistle or sing a tune, but while under this influence he sang and whistled tunes—whistled waltzes, and waltzed after his own music as gracefully as though trained by a competent master, and he never waltzed a step before in his life.

P. S.—Please to publish this, and add your appeal to Spiritualists to aid in this cause. M. E. H.

We, the undersigned Spiritualists, vouch for the truthfulness of the inclosed statement.

EARLVILLE, ILL., Jan. 5, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I was often amused and sometimes surprised to find so many old friends that had outgrown their orthodox creeds, but think they believe enough to take them to heaven or straight through Spurgeon's bottomless pit, and would land safe, somehow, on the other side of nowhere. Many seemed like dead limbs fallen from a dead tree, and were real Liberals if they had only known it, but they did not seem to care about coming to life again by organizing a Liberal Club. They say that would take money and be too much like the churches. They are now enjoying themselvs by visiting the sick and trying to do good, and do not wish to be disturbed by any ism; but dead limbs are sometimes useful to start a fire with, and if Mr. Remsburg or some other Liberal lecturer could only apply the match, I think the flames would spread rapidly.

I heartily indorse Mr. Reynolds's plan for tent meetings. If I were only young, and could sing as I once could, I would be glad to attend such meetings; but now I am old, and my eyes are failing me about reading.

I hav had six sample copies sent me the past week, which is more than I can possibly read, with my Truth Seeker and four locals, so will say right here to Liberal friends, don't send me any more than you can afford to without pay, as The Truth Seeker is all the Liberal paper I can afford to take at present. The papers are all excellent, and I wish every Christian could read them. I would advise every Liberal that is able to order a good supply of Remsburg's "Bible Morals" for missionary work. Yours fraternally, SARAH C. HILTON.

P.S.—I hav one more incident to relate that is interesting to me. The meeting-house where I used to attend church and learn my creeds was sold for $50 and used for a barn. I stepped in to see my once beloved place of worship, and found it partly filled with hay, with a few horses quietly eating at their mangers. I stood with solemn thoughts and said to myself, "The world does move; for this roof is now sheltering more usefulness than it did when it gave shelter to the church people." S. C. H.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Jan. 9, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Please allow me to say to you, or through your columns, that a good man, a true reformer, a member of the Freethinking Association, through the causes of feeble health (having first a serious illness of hemorrhage of the bowels, followed by nerve prostration), great pecuniary losses, and troubles that he could not avoid, and sufficient to wreck the mind and body of a stronger man, is, with his wife and little daughter, suffering for the most common necessities of life, suffering even with cold and hunger, when $150 would place them where they would soon be independent and more than willing to return to the friend, or friends, who will kindly loan him this sum, the whole amount, and with interest, if they so desire. Friends of humanity, I appeal to you—oh, so earnestly—to do what I ask. Send in your sums to the editor of The Truth Seeker, to whom I shall send the name of this brother in distress, but not for publication. But he will himself acknowledge the reception of the sum through this paper. The editor will forward directly to him.

Truly yours, LOUIS MCGREGOR.

[We are not acquainted with either our correspondent or the friend for whom he solicits aid. We are, of course, willing to help forward any work of charity, but would hesitate to either receive or remit moneys in this instance without some further information as to the necessities and worthiness of the proposed recipient. Charity should not be bestowed blindly, although it is better that ten should get what they do not deserve than that one deserving person should suffer.—ED. T. S.]

CINCINNATI, O., Jan. 14, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I think the family circle may like to hear from Cincinnati, and to know that our Materialist friend, T. Winter, has been briefly interviewed by a Spiritist, and both still liv. Not seeing any Freethinkers or Truth Seekers, I started out, per Directory, to find Brother Winter. A short, kindly-faced gentleman, looking ten years younger than he claims to be, greeted me pleasantly, gave me the information desired, and an enjoyable chat followed. Mr. Winter's clear voice, distinct enunciation, and logical thought must prove a solid antagonist to the Christians. I think they will be careful not to argue with him.

I went to Mr. Walker's, at Brother Winter's suggestion, and found no January numbers of The Truth Seeker. A brief conversation ensued, in which he took no interest. I left him with the words I now emphatically reiterate, "I hope Messrs. Putnam and Watts will come here soon, and waken the Liberalists." This city is as thick with superstition as with smoke, and that is saying much. There are hardly any visible signs of Freethought.

I found at Lloyd & Co., 272 Vine st., a stationer and newsdealer who tried to get The Truth Seeker for me. He is evidently a Liberalist, though to what extent I do not know. I found another oasis in this desert last week. In the Arcade "E. Beall, practical phrenologist," has out at the door photographs of noted men, with brief phrenological character attached, among which I saw with pleasure the faces of E B. Foote, B. F. Underwood, and our arisen brother, D M. Bennett. This Mr. Beall can't be a Christian; he shows he owns his own opinions, and is conversant with leaders of thought.

While in Cleveland, Ohio, I met an unprofessional medium that I wish Elmina could hav seen. A small box, with telegraphic key inclosed, and proper apparatus attached, is shut tight, and Mr. Rowley's (the medium) fingers laid lightly on, or near, the closed box, sometimes sitting away from it all, yet, in the presence of bright lights, telegraphic experts, and others, intelligent messages are quickly sounded, and anyone acquainted with the telegraphic alphabet can read them. Some unseen power vibrates the key. It is a problem for scientists and electricians to solve. The many telegraphic operators who hav seen and heard it declare it a mystery.

Everywhere I go I hear the cry, "Hard Times." Tramps and beggary increase. When the advocates of both sides look to some of the theological, educational, and inherited causes, they will, I think, see more clearly the remedies. Yesterday a man said, "Mrs. Allyn, I think I can convince you of a personal God who rules." I replied, "You can try; if you would convert me, prepare to giv me a sensible reason for all these ages of bloodshed and wrong done in his name if you expect me to even tolerate him. Don't tell me 'God moves in a mysterious way.' A God that knows enough to design ought to hav known enough to hav had less brutality and agony. Man can, and does. In every case, when man has penetrated nature's mysteries, he has improved on the original plan."(?) He did not undertake my conversion, and I am still an impenitent friend and truth seeker.

C. FANNIE ALLYN.

CENTRAL CITY, COL., Jan. 12, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: One of the most encouraging signs of the times is the increased amount of thought and work for the children of Liberals. In this the church has been wiser than we. It has known, and assiduously acted upon the knowledge, that impressions made in early youth are the most enduring. Liberals hav known this quite as well, but until recently there has been but little action.

Now several prominent Liberal writers are giving the dear children mental food seasoned with common sense and science in place of superstition. The result is we are having such delightful columns in THE TRUTH SEEKER, edited by that charming writer, Miss Wixon, and in the Investig ator, by that pure, brave woman, Mrs. Slenker. The books of these ladies for children and youth are so pleasant and wholesome they ought to be in every child's library. "Apples of Gold," by the former lady, is worth its weight in gold, and I am told her new book for children, recently published at THE TRUTH SEEKER office, is a marvel in literary contents, illustrations, and typography. Mrs. Slenker's "Little Lessons" is a real treat to the child mind, combining amusement and instruction as only this lady can combine them.

I hav but just read "Science in Story," by Dr. Foote, Sr., and feel greatly benefited thereby, though my childhood was in the long ago. From a physician's standpoint, this volume takes the palm. It is a perfect wonder-book of amusement and scientific instruction of the most advanced character about plants and animals, particularly about these complicated bodies of ours.

It is a marvel how the gifted author could combine so much innocent amusement, solid instruction, and incentivs to goodness in the compass of one volume.

Liberal friends, if you wish your children to know the wonderful mechanism of their own bodies—the most important thing they can know—place in their hands "Science in Story." It ought to be in every family, school, and Sunday-school library.

The part on reproduction is the most important of all. Do not keep this from your children. It conveys just that knowledge, expressed in the most chaste, beautiful language, that every child picks up more or less in a low, coarse way.

The clean-minded, sensible person must often exclaim, "How long, O common sense! how long before parents and teachers will learn that there is nothing more vulgar about the beginning of life, about the birth of a new being into this state of existence, than about its ending—that the cradle to the reverent thinker is as sweetly solemn and mysterious as the tomb?" MRS. BUCHNER-JOHNSON, M.D.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Jan. 6, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Accept the hearty congratulations of one personally a stranger on the advent of the new year, and I heartily trust it may surpass the last in all you may desire.

Inclosed find $7. Credit me with two years' subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and accept the balance as my donation to the funds of the Liberal League. This institution has my hearty indorsement, and will hav my cordial support. I trust when the representativs of the League are in our neighborhood they will not pass us by. I feel sure we hav a large Liberal element that only requires drawing out, and if one or two of the League's officers would pay us a visit, and touch the electric button, the machinery would start. Pardon a suggestion I would make in closing. I hope the League will soon take into consideration the best method of cultivating the youthful mind (a matter so well understood by the church). Suggest the reading matter that would prove attractiv and instructiv, advice as to lectures, etc.

If you hav copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1884, Nos. 2 and 22, you would oblige me by forwarding them, as on looking over my back numbers the other night I missed them, and I am anxious to hav the year's volume complete for binding. I presume my friends neglected to return them. Would it not be possible to hav a small table of contents at the commencement of each number, and a general index of the year's matter in the last number? It would considerably aid one in searching for back matter, and would make the volume perfect. Fraternally yours, J. R. LANSDOWNE, M.D.

NEWARK, N. J., Jan. 10, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a reader of the good old TRUTH SEEKER for eight years, and during that time I hav read hundreds of letters from your correspondents, but for downright garrulous bigotry commend me to Brother Geo. Gray. Such a man is no more a Liberal than I am a Christian. Until now I thought all men were Liberals who, by voice and pen, labored to overthrow that giant superstition called Christianity. For twenty years, both in public and private, I hav assailed it at all points, so far as my humble means would allow, and, notwithstanding Mr. Gray's assertions that all Spiritualists are liars and tricksters (for that is about what it amounts to), I shall join forces with them at any and all times when their efforts are honestly devoted to a dissemination of the truth. I am not prepared to make the silly statement that all slate writing manifestations are the result of such juggling as friend Gray describes. Unfortunately for his statement, I hav been an eye-witness to some of these very remarkable manifestations, Dr. Slade being the medium; and nothing would please me better than see Mr. Gray tied down to the same condition as the doctor and perform the same trick; his large pocket at the back part of his pants would avail him nothing, as Slade, in many cases, merely touches the slate while held in the hand of his visitor, who takes particular good care it never leaves his hands. Mr. Gray may dupe some people with his tricks, but let him try his hand among some real investigators of this occult science (for so it is), and my word for it he will soon be tripped up. As to his talk about retiring from the ranks of the Liberals, that shows his narrow-mindedness; such a one, methinks, ought to be in the ranks of such men as John Calvin and old Parson Edwards. He would gag, if he could, one of the noblest papers on the face of the earth. THE TRUTH SEEKER has always been what its name implies, a foe to superstition, and I sincerely hope that day is far distant when it closes its columns to Spiritualists and Prohibitionists, or, indeed, any other class. Its fairness on all subjects is proverbial, but friend Gray sees it not; he imagins his word must be final, the ipse dixit of all modern science. As a proof that THE TRUTH SEEKER'S course is highly approved by the public, I may mention, I scarcely know a Spiritualist but what either subscribes for it or reads it. Did it ever occur to Mr. Gray that this latter class of people make, as a rule, better image breakers than he? They can approach the Christian where he could never hope to begin. Contrast his letter with the noble sentiments of Brother Dr. J. L. York; the latter speaks the sentiments of a pure Liberal. Fie, fie, Brother Gray; giv us a rest. Yours for the right, I. PICKFORD.

W 1WORTH, DAK., Jan. 11, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: We still liv, as you see by this, poor Christian bigots to the contrary notwithstanding. I am afraid our League is not as long-lived as we could wish, for several reasons. First, outside cussedness on the part of Christians (as hereafter described), and second, on account of internal variances. We hav two classes of Freethinkers. One class takes on the robe of Socialism, and the other is opposed to Socialism. Again, some favor the Prohibition movement, while others are fighting against it. So you see there is mutiny on board our flagship. As captain of the bark, I feel powerless to avoid the catastrophe, and am afraid the end will be a break up. Harmony seems to be sadly wanting, and lack of energy is prevalent. But you may ask how it is about the outside cause. It is this. The poor followers of Moses, Christ, & Co. hav begun their world-renowned refutation business, such as lying, bulldozing, and trying to scare some one. They hav threatened in various ways, such as this. I am agent of the C. M. & So. P. R.R., and they hav tried to scare me out of being an Infidel by reports to the superintendent, etc. But I told them to go to the place their God had made so comfortable for them. They also wish to get people to shun our town. Thanks to Paine and Jefferson, and a few others, or we would propably hav to do as poor Galileo did. You can rest assured that if our League should become defunct, it will be for a purpose, as we are as yet a small town, and dare not let any such thing be the means of hurting us. But we will ever be on record for war to the death of superstition and falsehood. Hoping to hav a better report of proceedings in my next, I remain Yours, W. L. HORTON.

P.S.—Don't know just when my subscription runs out, but if it should expire before you hear from me again don't stop my paper, as I will go without eating a week before I would go without THE TRUTH SEEKER. I will remember my dues when pay-day rolls around. W. L. H.

EUREKA, WIS., Jan. 9, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find five dollars to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1885 and 1886.

As the president of my choice is elected, I thought I could afford to pay for my paper two years in advance.

I opposed the election of Blaine because I consider that he represents a party of the money power; a party of monopolists largely brought about by a high protectiv tariff; a party of centralization, not only of power of the government in the federal head, but the centralization of the wealth of the country in the hands of the few, to the expense of the many. In proof of this, compare the millionaires of to-day with twenty-five years ago. A church party, or a party that plays into the hands of the church, and the church in return plays second fiddle to the Republican party. In proof of this, look the country over and see how many preachers you can find outside of the Republican party. I know a few hav quit the party and joined the Prohibition party—a regular church and state party. In proof of this see the first plank in their platform.

I opposed the Republican party because it has been in power so long that it cannot or will not bring to justice and punishment its worst criminals, notably the whisky rings and star routers. I voted for Cleveland because I believe he and his party is, to a great extent, the opposit of all this. In fact he was the people's candidate, representing the party of the people. When the two men were put on the course, the race was between money on one side and the people on the other. The race was neck and neck, but the people won, and I am glad. E. B. ROUNDS.

OTO, IOWA, Jan. 10, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $10. I wish to renew my subscription, and also send you two new ones. I also feel inclined to drop a few words (hoping that some good may arise from it) upon the subject of Liberals donating for the support of the clergy and giving aid to church organizations. As a matter of course, the more independent and outspoken Liberal is very seldom solicited to do much in this direction. But with us in the Northwest many who are in no way connected with, neither are they in sympathy with, the church are constantly expected to contribute toward the support of the clergy and the construction of churches. Now, I am not inclined to furnish ammunition for my enemies' guns, particular if they are to be leveled at me. And I am safe in saying that at least three-fifths of the clergy of horthwestern Iowa derive more than one-half of their support from sources outside their church, and from parties not in sympathy with their creed.

Now, what we propose to do here I hope will be done all over our land, and that is, never to giv another dollar toward the support of any orthodox enterprise to aid in the enslavement of the mind and thoughts of man. We hav concluded that the best way to extinguish the fire is to cut off the supply of fuel. Take away the Liberal support from the dealers in gospel dirt, and half the clergy must work or starve. If you hav a dollar to spare, leave a sack of flour at some poor man's door; buy a pair of shoes or a new coat for some poor boy; encourage him to go to school by furnishing the necessary books. Banish ignorance, and superstition will follow, for like twin brothers they go hand in hand through the world.

S. R. DAY.

MEMPHIS, TENN., Jan. 14, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I am in receipt to-day of your very gentle dun, in which I am reminded of the fact that I am in arrears to you in the sum of $4.47, and politely asked for a remittance of same. I do assure you that it was entirely an oversight, or rather neglect, on my part in not having forwarded you the price of my subscription to your valuable paper long ago. Inclosed please find the sum of $6.37, which will cover the amount of arrears and pay price of subscription for the years 1884, 1885. I hav not the remotest idea of discontinuing your paper—indeed, I would not giv it up for twice the amount of the price of subscription. You can therefore replace my name on your books and rest assured that as long as I am able to pay for the paper it shall not be discontinued.

Subscribing heartily—in the main—to the articles usually published in your most excellent vehicle of Freethought, and deriving much pleasure from a calm and careful perusal of its contents, and being, withal, an uncompromising advocate of Freethought and Liberal ethics generally, I cannot forego the privilege of reading it as long as I can afford to pay for it. With my hope for the future success and unbounded prosperity of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I am, Yours, M. BOSHWITZ.

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 11, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $4, three for my year's subscription, nearly expired, and one to the Campaign Fund, to which I subscribed a few weeks since, when we were favored with the presence of Messrs. Watts and Putnam.

Well, I think I hear you say, "Better late than never." That's so, brother, but let me assure you that it has been a matter of necessity, and not of choice, that I hav been obliged to receive THE TRUTH SEEKER on credit instead of payment in advance, as I know you are entitled to. But circumstances, which I need not trouble you with, hav made it impossible for me to do different from what I hav. But I trust the worst is over, and that before the year is entirely out I will be able to subscribe for the next. So accept my thanks for your liberality, and let me say that the management of the paper comes nearer to my "ideal" of a reform paper than any I know of. In every number I find much to edify and furnish food for thought. Hoping it may liv long to do the work so ably begun by its illustrous founder, I remain its and

Your sincere friend, J. R. BARRY.

SOLDIERS' HOME, WIS., Jan. 4, 285.

MR. EDITOR: It is with regret that I sometimes read the ill-Liberal notions of some of our selfish Liberals. Why is this? Hav they never learned, or hav they forgotten, the dominant principles of Liberalism? "Please stop sending your paper to me," says George Gray. Shades of Bennett, Paine, and Lincoln! look down with pity on Liberals who stop their paper because it is too Liberal. Spiritualists and Prohibitionists forsooth; Mr. Editor, I am neither one nor the other, but Infidel for all the term is worth. Yet sufficently Liberal to giv every man, woman, and even Miss Wixon's little children, a voice in the mighty columns of the great TRUTH SEEKER. It is abundantly able to bear all this, and will liv and flourish when all selfishness and false Liberalism is gone and forgotten. Oh, that I were a Vanderbilt or a Gould, for one day, at least. When one narrow-minded Liberal ordered his name scratched off, I would write a million. Fear not, Brother Macdonald, you are on the only road to progression in our line, and the fittest will survive. NELSON HUNT.

MODESTO, CAL., Jan. 10, 285.

MR. EDITOR: After congratulating you upon the constantly increasing excellence of THE TRUTH SEEKER—the best paper, in my opinion, ever published—I wish through your columns to send my highest compliments to friend W. S. Bell for his remarkably able articles on "Anti-Prohibition." My extensiv experience and observations as a temperance man, and much of the time as a Prohibitionist, hav brought me into entire harmony with him on every point in this discussion. After a thorough investigation of the assumed merits of Prohibition, I condemn it, just as I long ago, after a similarly thorough investigation, condemned the hell-fire religion of the M. E church. I hope that friend Bell will bravely hold his ground unintimidated by the fierce onslaughts of his critics, who strangely persevere in misunderstanding his very clear language and motivs.

Should I survive the war in which my articles on "Marriage"—when they appear—are likely to involve me, I shall probably hav something to say upon this subject myself.

Yours truly, JOHN R. KELSO.

ASHLEY, OHIO, Jan. 17, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1, for which you will please send me six of Mr. Remsburg's "Bible Morals." I want them for my doubting friends, and I hope to be able to do much good with them. I am a new subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, but am greatly pleased with it, and hope to be able to take it right along. I am not afraid or ashamed to read it to my family, but I would not read to them the book called the holy Bible. I wish you much success, and shall wait patiently for "Bible Morals." CHAS. F. OLMSTED.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Abijah and the Frogs.

Long time ago, one summer day,
Abijah Rugg went out to play;
He wandered down upon the ma'shes,
Known to all as "Great Pond Splashes."
He gathered flowers and sailed his boat,
Nor of the flight of time took note,
Till threatening cloud along the sky
Foretold a thunder storm was nigh.

"Oh, would I were at home," he said,
"For lightning stroke may kill me dead!
Across the Splashes I might go,
And thus no time shall lose, I know;
But if the springs are very deep,
They'll sink me in a last, long sleep."
Just then a frog leapt on a stone,
And seemed to speak in croking tone,
"O 'Bijah Rugg—go 'cross!—go 'cross!
Of time, indeed, 'twill be no loss—
Go 'cross, I say!"—and with a thud,
The frog descended in the mud.
Abijah said: "I guess I will?
I'll wade across this little rill,
And then before the storm shall come,
Safe shall I be within my home."

He rolled his trowsers to the knee,
And sallied in the waters free.
Quite soon another frog began
To speak unto the little man:
"'Bijah Rugg, you'd better go 'round,
Or else you surely will be drowned!
Oh, don't you see!—the water's too deep,
Too deep—Abijah Rugg—too deep!"
So back he hasted to the shore,
When frogs, as many as a score,
Commenced the mud and grass to toss,
While hoarsely shouting: "Come across!
Oh, 'Bijah—come across, you fool!
You know you've been this way to school!"

He turned again and waded in,
Until the water reached his chin;
While other frogs croaked out, "Alack!
Abijah Rugg—go back!—go back!"
But 'Bijah in the mud was fast,
Nor could he move his feet at last;
And while with fear he was choking,
The frogs kept up the same old croaking:
"Come 'cross! come 'cross! come with a bound!
Water's too deep! go 'round—go 'round!"
Poor 'Bijah cried, and screamed, and moaned,
While the frogs looked on and fairly groaned:
"Go 'round! go 'round!—you poor old plug!
Go 'cross!—go 'cross!—Abijah Rugg!"

A traveler saw his lifted hand,
And brought poor 'Bijah safe to land,
Who, wiser than he was before,
Keeps on dry ground forevermore.
Now, in this tale a moral true
Is surely given unto you;
Don't trust the word of one who'd lead
To danger or to shameful deed. S. H. W.

Driving on the Canal.

It is now forty-seven years since I completed my first part of a season's work as a canal driver on the Schuylkill Navigation, from Port Carbon, its head, to its terminus at Fairmount, Philadelphia. At that time the Schuylkill boats, whose individual tonnage ranged from forty-five to sixty tons, were the principal means of carrying the anthracite to market. The boats were drawn, principally, by one horse each, sometimes by two. At that date there was scarcely a mule in use, while several years thereafter these enduring and much-abused creatures did a large proportion of the towing. I thought at the time that no poor dumb brutes were treated as cruelly as the boat horses, and certain it is that their general appearance justified my opinion. Horses that started to work in the spring in a fair condition were soon made poor in flesh, and their galled and bleeding shoulders were terrible to behold. The crew of a boat consisted of three, steersman, bowsman, and driver. The former was usually the captain. The bowsman, in addition to assisting the steersman at the helm, keeping the boat clean, and having charge of the lines and polling, was also the boat's cook and chambermaid. Many of these boat cooks and housekeepers were as shiftless as a few hired girls and women that many of us hav seen, while a goodly number were excellent and clean. We used to liv well, and by this I mean well for Pennsylvania, where, of all places in the "wide, wide world," none can equal it in this direction. When there was no obstruction on our upward or downward bound trip, as a rule, all went smooth and fairly well for us. In case of stoppage by a jam, or by high or low water, the case was entirely changed. In either of these cases the crews would congregate in groups, usually to gamble, always to drink, smoke, and indulge in much that was morally debasing. This I dreaded. Our small, clean cabin, on these occasions, was always a gambling center, and, to my utter disgust, the ejection of tobacco juice on the floor made me sick in more ways than one. Whenever, from any cause, two boats going the same way neared each other, the one behind felt a sudden impulse to pass the one in front. At these times, and they occurred often, the poor horses were urged to do their utmost. Usually the lash was applied without stint, and both crews became excited. It was an old canal saying, "Touch him on the sore spot," which meant the most cruel appeal to the brute, by way of urging it to desperation in its efforts to get ahead or hold its own. As regards this phase of the duty and excitement of a driver's life, I was exceedingly fortunate. Our boat, named the Elizabeth of Buffalo, was built to run on the Union Canal that connected with the Schuylkill at Reading, Pa. Its tonnage, though large for a Union boat, was only thirty-two tons. It was quite narrow compared to a Schuylkill boat, and, by way of derision, was called a hog trough. It was owned by the firm of Bell & Bolton, Port Carbon, who made use of it to carry flour, cereals, vegeatables, and store goods for their large store.

Being narrow and of small tonnage, we could pass any of the others as we pleased or needed, and "Old Pomp," the horse, always enjoyed it hugely. He and I were fast friends. I always kept him in good flesh, and his shoulders in good trim by the free use of Castile soap, cool spring water, and a clean, soft collar. My old friend formerly held position as a liner in the "Pa. line" of canal horses, and doubtless, while there, became as well horse-educated as an old stager in the palmy days of the stage-coach and "four-in-hand." The dear old equine always seemed aching for a frolic, and no sooner saw a boat in advance than he would pick up ears, look at me, and say in his way, "Just watch me take the Elizabeth flying ahead of that scow." Away he would go, with head erect and limbs fairly dancing with muscular energy. We always won, and the longer the race the better my noble Pomp seemed to grow in endurance. Sometimes the race was with a Union boat, and then the contest was an equal one. I shall never forget a race in the Canal, nine miles above Reading, of this nature. The strife lasted for two miles or more. When Pomp began his work we were about a quarter of a mile in the rear; the loads were about equal; their horse was a fine large gray, and about seven or eight years of age. Pomp must hav been fourteen or sixteen. When we reached the lock we were close astern. The gray was in a dreadful state. It seemed as though he would die from sheer exhaustion, while Pomp looked as though it was a first-class jubilee. The sight of the other poor creature made me feel guilty over my part in the contest. As soon as the captain of the other boat saw how well the "old liner" looked and stood the terrible race, he exclaimed, "What in the d—l is that horse made of?" Very frequently, when we put up for the night, or when waiting for a load, the old fellow would beg for a frolic. If time would permit, I would let him loose and run away as though I was frightened. He would make for me at a tearing pace, with open mouth, as though saying, "If I catch you, I will chaw you into mince-meat." If there were trees, I would dodge around them, and when tired would stop. Before he reached me he would assume a peaceful attitude, and then beg child-like to do it again.

My love for this creature was great; the more so, knowing it was mutual. Often, securing the load, we would stop near the farm-houses along the banks of the canal or river, where we took on the different articles from the great wagons, that were often drawn by four or six horses, two at the pole, on one of which the driver rode, and the others tandem. Summer and autumn brought their abundance of berries, cherries, apples, peaches, pears, plums, and persimmons. Among the nuts chestnuts were the favorits. With chestnuts at five cents a quart, and huckleberries at three cents, it was not surprising that we indulged freely in the use of both. Huckleberries and milk was a favorit as well as common luxury, while, boy-like, stolen chestnuts from some farmer's favorit tree near the house furnished lots of fun in digging them out from their prickly burs.

One feature of a driver's life had an air of stern romance about it, and yet it was very practical. We had to drive a great deal at night, and often two or three nights in succession. Under such circumstances it is not possible to keep awake all the time, and therefore we cuddled down on the back of the horse, to be awakened whenever we met a boat, or by the stentorian voice of the steersman, who, in words "more expressiv than elegant," would order us to drive faster. The bridges as a rule were very low, many of which a high-headed horse had to lower his head to go under. We who rode had to learn to hang the head on the side of the horse's neck. Occasionally we fell asleep while sitting erect, and were swept off the horse by a bridge. It was next to impossible, after a night's drive, to keep awake all the time while taking a ride the next day, and it was a common custom to sit flat on the back of the horse, with our faces to the water. On one of these occasions I fell asleep, and dreamed of something that made me start for fear, resulting in my springing off the horse into the canal. Of course I awoke and took in the situation, sensible that I was in, and made doubly so by the ringing laughter of the boat-hands, and the amusement of Pomp, who stopped, turned to look at me, and waited till he saw me out on the tow-path—not with blood dripping at every pore, but water running from all o'er.

One very dark night in the fall of the year, after being detained near Schuylkill Haven by a jam, as the boat was passing through a lock, with both the lower wickets open to empty the chamber, I passed under the lock foot-bridge. to get my line. In doing this I walked over the lock wall and fell a distance of perhaps four to five feet in the water. The rush of water from the wickets, and my cumbersome clothing, made it difficult for me to swim. I did, however, and escaped with the loss of a fine blue cloth cap, purchased in the spring at Poughkeepsie, from Isaac Gerow, for $3. Just before the close of navigation I repurchased it, of a driver who found it in the "tunnel level," it having floated over two miles. It cost me this time seventy-five cents.

My worst experience occurred in this wise. The owners were very anxious for us to reach Reading by a certain day, and soon after we started a cold rain-storm set in. The captain was fearful of detention by high water, so we did not stop till we reached the end of the journey. We ran all night, and it rained incessantly. I had no overcoat, and was soon drenched to the skin. I had to walk all the way (forty-four miles), and no description can tell my discomfort. As long as I kept on walking it was not so bad, but while stopping at the locks and trying to keep my soaked clothing from touching the most sensitiv parts of the body, the starting again was simply horrible. Bad, however, as this was, when we reached Reading, and I got my clothes dry, and enjoyed a two days' rest, through the kindness of the flood, I was as happy as a lark, ready to laugh over the siege of disagreeables so recently endured.

Canal-drivers usually took great pride in their horses, even though they were nothing better than "crow-baits," as we used to name many of them. In addition to this was the carrying power of the boat and fighting qualities of the crew, and, like most of them, I indulged a little in this direction.

It is true that boys and men looked on me as a little after the "tony," "crank," or "dude" order, on account of reading a good deal of the spare time while they took a hand at cards, or got up a row. The simple fact that I would not, once in twenty times, touch intoxicants with them, set me down as a simpleton, and, as I was quite willing they should enjoy their opinion, it was an equal satisfaction that we were not all alike. As a rule, these boys were splendid fellows, and if, at times, they were lured by those who should hav acted wiser into dens of infamy of the worst form, through the crust of these debasing conditions their brave hearts and generous souls shone with a glorious luster. When we neared Port Carbon on our last trip up from Philadelphia with a large amount of goods for the winter's sale at the store, we were met below Pottsville by one of the employers, who there and then discharged the captain for his useless loss of time in the city, when a load of flour, feed, etc., had to be secured ere the ice closed navigation. They promoted me to captain, the steersman taking second place. The papers and funds were placed in my hands, and it is unnecessary to say that few more important individuals existed than myself. The responsibility was great, the confidence of my employers a stimulus to my pride and ability, and naught was left undone or unthought of on my part to make the trust appear judicious. All went well, we secured our load. The night we got in the storehouse the Elizabeth was locked in an icy embrace, and we were well paid and highly commended. Brave, noble "Old Pomp" was placed in comfortable winter quarters, and the crew rested from its season's labors. Thus ended my work as a driver. I followed the canal four seasons afterward, and if the readers will not tire I may giv them another chapter of experiences in canal and river life, that will include trips to and from New York to Port Carbon, or Schuylkill Haven. 2.

A PHONETIC CHARADE.

This puzzle, posers, goes by sound:
The first a female name is found;
The next a title of respect,
That only gentlemen expect;
The whole, when taken as one word,
Denotes a natatorial bird.
"The whole is whole" will do as well
The female's name, or bird's, to tell.

3.

CHARADE.

Some men went out in the first
To get in the third of the trees,
But the sun was in his prime,
And they were not cool at ease,
So when they saw the second approach
They said, "Let us giv up our rest,
And, instead of taking our siesta,
Search for a plant high and low."
They found complete potato or so.

REVERSED SUBTRACTION, ETC.

From a kind of fraction,
By reverse subtraction,
Take rodents small that oft annoy.
Then close the gap,
And see no trap,
But only, in reverse, a boy.
Behead these rodents and destroy,
But frozen water now enjoy.

Poetry.

Montreal Pioneer Freethought Club.

The Montreal Club held its Fifth Annual Social on the 16th inst. A prominent feature in the program was the delivery of the following original poem composed for the occasion by the honorary president, W. George Martin:

Not in the stormy halls of state,
Where politicians claw
And maul each other till their heads
Are scarified and raw;

Not in the ring of warring sects,
Where each condemns the rest,
Quite sure that all who doubt shall roast,
When some who kneel are blest;

Not thus, on this propitious eve,
Are we assembled here,
Where friendship's sunny glow pervades
Our round of social cheer.

Let Adam and his lovely bride
Their apple munch in peace;
Leave Moses, with his queer mistakes,
For Ingersoll to fleece;

Let Jonah take his three days' nap
Inside that famous whale,
And make his toilet ere he lands
At Nineveh—no rail;

Let Captain Noah steer his craft,
A jolly seaman bold;
Let Joseph dream his happy dreams,
And do as he is told.

These mysteries we lay aside,
And it were well, perchance,
If we should never more bestow
On such a single glance.

Poor mummies of the dim, dead past;
Poor skeletons, at best!
We kindly lay them on the shelf,
Where kindred mummies rest.

So may we, as the years roll on,
Oft meet as we are met,
To celebrate the golden dawn
Of suns that shall not set;

The glory of the rights of man;
Of justice done to all;
Of freedom that no priest shall ban,
No despot hold in thrall.

United, let the pioneers
Unflinching, bravely stand,
Assured that in the coming years
Their courage shall command

The love of woman's tender heart,
And manhood's lofty praise,
For having acted well their part
In these barbaric days.

Then gaily seize on limping Time
And make the churl unpack
The happiness that, even here,
Some loving soul may lack.

We leave the wrangling world to wage
Its tragic, comic fight;
The charms of music, song, and dance
Shall rule the roast to-night.

GEORGE MARTIN.

Obituary.

Another lifelong Liberal has passed away and crossed the great divide. Death, which is sure to come and call for us all, called on the 6th of January, 1885, for our beloved friend, father, and husband, Dr. William Passmore, and found him ready and waiting. He peacefully went to sleep, surrounded by those he loved and those who loved him. Without a murmur he sought that rest which perchance knows no waking. For many years he stood outside of all that could be called ecclesiastical. He was a Freethinker, a Liberal, in the best meaning of that word. No church superstition hung to his skirts. He found that the brightest duties of his existence related to the human, and not to the gods. To help the poor, to relieve the needy, be true to wife, children, and country, were the brightest laws in his creed. He had no benedictions to throw away upon the unknowable love of those whom he knew, and the aid of the same was more to him than streets paved with gold, white robes, and palms of victory. In him the cause of Freethought in Virginia has lost one of its best and warmest friends. In him his neighbors hav lost one of their best helpers. The wife of his heart and bosom has lost a true and loving husband, and his children an indulgent and loving father. He has always been a great sufferer all his life, and for the past six years has never been able to make a step without assistance; but in all of this suffering he saw no reason to change his record in the least, or in his belief. He was willing to die in the faith in which he had lived. For, but a few days before he died, he remarked: "I am growing worse every day now; there is only one more chasm to bridge and I will hav seen the great divide"—which proves he must hav thought something of the beyond. He has been asked often what he thought of heaven; to which the invariable answer would be given: "I, like Bob Ingersoll, am satisfied with one world at a time." And when asked what he thought of death, would answer: "That takes care of itself; a right life is the only needed preparation for death." He started from England when he was only nine years old and came to America, and has been a resident of Lunenburg county since 1837. From early boyhood he has thought for himself, and no man or church ever kept his conscience. He never bartered his Liberal principles for popularity, or made merchandise of his integrity for gold. Always a reverent student of nature, he saw the infinit in the humblest flower and insect. Peculiarly reticent, he was understood and appreciated only by intimate friends, though he commanded the respect and love of all. As a husband and father, he was tender, loving, and genial. His home was his heaven; his home life one sweet, glad poem; his death that of a calm philosopher.

And now he has left behind for us many monuments in words and deeds to be proud of. For he, like D. M. Bennett, needs

"No monument of stone,
Or temple reared to fame;
For prouder, more enduring far
Is his immortal name."

ONE WHO LOVED HIM.

At Garfield, Jones county, Iowa, on February 23, 1884, of paralysis, Mr. Henry Bulmer, aged 73 years.

On the morning of February 23, 1884, Mr. Bulmer arose as usual at 6 A.M., built his fires and called his help to prepare breakfast, and then went to his sleeping-rooms, spoke to his wife, and, while speaking, was attacked with paralysis in the head. In ten minutes three physicians were present, and all agreed there was no help for him, and at 20 minutes before 1 P.M. he died.

Mr. Bulmer was born in Hampshire, England, and came to this country in 1853 or '54. He was, in England, an aggressiv Socialist—or Chartist, as that party was then known. He always warmly espoused the side of the poor and oppressed both by word and action. So determined was he in his attempts to force concessions for the poor from Parliament that he was several times arrested for alleged "treason." But he never was convicted, so thoroughly familiar was he with the rights guaranteed to the citizen by England's Magna Charta. He frequently lectured on Socialism and Secularism. In politics he was a radical of the type of William Wilberforce. Since his residence in America he had been a worker in Liberalism, and was a devoted friend of D. M. Bennett, whose writings, especially the "Trip Around the World," he took great delight in showing and reading to friends. His steadfast advocacy of the emancipation of the race from physical and mental slavery, from tyrannical government of both church and state, bore good fruit, and he went to his grave knowing his life had not been lived in vain.

Crazy and Indecent Antics of Salvationists.

From the Akron (O.) Daily Beacon.

Girls and boys lying on the floor with eyes closed, pale faces, some singing and others to all appearances dead, while still others were walking over their prostrate bodies, slapping their hands and shouting "Glory Hallelujah," is a picture that presented itself to the eyes of a Beacon reporter upon forcing his way into the headquarters of the Salvation Army, one evening this week. The building in which these meetings are held is a two-story frame. The second floor is given to a hall which is about 20x50 feet in dimensions. In this room are quite a large number of chairs and benches, very common in style and material. An unblacked stove givs heat. There is no carpet on the floor. As a usual thing the windows are kept closed, the curtains drawn, and the air is almost stifling. The benches and chairs are placed at the sides of the room, leaving the central part of the floor clear. In this room the Salvationists meet.

It was eleven o'clock at night when the writer entered the room above described. At the only street door leading into the room stood two men on guard against the idly curious crowd gathered around and making jeering comments. These sentries gave some resistance when the newspaper man knocked for admission, but the latter did not stand on ceremony, and all obstacles to an entrance were soon overcome. The entrance to the room is almost at the extreme south end of it and on the east side. Looking north then, the eyes of the writer fell upon about fifty people, including gray-haired men, young men in the full vigor of life, boys of tender years, and girls ranging from ten to twenty, while one woman singing and shouting "Glory Hallelujah!" with an infant in her arms, was also observed. Some were standing still, others were stooped over, and the majority were walking about, and almost everybody was singing or shouting. But the next glance fairly brought the cold chills over the new arrival, for on the dirty floor, directly beneath the feet of those walking around, lay the outstretched forms of ten young women and five young men. And while the writer stood in this position taking his first view, several others fell heavily to the floor as though the bullet from some sharpshooter's gun had brought them down. Some of these faces had a ghastly expression. There was no color in the cheek. The lips were purple. In some, the eyes were set and looked glassy, while in others the eyelids were drawn tightly and seemed as though death had sealed them. Others, with their jaws dropped, their teeth exposed, eyes half open, sang or talked incoherently. Some had their legs and arms outstretched flat on the floor, while others pointed directly upward with one or both hands. Men and women lay promiscuously on the floor as they had fallen, and in several cases in such positions as to bring the blush of shame to the face of any modest person.

At one end of the room two girls, each 16 or 18 years of age, lay stretched full length on the floor, and about them congregated as many boys and girls as could crowd in the circle. Suddenly one of these girls, both of whom had very pretty faces, began striking her hands very violently upon the floor and against the sharp edge of a loose board that stood near by. Several persons hastily grasped the already bruised member, when Capt. Hague, who was present on this occasion, stepped up and said: "Let her go. She cannot hurt herself now; the Lord will look after her." Her arms were, however, held until she showed no further disposition to strike the floor. This same girl presently began to sing, and in the sweetest voice sang several well-known church hymns.

The singing was frequently interrupted with loud calls for "Charley," and several times she said: "If I could only hav Charley, I would be so happy. But, see! there is a fire, and oh! they are putting Charley in it. He is in hell. Oh, please let me hav him. Do not let him suffer that torment." A young man about eighteen years of age heavily fell to the floor upon his back, and began kicking violently, and fairly shook the building with his contortions. He grew so frantic that he kicked off the heel of his boot, and struck the floor with much violence with his fists. Another young man, whose head was being held in the lap of a young woman, sang religious songs, and said he saw the angels about him. Still another lad talked about somebody being put into hell. Capt. Hague was called up, when the young man, under what the Salvationists call the "power of God," or the "Lord's influence," said that Capt. Hague's father and sister were in hell. This appeared to grieve the captain very much, and he placed his hand upon his head and groaned from apparent grief.

Just at this point three young girls stepped up to the captain and spoke to him. He at once changed the expression of his face, and a pleasant smile played about his mouth, and the light of joy was in his eyes. Several of the girls who were under this "influence" were overcome while they were sitting on some of the benches, and the majority of these were either lying across the lap of some young man, or were resting their heads on his shoulder, and remained in this position for several hours. Capt. Hague moved about the room constantly, and frequently cast his hands before the face of some convert. On a bench in the extreme north end of the room sat two girls. They divided their time between reading a Bible, praying, or singing. While they were thus engaged, one of the male members of the Salvation Army took his seat in front of the two girls, and frequently hit them with his hands on their limbs, and presently one of his hands was seen to playfully toy with the chin of one of the young women. Both girls several times said, "Stop," and finally they got up, and the three were not again noticed in the hall. The writer had the pleasure of seeing one little boy about twelve years old recover from the "influence," and as soon as the little fellow could speak, said to him, "Well, my son, what did you see when you was asleep?"

To which the lad replied, "I thought I was in heaven."

"Did you want to come back?" was asked, to which he replied, "No, sir." One tall brunet, of Bohemian birth, who had been under the influence for several hours, and who about a week ago lay in this state for ten hours, recovered, and got up and was walking around, but soon fell again; and in a few moments got up again, and then for fully half an hour to save her from falling she was almost carried about in the strong arms of a brother.

It was nearly two o'clock in the morning when the Beacon man retired from the scene, and the majority of those who had succumbed to the influence during the evening were still in that condition, and two of the young women lay on the hard, dirty floor in that state until 6:30 o'clock of that same morning. One young man, in talking about this "influence," said that he had been a Christian a long time, but was skeptical about these demonstrations, and to satisfy himself had prayed to God that he might be convinced by a visitation of it upon him, if such influence came from a higher power. He prayed the first, second, and third night, when, being almost convinced that it was all a sham, he fell prostrated by the same "spirit," when all was quiet around him and no excitement, or even thought about it, in his mind. He said that he beheld a beautiful light, and saw the words, "Blessed heaven," before his eyes. He said he could hear everything that was going on about him, but was perfectly powerless.

On the evening that the writer visited the Salvationists some things transpired that gave the believers in this "influence" great faith. One of these phenomena was that almost immediately after one of those under the "influence" would begin singing, in a tone so low that it was scarcely audible at a few feet distant, all those on the floor, no matter how widely separated, would take up the same tune and sing in perfect harmony. Another evidence to the Salvationists of the presence of the divine will was that two girls, fully forty feet distant, and shut out from sight, even had their eyes been open, exclaimed, "There comes Kitty," just as a girl by that name was overcome and fell upon a bench thoroughly under this influence.

Through conversation with different members, some of whom hav been "influenced," it was learned that they are fully convinced that the power comes direct from the Lord, and is the same as has been experienced many years in different religious denominations. This "influence" has only been felt by the members of the Army in this city for about ten nights. Previous to that time no manifestation of it had shown itself here, although it is reported in other places where the Army has been at work.

A ROMANCE.

BY MISS SUSAN H. WIXON.

"The great charm of this novel is its absolute fidelity to nature. Its personages are those one meets with in common life, and are portrayed with a vividness and perspicuity I was scarcely prepared to expect to find, in such a marked degree, even from so gifted a pen as that of Miss Wixon, whose brilliant and lucid style is familiar to most readers in the Freethought ranks. . . . But what pleased me most in this charming story was the unflinching honesty with which its author holds up to the derision of the world the rottenness of average ministerial character, particularly that of revivalist type. I hav not space here to treat, in detail, of the characters of this truly absorbing novel. Suffice it to say that it is safe to predict that anyone who reads its first chapters will be loth to lay it down till the denouement is reached. Miss Wixon has long been doing a noble work in educating our children into the ranks of true Liberalism, thereby robbing the church of hundreds of those who, in after years, might hav become its willing dupes and servil tools, and she certainly deserves the generous and substantial recognition of all Freethinkers. Let everyone send for a copy of 'All in a Lifetime.' It will yield a liberal reward for the outlay.

CONSULTING ROOMS,

471 WEST MADISON ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

Something for Invalids to read and study over—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

Ah! but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would not submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we have treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all form of chronic invalidism.

PROSE POEMS
And Selections,

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued.

It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author.

The work is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it.

In the more elegant styles of binding, this volume is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

In workmanship the volume is a masterpiece. The type is large and beautiful; the paper heavy and richly tinted; the presswork faultless; and the binding, as perfect as the best materials and skill can produce. The book is quarto in size, and contains 248 pages. No item of expense has been spared to make the work worthy of author and public.

PRICES:

Silk-cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side,	$2 50
Half-calf, mottled edges, elegant library style,	4 50
Full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitely fine,	7 50
Full tree calf, highest possible style and finish,	9 00

Gems of Thought.

THE spirit of selfishness has brought chieftainship and kingcraft and priestcraft into existence, and has introduced servitude and slavery of the most onerous character. The masses hav been the servants of the few; one man has governed his thousands. But men hav now become more intelligent, they hav received more knowledge, and it is time for all the oppression to end. The conviction is gaining ground that even the most humble hav their rights as really as the great and strong.—D. M. Bennett.

ALL the languages of the world hav not words of horror enough to paint the agonies of man when the church had power. Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, Nero, Domitian, and Commodus were not as cruel, false, and base as many of the Christian popes. Opposit the names of these imperial criminals write John XII., Leo VIII., Boniface VII., Benedict IX., Innocent III., and Alexander VI. Was it under these pontiffs that the "church penetrated the moral darkness like a new sun," and covered the globe with institutions of mercy? Rome was far better when pagan than when Catholic. It was better to allow gladiators and criminals to fight than to burn honest men. The greatest of the Romans denounced the cruelties of the arena. Seneca condemned the combats even of wild beasts. He was tender enough to say that "we should hav a bond of sympathy for all sentient beings, knowing that only the depraved and base take pleasure in the sight of blood and suffering." Aurelius compelled the gladiators to fight with blunted swords. Roman lawyers declared that all men are by nature free and equal. Woman, under pagan rule in Rome, became as free as man. Zeno, long before the birth of Christ, taught that virtue alone establishes a difference between men. We know that the civil law is the foundation of our codes. We know that fragments of Greek and Roman art—a few manuscripts saved from Christian destruction, some inventions and discoveries of the Moors—were the seeds of modern civilization. Christianity, for a thousand years, taught memory to forget and reason to believe. Not one step was taken in advance. Over the manuscripts of philosophers and poets, priests, with their ignorant tongues thrust out, devoutly scrawled the forgeries of faith. For a thousand years the torch of progress was extinguished in the blood of Christ, and his disciples, moved by ignorant zeal, by insane, cruel creeds, destroyed with flame and sword a hundred millions of their fellow-men. They made this world a hell. But if cathedrals had been universities—if dungeons of the Inquisition had been laboratories—if Christians had believed in character instead of creed—if they had taken from the Bible all the good, and thrown away the wicked and absurd—if domes of temples had been observatories—if priests had been philosophers—if missionaries had taught the useful arts—if astrology had been astronomy—if the black art had been chemistry—if superstition had been science—if religion had been humanity—it would hav been a heaven filled with love, with liberty, and joy.—R. G. Ingersoll in the Christian Religion.

ABOVE all things, good policy is to be used, that the treasure and moneys in a state be not gathered into few hands; for, otherwise, a state may hav a great stock, and yet starve; and money is like muck—not good except it be spread. This is done chiefly by suppressing or, at least, keeping a straight hand upon the devouring trades of usury, engrossing great pasturages and the like.—Bacon's Essays.

IT was impossible for Moses to raise the minds of his stiff-necked people to a nobler conception of the Deity; it would hav been as easy to make them see Roman noses when they looked into a mirror. He therefore made use of their superstition in order to rule them for their own good, and descended to trumpetings and fire-tricks, which chamber-moralists may condemn with virtuous indignation, but which those who hav known what it is to command a savage mob will not be inclined to criticise severely—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

IT would hav been a thing incredible to Milton that the hold of the Jewish scriptures over the imagination of English men and women could ever be weakened. This process, however, has already commenced. The demonology of the poem has already, with educated readers, passed from the region of fact into that of fiction. Not so universally, but with a large number of readers, the angelology can be no more than what the critics call machinery. And it requires a violent effort from any of our day to accommodate our conceptions to the anthropomorphic theology of "Paradise Lost." Were the sapping process to continue at the same rate for two more centuries, the possibility of epic illusion would be lost to the whole scheme and economy of the poem. Milton has taken a scheme of life for life itself.—Mark Pattison's Milton.

WE must consider that philosophers who cultivate reason and reflection stand less in need of motivs to keep them under the restraint of morals; and that the vulgar herd, who alone need them, are utterly incapable of so pure a religion as represents the deity to be pleased with nothing but virtue in human behavior. The recommendations to the divinity are generally supposed to be either frivolous observances, or rapturous ecstasies, or a bigoted credulity. We need not run back into antiquity, or wander into remote regions, to find instances of this degeneracy. Among ourselvs some hav been guilty of that atrociousness, unknown to the Egyptian and Grecian superstitions, of declaiming, in express terms, against morality; and representing it as a sure forfeiture of divine favor if the least trust or reliance be put upon it.—Hume's Essays.

YET I am here a chosen sample,
To show thy grace is great and ample;
I'm here a pillar in thy temple,
Strong as a rock.
A guide, a buckler, an example
To a' thy flock.

But yet, O Lord, confess I must,
At times I'm fashed wi' fleshly lust,
And sometimes, too, wi' wardly trust—
Vile self gets in;
But thou remembers we are dust,
Defiled in sin —Burns's Holy Willie.

Odds and Ends.

ONE of a troupe of performing Indians at a dime museum owns up to the name of Ryan. He must be the Ryan Indian bred, we hear so much about.

"WHAT a wonderful thing is man!" said the lecturer. "His form how majestic! his faculties how grand!" "Yes," responded a man in the front seat, and how admirably his legs are adapted for wearing trousers!"

A LITTLE girl came home from her Sunday-school in a high state of indignation because her Sunday-school teacher had told her that Jesus was a Jew. "Was he a Jew, mother?" said she, in great excitement. "Well, yes, my dear," said the mother, a little doubtfully, as if unwilling to concede the objectionable fact, but unable to deny it; "I suppose he was a Jew." "But I thought he was the son of God?" "So he is, my dear." "I don't see, then, how he could be a Jew," responded the young sectarian, for God is a Presbyterian."—Christian Union.

"I NEVER KNOWED."

Old Billy B. was a pious man,
And heaven was his goal;
For, being a very saving man,
Of course, he'd save his soul.
But even in this, he used to say,
"One can't too careful be;"
And he sang with a fervor unassumed.
"I'm glad salvation's free."

But the "means of grace," he had to own
Required good, hard-earned gold;
And he took ten pews, as well became
Tho richest of the fold.
"He's a noble man!" the preacher cried,
Our Christian Brother B."
And Billy smiled as he sublet nine,
And got his own pew free.

In class-meeting next, old Billy told
How heaven had gracious been,
Yea, even back in the dark days when
He was a man of sin.
"I's buildin' a barn on my river farm—
All I then had," he said;
"I'd run out o' boards, and was feedin' hands
On nothin' but corn-bread.

"I tell ye, bretherin, that I felt blue,
Short o' timber and cash,
And I thought I'd died when the banks then bust,
And flooded all my mash.
But the Lord was merciful to me,
And sent right through the rift
The tide had made in the river banks
A lumber-raft adrift.

"Plenty o' boards was there for the barn,
And on top was a cheese,
And a bar'l o' pork as sound and sweet
As anyone ever sees.
Then I had bread and meat for the men,
And they worked with a will,
While I thanked God, who'd been good to me,
And I'm doin' it still."

A shrill-voiced sister cried, "Bless the Lord!"
The whole class cried, "Amen!"
But a keen-eyed man looked at Billy B.
In thoughtful way, and then
Asked, "Brother B., did you ever hear
Who lost that raft and load?"
And Billy wiped his eyes and said,
"Bretherin, I never knowed."

THIS is a new editor's first attempt: "As we were coming from our breakfast to our office about nine o'clock this morning——" "You mean yesterday morning," suggested Major Dennett. "Oh, no, it was this morning," said Major Hurlbut. "Yes, but you should write it as yesterday," explained Major Dennett, "for the article will not appear until tomorrow." "True enough," said Major Hurlbut. So he made the correction and resumed reading: "As we were coming from our breakfast to our office about nine o'clock yesterday morning, a horse belonging to Mr. John Hogan our esteemed fellow townsman with a blaze on his forehead and a white tail attached to a furniture car in which there was a piano that had been rented by a well-known Prairie avenue belle with carved legs became frightened and rushed madly down the street where there were many people scattering alarm and destruction broadcast. On the corner of State street and Indiana a child of Michael Bolivar, Esq., our esteemed fellow-townsmen, three years old and wearing pantalets, was playing in the crowded thoroughfare. Young, beautiful, and innocent, this unhappy child was called by all who knew him Patsy, although his name was Patrick, was overtaken by the bitter pill of adversity, for in the midst of his childish play, the pale hand of death stalked in and made him go with him to that bourne from which no traveler returns. The child did not see the approaching horse, but we cried, 'Will no one save him from the iron heel of the pale hand of death?' Alas, it was too late, for, ere we could interpose, the horse was upon the unfortunate babe, and before he could evade the cruel fate which strode after him on swift but noiseless wings, he fell to the earth and was picked up an unconscious corpse from which condition it has been impossible to revive him up to the hour of going to press. We extend to the family our deepest sympathy and are informed upon reliable authority no damage was done to the piano. Truly in the midst of life we are in death, and let us all be more careful about letting our children play in the street where danger lurks and they are so liable to die without medical assistance."

"THE Hopping Disciples of the Devil" is the name of a dancing club in Texas.

THE church where Burchard, the minister of rum, Romanism, and rebellion fame, holds forth is in a bad way financially, and its total disruption is prophesied.

A CLERGYMAN was giving Ralph a lesson in morals. "Now," said the preacher, "what is your duty toward your Christian neighbor?" Ralph.—To keep your eye on 'im, sir.

THE Faith Cure establishment at St. Louis, Mo., is brought into unpleasant notoriety again by the death of another infant. No medical assistance was called. This is the second death within two weeks.

PROFESSOR MACLEOD asks, "If labor is the sole cause of value, what is the cause of the value of labor?" Professor MacLeod would hav made the point of his conundrum clearer if he had framed an answer to it.

LAST Sunday every clergyman of Boston received a circular from the Boston Central Trades and Labor Union, asking them to take action in their churches in favor of the Hocking Valley miners. So far as heard from the preachers disregarded the appeal.

THEY are sometimes loaded—these revivals. Latest sufferer: Uriah Smith, Fulton county, Ind.; farmer; well known and connected; violently insane. Also his sister, Mrs. Highway, on hearing of his misfortune. Can't some kind of a revival thermometer be invented to indicate the safety limit?—Peck's Sun.

THE Catholics are before the legislature of this state with what they term a "Freedom of Worship" bill. They want the state to pay their priests for attending to the spiritual affairs of a penal institution. Their exclusion, it is inferred, prevents their access to some of their most distinguished co-religionists.

IN the store window of Bell & Harmer, Main street, New Rochelle, may be seen the old-fashioned Franklin stove and andirons which were the property of Thomas Paine. The stove was removed from the brick setting in the room which he used as his study at his residence, about a mile north of the village.

THE newspapers of San Francisco are conducting a crusade against a practice just discovered of mothers selling their illegitimate female babes to Chinamen. It is asserted that these children are purchased by Chinese speculators and sent to China, where they are raised until twelve years old, when they are sold to rich Chinamen for large sums to be placed in their harems.

A NEW denomination of fools calling themselvs "Mennonite Brethren in Christ" has just been started in Pennsylvania in Berks and neighboring counties. To perform the rite of baptism, they chop the ice away and the ministers and converts wade in and the latter are immersed in the icy water three times. If these fanatics were in New York they would be amenable to the law against suicide.

THE Rev. "Sam" Jones, a famous Georgia preacher, takes the public into his confidence when he delivers a discourse. Some criticisms against his style reached his ears, and he alluded to them in his next sermon in the following language: "Opinions! opinions! Giv me a pack of black and tan and yeller hounds to set on the track of these opinions and I'll tree 'em in hell within fifteen minutes."

MR. GEO. C. MILN while in Galveston, Texas, last week was interviewed by a reporter of the Daily Record, and among many questions asked Mr. Miln by the inquisitiv pumper of the press, we find the following: "Do you object to stating why you left the pulpit, sir?" "Not at all. I quit preaching because I had nothing to preach. A good reason wasn't it?" and the actor smiled pleasantly. "In other words, I read the modern Materialistic philosophy until my confidence in the supernaturalistic dogmas of the church was impaired. Like Othello, I found my occupation gone, and quietly addressed myself to building up a new career."

PRIEST: Pat, I believe I saw you asleep in church last Sunday. Pat: No, indade, your riv'rance dinn't. You might a' seen me with me oies shut, but diell a bit o' sleep could I get anyhow, wid your screechin' an' your thumpin' of the poor pulpit cushions—long life to ye!

IT is reported that a man named Hine is lecturing in England to prove the direct descent of Queen Victoria from King David by the way of Jedekiah and his daughter, a princess who landed in Ireland, and thence through Fergus I. of Scotland and James I. of England. Victoria accepts the theory. This, according to the genealogy accepted by Christians, makes the royal family distant relativs of the Almighty.

THE polygamists of Utah are being prosecuted under the Edmunds Act. Royal Barney Young, a nephew of the illustrious Brigham, has been arrested for unlawful cohabitation with more than one woman. Young's last wives testify that they married Young with the understanding that they were not to liv with him so long as polygamy was unlawful, and they hav faithfully kept the agreement. The commissioner and district attorney are puzzled by the case.

A MAN styling himself Colonel King gave an exhibition of what he advertised as Spiritual phenomena at Steinway Hall in this city last Sunday evening. The performance consisted mainly of what is called the "rope-tying test." The tricks were creditable as sleight-of-hand phenomena, but had little resemblance to spiritual manifestations. Robert Blissert, of the Liberal Club, entered the cabinet and upon emerging announced privately that the "medium" was a humbug.

AN Italian priest, affiliated with a mendicant order, has won 300,000 francs in a lottery at Turin. He is now in a quandary. By the vows which he voluntarily took when he entered the order he is doomed to life-long poverty, and all money received by him from whatever source must be handed over to his superiors. Still the sum of $60,000 represents almost fabulous wealth to the average Italian priest, and it remains to be seen whether conscience or cupidity will prevail.

THE religious condition of Havard college is under discussion in Boston. Since the venerable Dr. Peabody retired from the preacher's chair, three years ago, it has been vacant. It is generally acknowledged that it is not the policy of the college to elect a successor. Morning prayers hav been conducted by various clergymen, and the regular Sunday evening service in the chapel has been maintained in the same way. Beyond these perfunctory services it is impossible to discover the least effort on the part of the college authorities to minister to the spiritual needs of the students. The college seems content to develop the mind and the body of the students, and leave their spiritual needs out of the problem of education.

W. A. CROFFUT writes in the New York World: "Porter C. Bliss, journalist, traveler, scholar, and diplomat, is dying in this city at St. Luke's Hospital, of diseases resulting from the injuries he received while undergoing physical torture at the hands of the infamous Lopez, dictator of Paraguay, who thus endeavored to extort information from him. Bliss was scourged, hung up by the hands and feet, and subjected to other terrible outrages at the hands of Lopez, and as he was not only an American citizen, but also at the time our secretary of legation under Minister Washburn, he ought long ago to hav received some indemnity in money. The republic which he served in Mexico, Brazil, Paraguay, and Buenos Ayres has been ungrateful, and the victim of a tyrant's ferocity now lies in a comatose condition and is not likely to recover consciousness." Mr. Bliss has been known for years as a member of the Liberal Club, and an avowed Freethinker. He is a student of the deepest research and one of the most valuable contributors to encyclopedias and biography. He is one of the men whom the world can ill-afford to lose.

IN COMING HOURS.

In coming hours, when all we say
Makes fulness of our bliss to-day
Has faded, as from summer sky
The sunset glories slowly die,
From gold and rose to dreary gray.
And I must learn, as best I may,
To watch it as it fades away;
I think I will not moan or cry
In coming hours.
I think I will not utter "nay,"
Knowing that all things must decay;
Nor even weep, or question why;
But o'er our dead dream, tenderly,
In coming hours.

WE copy the following verses from Texas Siftings, with acknowledgments and the assurance that we shall "push on:"

THE TRUTH SEEKERS.

Eternal youth is pushing upward still!
Is the load lighter from the toil of ages?
Does it get near the summit of the hill?
And will ye toil on ever, O ye sages?
When to the top the giant mass is ta'en,
Will it fall back and crush you? Nay, to know
Perchance were worse than this sad work and pain.
Push on! Push on! O mortals, onward go!
Immortal love is watching o'er each pang;
Though ye are blind, from life's obscurity;
When on the verge the quivering mass doth hang,
Love will appear and your poor hearts be free!
What do we know—if 'tis not love is near?
What hope hav we—but that love will awake
The sullen surges of life's ocean drear,
A glorious sunrise? Break, O morning, break!

THE Evening Post notes something of a "Catholic re-action" in Mexico. The civil legislation of recent years has been strongly anti-clerical. The church property, estimated to be of the value of nearly or quite one-half of the entire real estate of the country," was "nationalized," the monastic orders were abolished and the Jesuits banished, full religious liberty was proclaimed, religious instruction was forbidden in the public schools, religious rites were restricted to the interior of church edifices, and ecclesiastics were forbidden to wear any distinctiv dress in the streets. These enactments were not merely statutes, but were incorporated into the Constitution. For a long time the ecclesiastical party was completely crushed, but of late it has shown a disposition to defy the government. In Toluca, but fifty miles from the capital, religious processions hav marched through the streets, and even at the seat of government the sacerdotal garb is seen in public. It is said that monasteries hav been re-established. Some think that the church is on the eve of a restoration to something of her former power.

DEACON BUGGINS is a rich old curmudgeon who makes great pretensions to religion, but squeezes a penny almost flat before he drops it into the contribution box. He livs in a little village on the outskirts of the city, and pays pew rent in the village church. He is the solitary occupant of the pew every Sunday, none but strangers daring to enter it, for he has an unpleasant way of asking people to step out. Last Sunday a brassy young from the city visited the village and went to the church. Having heard of the deacon's peculiarities, this awful young man felt it his duty to walk right into the particular pew. When the deacon arrived, he glared at the young man and motioned him to step out of the pew. "That's all right; come in," said the young man, as if unconscious of the deacon's meaning. The latter's anger rose until his eyes bulged out of his head like a pair of old-fashioned pincushions, and he repeated his gesticulations. "Come on," coaxed the young man, "the old miser who rents this pew won't be here to-day; he is at home splitting pennies to put into the contribution box." The congregation snickered, and for once in his life the deacon was embarrassed. He stepped gingerly into the pew, and took a seat without paying further attention to the young man. The deacon has purchased a lock for the door of the pew.—Philadelphia North American.

Mgr. Capel and the Inquisition.

This clergyman recently delivered a sermon on the above subject in this city, and as his remarks are historically untrue and liable to pass unchallenged, it might be well to review them as briefly as possible, and see whether, as claimed, the church should be justly proud of her actions.

"I stand here," says he, "with the permission of his eminence (the cardinal). I stand here with the permission of the Dominican fathers to exercise that authority which comes from the Holy See;" which means that, representing the pope and by authority of the head of the church in this country, he is defending, ex cathedra, the Dominicans, in their own church, from the charges made against them by historians, of wanton cruelty in the exercise of the office of Inquisitors in every country in which that institution was established.

The points he makes are, 1. That the Inquisition exists at this moment, just as it existed in the days of St. Dominic, with its center at Rome. Twelve cardinals comprise its corporate body, an avocat to defend accused persons, and "that no judgment can be given except by the pope himself." 2. That this tribunal, as constituted in Spain, was a purely political machine, and the church was not responsible for its cruelties; and, in a dramatic manner, he denies that any of its accusers ever read an "original book" of the doings of the institution, but content themselvs with some Protestant writer's translation, and winds up with a pen-picture of the tender manner in which the Inquisitors meet their visitors. "You are met," says he, "with an amount of politeness which, were America to possess its one-millionth part, would make every American a gentleman or a lady."

Now, it is a well-known fact that the Inquisition still exists at Rome, with its associate branches quietly at work wherever there may be a priest. But it is not true that it is at the present time just as it was in the days of Dominic, for then it dealt with human beings; now it deals with ideas, and passes judgment on the various works as they are published throughout the world, accepting some, placing others in the Index Expurgatorius (a black list), and no faithful Catholic can read a book thus proscribed, under pain of sin. Every book of reform tending to make a man think, or that in the slightest degree questions the "Holy Mother, the church," embellishes the pages of the Index. The true animus of this institution was laid bare when it prohibited "Uncle Tom's Cabin" "because it was opposed to the divine institution of slavery."

The argument of "original documents" used by Capel is pueril, and should it obtain, would act as a two-edged sword, for there is not in existence an "original document" of any of the books of the Bible, and even the apostolic succession, on which Rome founds her claims, must fall to the ground, as, from want of "original documents," it cannot be proved that St. Peter ever was in Rome; and for the same reason the church should not object to her so-called patrimony in Italy reverting to the people from whom it came.

But the principal objection is with the attempt to throw the odium which attaches itself to the Spanish branch upon the secular government; so, in order that there may be neither misunderstanding nor equivocating, we will proceed to quote entirely from a Catholic standpoint, totally ignoring all Protestant testimony, and even that of such writers as Comte, De Maistre, Hefele, Balmes, Guerin, Ives, and Mariana, who, like Capel, defended the institution, and confine ourselvs entirely to the following "original documents," "Las Instrucciones del Officio de la Sancta Inquisicion," by Torquemada; "The Directory of Inquisitors," by Nicolas Eymeric, inquisitor-general for forty years, as expounded by his commentator, Francisco Peña, and sanctioned by Pope Gregory XIII., published in 1578, and republished in 1587.

"Order of Proceedings in the Holy Office, compiled from Ancient and Modern Instructions, by the Licentiate, Pablo Garcia, Secretary of the Holy General Inquisition, dated 1628; from the Press of the Holy General Inquisition; Instruction which the Commissaries of the Holy Office of the Inquisition hav to Observe in the Causes and Affairs of Faith and Other Matters that may Occur." By Aciselo Cortès de Ribera Prieto, printer of the Holy Tribunal in Cordova; and Llorente, the last secretary of the Institution, who of all others cannot be objected to, at least on the ground of "want of original documents."

Let us first consider the claim that the Inquisition was a "purely political machine." We hav examined every attainable authority, Spanish and English, and fail to find that even one question of political import was ever asked a prisoner. The rules for examination are very specific; a routine is laid down for the guidance of the inquisitor, and he is enjoined never to depart from it, except to mystify the suspect. Every article is directed against heresy; every charge has a pecuniary indemnity, and in every instance a "bull," special or otherwise, is quoted as authority.

In the early stages, the principal objections raised against the institution were that it interfered with the various bishops, and deprived the local magistrates of their authority. So a special "bull" made the bishops coadjutors; the inquisitors and the civil authorities the subordinate officials; "the priest the judge, the king the hangman." Thus the "Holy Office" was declared superior to the civil government, and in proof we cite the following instances: Charles, eldest son of Philip II., was tried by the Inquisition, and barely escaped with his life; Joan, daughter of Charles V., was forced to giv testimony against one of her friends, a suspect, and was obliged to perform a penance for having concealed a heretic; Don Jaime, Infante of Navarre, and nephew of Ferdinand, for giving shelter to a friend who was a suspect, was arrested, thrown into prison, obliged to perform public penance in the cathedral, and was then sentenced by the archbishop (a boy of seventeen) to be flogged around the church by two priests. When Philip the Fair objected to the doings of Falco, the inquisitor, he was excommunicated, France put under an interdict, and his subjects commanded to render him no allegiance. If the "Holy Order" were purely political, would Matthew Ori, its chief, hav burnt Regnault, a printer, who, by positiv order of Francis I., issued at the request of Henry VIII., of England, assisted two Englishmen to print an edition of the Bible in English? or hav arrested Ignatius Loyola, afterward founder of the Jesuits? or persecuted and imprisoned for seventeen years Carranza, archbishop of Toledo and primate of Spain? or proceeded against "the glorious mother, Santa Teresa, of Jesus," under which name she has since been canonized? and what necessity would there hav been for Ferdinand V. to request the pope to recall his "bull" and restore the rights of jurisdiction to the civil power?

When Thomas Maynard, a British consul, was imprisoned, charged with having spoken disrespectfully of the church, Cromwell requested his release, and the king answered that it was out of his jurisdiction; the "Holy Office" was above him. Then the sturdy Covenanter replied: "Since this institution is beyond the control of your majesty, I will declare war against it;" and Maynard was released. When, in 1492, the Jews offered Ferdinand three hundred thousand pieces of silver to aid him in his wars, hoping, thereby, to gain his favor, why did Torquemada, when he heard of it, enter the royal apartments and, holding aloft a crucifix, cry out, "Judas sold his master for thirty pieces of silver; your highness is about to do the same for three hundred thousand; behold him! take him and hasten to sell him!" Was the war against the Freemasons political? And why, if political, did the chief inquisitor at each auto-da-fé, administer an oath to the king and his council to assist the "Holy Office," as per "the Apostolic Decrees and Sacred Canons?" Is it not strange that the victims number all the truly learned men—professors, theologians, doctors, and lawyers? If "the blood of the martyr be the seed of the church," these well authenticated cases giv the Lutherans the right to claim that their church is founded on as bloody a soil as the Catholic.

The persecution of the Jews was purely religious. Torquemada offered them protection if they would be baptized, and when they refused they were allowed four months to leave the country. Bernaldez, a Catholic writer, and eye-witness, describes their sufferings as perfectly heartrending. They could not sell their property, as no one would buy; and being debarred from taking away "gold, silver, money, or other valuable articles," they exchanged their estates for the merest trifles; "frequently a house was exchanged for a mule, or a vinyard given for a little cloth or linen." Among many instances coming under his immediate observation, he givs this: "A mother, carrying two infants, expired on the road. The father, overcome with fatigue, fell fainting near his two children. On recovering his consciousness, he found them dead with hunger." Was not this a baptism of blood?

The treatment of the Moors was equally scandalous. When they surrendered, a solemn treaty was entered into, whereby the king swore to allow them "their own laws, customs, and religion." Under pressure of the Inquisition, which claimed that "these heretics desecrated the holy soil of Spain," the pope absolved Charles from the oath, and Pope Paul III. prepared a special "bull" whereby Phillip II. was also absolved, on the ground that "an oath to a heretic is not binding." It is not a fair presumption that, for political acts only, over two millions of people should be expatriated; people who, according to the "original document," were of the very best and most intelligent classes—doctors, lawyers, apothecaries, professors, and workers in gold and silver—and not one historian claims that they were guilty of any political act. It is claimed, as a great triumph for the church, that large numbers became Christian, and the student will naturally inquire if their conversion is attributed to "positiv conviction," or to the peculiar arguments of the "Holy Office?" If to the former, why is it that the church is now uniformly unsuccessful? If to the latter, what arguments were used? If they were legal and could be used in these times, how derelict in duty is the present head of the church in allowing them to fall into disuse!

Let us now examin the "Directory of Inquisitors," by Chief Inquisitor Eymeric, and the other "original documents" we hav already quoted. They argree perfectly, one with another, and the rising power of the "Holy Office" can be easily traced by her gradually increasing demands.

"In a case of heresy," says Eymeric, "proceed quietly, without formality or noise of pleadings. There should be no delay, no interruption, no appeal, and as few witnesses as possible." "There are three modes of procedure: by accusation, information, or inquiry." If the first be used, "the charge should be made by a fiscal of the "Holy Office," who runs no risk of punishment if the charge should turn out to be false." The second is surer. One person to avoid excommunication will inform against another. The information may appear groundless at first sight, but the inquisitor must not cancel it on that account, for "what cannot be brought to light to-day may be made clear to-morrow." The third should hav two witnesses to confirm the suspicion. By common right, no criminal is required to giv evidence against himself; but, "in a case of heresy there is this obligation—the accused must furnish all the particulars to enable the fiscal to make out the charge."

Great stress is laid on the claim that the testimony of criminals can be taken against heretics; that one heretic can testify against another, but never in his favor, and even wives and children against the husband and father; "for, if a man may kill his father, if he be an enemy to his country, how much more may he inform against him, if he be guilty of heresy?" The criminal must not see his accusers, nor know who they are, and if he do not admit all he should, apply the torture. When you hav extracted a confession no defense is admissible. You are to choose the avocat, who must be zealous for the faith; be sworn to secrecy; hav no communication with the prisoner except in the presence of an inquisitor, and he must swear to abandon his client as soon as the heresy is proved. As the Decretals (vii, 7,) on Heretics, absolutely forbids an avowed heretic to hav an avocat, one can only be allowed where the heresy is suspected.

The chapter on tortures is too horrible to be reproduced here. They consist of the pulley, rack, and fire, the two former being divided into various parts, and the duration is regulated by bull of Pope Paul III., and limited to one hour; a physician is to stand by and regulate the suffering by the strength of the victim. But the torture can be "declared as suspended" and applied twice more; and it is advised that too long an interval should not elapse between them, "else the suspect may be able, from previous knowledge, to accommodate his limbs to the rack and thus defraud the Holy Office of its intention."

Heresy, as explained, embraces almost every thought or act. If a man speak disrespectfully of the "Holy Office," while drunk or sober, he must obtain twelve compurgators, who are held responsible for his future conduct. Should he relapse, they are to share his fate. If a man say, "Our Lord and his disciples were poor and possessed no property," it is an attack on the "Holy Office," and he is to be suspected lightly, and must do public penance as an incipient heretic.

Punishments are divided into two classes. In the first is confiscation of property under all circumstances, deprivation of offices, disinheriting of children and declaring them "infamous," to the fourth generation (for no child, though a Catholic, could inherit the property of a heretic father), whipping, the galleys, perpetual imprisonment on bread and water, and immured (or shut up or built in a wall). The second is the auto-da-fé, or death by fire, which is preceded by strangling, if the victim becomes reconciled to the church before execution. Even when pronounced innocent, the victim was to be declared "infamous," which deprived a man and his family of all civil rights, and was held against the children to the fourth generation. They had to dress in a peculiar manner, could wear no ornaments, were debarred from every profession and trade, and became literally "hewers of wood and drawers of water;" and in answer to the question, "Are the children begotten before he fell away from the holy Catholic church to be involved also?" the decision is against the child.

The method of "perpetual imprisonment" is the excess of refined cruelty, as it recommends that the suspect be confined, at a trifling cost, on his own sequestrated property.

A heretic is to be delivered to the secular power only after condemnation. When a magistrate kills a heretic, "he does his duty, and the Holy Office blesses him. But the deed is his, not theirs. They never kill, except by accident." Here the bull of Benedict XI. is quoted: "They [the Holy Office] may happen to kill a penitent; but as it is only by accident, they are to be exempt of guilt." Anyone who "looks ill upon an inquisitor," or "who hinders the Holy Office or its agents," or "refuses to help them," or "allows an accused person to conceal himself or escape," or "givs food to a heretic, unless he be actually dying of hunger," is a suspect.

The chapter on Indulgences, whereby citizens are incited to bring evidence against their neighbors, is well worth reading, and givs a cue to the state of terrorism which pervaded all classes of society. No man was safe, even in his own household, as a dissatisfied servant could, by secret testimony, consign him and his family to the secret dungeons, and then, as a reward, receive an annuity from the Holy Office. Every indulgence is supported by a "special bull," twenty, in all, being quoted. The victims were to be dressed in a peculiar garment, called "Sanbenito," and after execution it was to be exposed in his parish, contain his name, heresy for which he was burnt, and the date, "in order to perpetuate the disgrace of heretics and their descendants."

Suspects were not secure, even in their graves. Many instances could be quoted. One must suffice. At the auto-da-fé in Valladolid in 1559, the bones of Leonora de Vibero, mother of five children, were exhumed from the chapel on her estate and a process served against them. They were found guilty, publicly burnt, their owners' property confiscated, children declared "infamous" and thrown penniless upon the world. To commemorate this act, a pillar with a fitting inscription was erected and remained till 1809, when it was removed by the French.

The auto-da-fé, or act of faith, was the culminating point. Every seat of Inquisition held at least one, yearly. The day selected was either Sunday or some great feast, and was made the occasion of great rejoicing. By "special bull," all who attended received an "indulgence of twenty days;" that is, the "temporal punishment due venial or lesser sins" would be shortened by just that length of time. Francisco Sanchez's "original document" givs us an announcement of one as read throughout the city: "Be it known to all inhabitants, residents, and dwellers in this city of Grenada, how that the Lord Inquisitors Apostolic of the city and its district hav determined to celebrate a public auto-da-fé in honor and reverence of Jesus Christ our Lord, for exaltation of the holy Catholic faith and evangelical law and extirpation of heresies, on the Monday counted the thirtieth of May of this present year—day of the glorious King Don Ferdinand the Holy—and that the graces and indulgences granted by the Supreme Pontiff are conceded to all who shall be present and serve at the said act." The historian adds, "The most pious population of Grenada heard this publication with breathless attention, welcomed it with Catholic demonstrations of ardent religion, and their eyes being covered with liquid sparkles of faithful tenderness, came out to receive reverently, with heart and ear, the clauses of the proclamation." They then proceeded to burn eighty-nine men and women, poor wretches, whose bodies having been racked and minds weakened by incessant tortures, had declared themselvs guilty of any or every crime, though they knew the confession would end in death. Yet, the cessation of the present more than counterbalances the prospectiv torture; and as each ascends the funeral pyre, he is grimly assured by his executioner, when, to preserve himself from further pain, he consents to become reconciled to the church, and thus gains the boon of being strangled before being burnt, that by this "act of faith" he has saved his soul by losing his body. A veritable death in the full "odor of sanctity."

On the banner of the Inquisition was inscribed "Justicia et Misericordia;" yet Peter ab Herara, jailor of the tower of Triana, for merely allowing a mother to bid farewell to her imprisoned daughter, received two hundred lashes in the open street of the city, and was then sent to the galleys for ten years; and Johanna Bohorgues, a titled lady, accused of knowing her sister to be a Lutheran, and not informing on her, was arrested. Although six months advanced in pregnancy, she was tortured. Her enfeebled frame sunk under its sufferings; a blood-vessel burst while she was on the rack, and two days afterwards she died. The "Holy Office" showed due appreciation of their motto, and made the amende honorable by declaring her innocent.

Crimes such as these were by no means uncommon, and the "original documents" are full of them, though they are glossed over and attributed to "excessiv zeal," and other specious causes. Yet, the Inquisitor Pedro Arbues, whose record is equal to that of Torquemada, and who was killed on Sept. 14, 1485, by two men whose families he had destroyed, was canonized. Pope Alexander VII. wrote him into the number of the "holy and blessed martyrs," on April 17, 1664, and Pio Nono gave the faithful an opportunity, only a few years ago, to pay reverence and homage to his remains.

But the auto-da-fé is dead. Llorente tells us that when in 1820 the Spanish Cortes threw open the doors of the Inquisition, twenty-one prisoners were found in its cells. Not one of them knew the name of the city in which he was, and though they had been confined from three years to a much longer period, all were ignorant of the charges against them.

Yes, this branch is dead; and Torquemada and his confreres go down into history, credited, from "original documents," with having burnt, mutilated, and tortured 341,021 men, women, and children, besides the millions whose lives were cursed by being expatriated, declared infamous, etc.

If the "church" can feel proud of this exhibit, she is welcome to the eclat. But the day will come when she will be obliged to render an account of her stewardship, and she must not expect to hide herself behind the specious plea of "want of original documents." There are plenty in existence, and Mgr. Capel showed his ignorance when he assumed that position. It is true that Llorente, acting under orders of Joseph Bonaparte, destroyed much evidence, but much still remains, and is being gradually gathered for the use of the future historian.

In 1823 the Inquisition was revived in Spain, under the title of "Tribunal of the Faith;" but, shorn of its powers, it gradually dwindled away; and as the people became educated, and the liberal feeling grew stronger, in 1868 it became extinct.

Mgr. Capel says it still exists in Rome, but unable to injure life and limb, it must needs content itself with empty fulminations. Even the indictment against Galileo, which is generally looked upon as a direct result of the dark ages, stands to-day in full force on its black list, and the index of 1819 contains the sentence and prohibition. Yet in the face of all this, the bishop coadjutor of the cardinal, at a public dinner in New York in 1881, insulted the intelligence of his hearers by proposing the toast: "The Holy Catholic church, now, as ever, on the side of true science and philosophy." As Rome "never forgets or forgivs," may we not add, "and never learns?"

The intelligent portion of the Catholic community are not to be hoodwinked by the bold assertions and specious arguments of Mgr. Capel. The various sectional papers may report his sermons, but as a rule they do not do so at length. The well-informed among them are beginning to ask troublesome questions, and the peculiar action of the "college" in allowing the Bible to be printed in English is commented on. Pope Paul II. prohibited its translation "into the languages of the nations," and its appearance in English troubles theologians to explain how one infallible pope can be authorized to declare as fallible the doings of his infallible predecessor!

Catholics, as a rule, are not pleased with Capel. He has placed them in an equivocal position. By his assertions, spoken ex cathedra, as representativ of the pope, he has put them in antagonism to existing facts; and while from their peculiar standpoint they are not allowed to question the infallibility of the pope on "matters of faith," they are yet at liberty to question the infallibility of his judgment in allowing Capel to represent him in this country.

McARTHUR.

Mr. Bell's Reply to "T. E. L."

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 3d, following my lecture on anti-prohibition, is a criticism upon it under the title of "Prohibition," and signed, "T. E. L." The first thing I noticed in this criticism was the fact that the writer does not quote my language to refute it by the logic of facts, or by any kind of logic or reasoning whatever. My first impression was to make no answer to it at all, but lest such silence might be construed as a defeat, I will ventilate some of the generalities my critic has seen fit to favor the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER with. I shall not imitate him (I suppose it is a writer of the male persuasion), for it affords me too much pleasure to quote his precise language. And to begin we will take the following sample specimens: "In attempting to make a distinction between crime and vice he tacitly acknowledges the right of government to legislate to prohibit a crime, which was not a crime, but simply a vice, before the legislation." Where and how hav I "tacitly" made such admission? It would hav been greatly to the purpose if "T. E. L." had quoted my exact language, and given his readers some show of reasoning for this bald assertion. A crime is an injury done, or an attempt to injure, by one person, the person, property, or reputation of another, while a vice is the indulgence of one's appetites to his own injury. No, I do not admit that government can assume to legislate upon vices. That government has passed more extensiv laws upon crimes does not imply that such crimes were regarded as vices, or that, if they had been so regarded, that would make them vices.

Let us proceed a step further. My critic accuses me of "attempting to make a distinction between crime and vice." If it was nothing more than an attempt, then it was not a success; and as this is, in my opinion, the key to the situation, I will "attempt" once more to make clear my distinction between vice and crime. There are two kinds of evil acts; the one we call crimes, and the other vices. And there are two kinds of rights, namely, legal rights and moral rights. It is because these distinctions are not observed that prohibitory laws become possible. There is no meaning in the word liberty if we make no distinction between crime and vice. A crime is the violation of the laws of the state, and the laws of the state are enacted to protect the citizen in his person, property, and reputation. I will giv Webster's definition of vice: "Vice is more distinctivly that which springs from the individual indulgence of the natural appetites which are in themselvs innocent. Thus intemperance, unchastity, duplicity, etc., are vices." And if the vices of gluttony, intemperance, the use of tobacco, or blasphemy are legislated upon, it does not make them crimes only in name. No amount of legislation can convert a vice into a crime.

A farmer said to his son one day: "John, if you call the calf's tail a leg, then how many legs will the calf hav?" "Five," promptly responded the young hopeful. "Oh, no, my son; calling the calf's tail a leg does not make it a leg." The legitimate sphere of government, if it has any, is to protect the citizen in his rights, and when it undertakes to govern the moral conduct of men and women it transcends its limits.

He says, "Government has no moral function." Yes, we take that position, and think it very evident. But here is the way he goes on: "That is, it has no right nor authority to restrain immorality." Yes, we maintain that ground. It is in the very nature of morality that man must hav the liberty to be immoral.

In other words, the individual is to be his own judge of what is moral and what is immoral.

"It (government) cannot properly protect the good citizen from the vices, crimes, and outrages of the scoundrel." Here the critic makes no distinction between vices and crimes. In fact, he does not seem to know that there is any. Now, the truth is, I most explicitly affirm that it is the function of government to protect the citizen in his rights, but it has no business with his moral conduct.

"Why, to restrain the thief is a moral function." The same language was used by Dr. Prime, of the New York Observer, against D. M. Bennett, when he lay in Ludlow Jail. Mr. Bennett took the same position I hav maintained in regard to prohibition. No, restraining the thief is not a moral but a legal function. "Govermnents can liberate millions from the vice and immorality of slavery." Here we take his measure again. He seems to be positivly ignorant of the meaning of the words he uses. Slavery was not a vice, but the crime of all crimes. To rob a man of himself is not a vice or immorality, but the greatest crime under the sun. "If he has the liberty to indulge in a vice, can he also commit a crime with impunity?" No. What a senseless question!

"Does he mean to say the government is violating personal liberty and guilty of a crime in restraining the thousands of criminal and vicious to perpetrate their depredations upon society?" Government has no right to restrain the vicious before they hav committed a crime. It is no part of justice to punish a man on suspicion, nor is it a function of government to make laws to prevent the causes of crime. In this I am sustained by no less a person than Humboldt, who says: "I may safely assert that this prevention of criminal actions is wholly foreign to the state" (Sphere and Duties of Government, p. 171).

"Every crime or vice, however atrocious, if it be committed mediately or indirectly, should be exempt from legal cognizance, is the beautiful theory of Mr. Bell." No, it is not, and the writer ought to know better than to say so. Here, again, he makes no distinction between vice and crime. It is fatal to his position to admit my distinction between moral and legal rights, and difference between crime and vice. The critic has no grounds for saying that my theory exempts crime from legal cognizance.

"If Mr. Bell's Liberalism should rule, there would be no society to govern, and no need for governments to exercise either moral or civil function." Evidently the writer is not a Liberal. He has great faith in governing, and governing with a vengeance. If Mr. Bell's Liberalism were to rule, then justice would be meted out between man and man. There would be no pauper class to act as slaves for the robber class. There would be no superstitions taught to becloud the brain and make bitter the heart of man. Liberty, equality, and fraternity would transform society into a loving family such as no poet has ever yet dreamed of. Science would be the teacher, and humanity the religion of life.

I cannot forbear calling attention to the style in which "T. E. L." has seen fit to make allusion to me. In beginning his article he says, "I hav been amused and amazed." I hav cudgeled my brains in vain to think of an instance where a person could be at the same time both amused and amazed.

"His three postulates, accepted without qualification, are anarchical, false, and immoral, if not criminal." Criminal, eh? I am a criminal because I write against prohibition. The critic must be a member of the Anti-Vice Society, a fellow-crusader with Comstock.

"Would it not be well if Mr. Bell could be prohibited from diffusing such ideas of sentimentalism?" Blood will tell. It is in the blood of some people to prohibit everything they don't like. They hav prohibition on the brain. I might with interest return quid pro quo for his insulting personal references, when he speaks of my "special pleading" and "sophistry," and "reasonings to decoy people into his vagaries," "obfuscated brain," etc., etc. He kindly speaks of "commiseration"—as an atonement for the severe correction he fancies he has had to administer, he speaks, from his bowels of compassion, of "commiseration!" But as we hav no conceivable use for the commodity, and if he would win the commiseration of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, he must honestly define the meaning of crime and vice.

1205 State st., Chicago, Ill. W. S. BELL.

Paine's Birthday at the Liberal Club.

The last regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club was lost sight of and merged in the throng that came together to celebrate the 148th anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine. Before 8 o'clock every chair in the hall was occupied, and those who came later took seats on campstools in the aisles, or wherever else room could be found. There was no admission fee, the half-dime taken at the door at regular meetings of the club being remitted for this occasion. Nearly half those present were ladies, and many faces were recognized that are generally seen at the meetings of Spiritualists. The program as arranged by the committee was as follows:

OVERTURE,	MISS MAY DAVENPORT.
REPORT,	THE COMMITTEE.
DECLAMATION,	MR. SPLITDORF.
SONG,	MISS MAY DAVENPORT.
RECITATION,	MRS. GRIFFIN.
ADDRESS,	T. B. WAKEMAN.
RECITATION,	MADAME DELESCLUZE.
ADDRESS,	COURTLANDT PALMER.
SONG,	MR. J. G. HUHN.

The meeting was called to order by Mr. Wakeman, who, having read the notices presented, and announced the program of the club for the coming month, gave over the chair to Mr. Wilson Macdonald, the distinguished sculptor, who is also president of of the Paine Historical Society, founded a year ago. Mr. Macdonald said a few introductory words, and then presented Miss Davenport, who searched the piano for its musical resources, and seemed to bring them all out. The "deft toucher of the organ keys," who fills "the vast cathedral aisles with symphonies sweet and dim," must be deft indeed who could reach the springs of melody in an instrument with a surer hand.

The president stated the present condition of the search after the title of the ground in New Rochelle, N. Y., where the Paine monument stands. The title had been found to be good, and the owner was willing to sell the plot of ground to the Paine Historical Society.

Mr. Splitdorf, a young elocutionist, gave a selection from Shakspere's "Hamlet," in which he so suited "the action to the word, the word to the action," that the critical prince of Denmark himself could scarcely hav seen anything in the performance to find fault with. Mr. Splitdorf—who, in voice and gesture, revived memories of the balmy days of Chainey when the same hall rang with his eloquent words—was recalled, and rendered the scene in Schiller's "William Tell," where the Swiss patriot makes his escape from the tyrant Gesler. This recitation was equally well done and well received.

Following the eloquence of Mr. Splitdorf came the music of Miss Davenport, who sang two songs, the second being the result of a popular demand for it raised by the satisfactory performance of the first. If the maturity of this little artist fulfils the promis of her youth, the public will hear from her later.

Mr. Post and Mrs. Griffin were prevented from being present, and the president filled Mr. Post's time with a speech, and Mrs. Griffin's with a song that was extremely amusing.

The next address was by Mr. Wakeman on the "Contrasts between Paine and Webster." The speaker reverted to Webster's speech in the Girard will trial, in which the great orator denounced Girard as the direct descendant of Thomas Paine, and argued that the clause of the will which excluded ministers from Girard College should be broken, because it was necessary for the American youth to be educated in the tenets of the Christian religion, and under the teachings of the Christian ministry. In contrast with this, Paine contended for a secular education, "without any admixture of superstition." Webster held that under the disguise of the word superstition, Paine aimed at religion, and Mr. Wakeman admitted that, so far as concerned the Christian religion, that was exactly what Thomas Paine meant. Girard did not disguise his intention, and expressly stipulated that ministers of the Christian superstition should be excluded from the institution which his munificence had created and endowed. Webster lost his case, but the provisions of the will had been practically nullified by the introduction of religious services conducted by unordained priests. It was the duty of Liberals, the speaker said, to bring an influence to bear on the authorities of Girard College which should put an end effectually to this outrage, and restore to the uses for which it was intended this monument of Girard's generosity, now practically stolen. Another contrast between Paine and Webster related to their ideas of government. Paine believed in and advocated the rights of man as opposed the aristocracy of wealth and the power of kings and priests. In this he was the father and forerunner, if not the author, of the Declaration of Independence. From the people, he held, should come the power, and governors must rule only by the consent of the governed. Webster, on the contrary, stood for the rights of vested property, and advocated this view in a public speech and in writing. This, the speaker believed, lost Webster the presidency of the United States. He entered the field as a candidate for that high position, but the people had become indoctrinated with the political teachings of Paine, and to the surprise of Webster they rallied around and elected Jackson. Webster may hav recognized the source of his defeat. The speaker instanced the state of Rhode Island as an example of Webster's theory of government, which is practically an oligarchy, only those being allowed a voice in public affairs who are owners of real estate. That state is not under the popular and republican form of government which the national Constitution guarantees to the people of this country. Instead of citizenship resting in the vested rights of property, Paine would bestow citizenship on every man by virtue of his vested rights of manhood; and Mr. Wakeman believed that the time would come when those who are not men would become citizens by virtue of their vested rights of womanhood. Paine was also at heart an abolitionist, and emphasized and reiterated the statement that man could not hold property in man, and that no laws passed by men could giv him that right. Contrasted with this, such was Webster's enthusiasm for the rights of property that he upheld and defended the Fugitiv Slave law, which was unconstitutional, and which he must hav known to be such. In the Girard will trial, Webster referred to Paine as shallow, but, said the speaker, in view of the contrasts between the positions of these two men touching the vital principles on which our government is built, when sounded by the plummet of history and human experience, which was the deep man rather than the shallow? Was it the statesman and orator, Webster, the advocate of vested interests, of slavery, and of superstition, or was it the Quaker Paine, the defender of liberty, of the rights of man, and of religious and political freedom—the founder of governmental principles as enduring as civilization? In conclusion, Mr. Wakeman asked all to resolve to make themselvs acquainted with the writings of both Paine and Webster, that their many agreements, as well as their differences, might be found and appreciated. Both held sentiments dear to every patriotic heart, and they should go down to history together as two of the greatest men whose memory it was the privilege of Americans to honor.

Madame Delescluze followed with an original poem, rendered in the clear and ringing voice which distinguishes this mistress of elocution and makes everything she says so pleasing to listen to. The poem, the subject of which was "Our Continental Fathers," depicted the hardships of our revolutionary sires, the fortitude with which they bore them, and the courage they displayed in their struggles for independence. At the close Madame Delescluze was recalled, and responded with a humorous recitation with which her hearers were immensely pleased.

Mr. Courtlandt Palmer spoke upon "Paine as the Friend of the Workingman." The speaker said he had not been educated in the Freethought school of Paine, but imbibed his Liberal views more through men like Comte, Spencer, Mill, and others of that kind of thought. In what little he had seen of Paine's writings he found much of value. He then read extracts from the author-hero's works in which the writer touched upon the subject of low wages as a source of dishonesty. Among others were these:

"There is a powerful rhetoric in necessity which exceeds even a Dunning or a Wedderburne. No argument can satisfy the feelings of hunger nor abate the edge of appetite. Nothing tends to a greater corruption of manners and principles than a too great distress of circumstances; and the corruption is of that kind that it spreads a plaster for itself: like a viper it carries a cure, though a false one, for its own poison. Agur, without any alternativ, has made dishonesty the immediate consequence of poverty—'Lest I be poor and steal.'"

As illustrating the motivs for dishonesty which beset the poor, Mr. Palmer read this further extract from Paine:

"If the gay find it difficult to resist the allurements of pleasure, the great the temptations of ambition, or the miser the acquisition of wealth, how much stronger are the provocations of want and poverty! The excitements to pleasure, grandeur, or riches are mere 'shadows of a shade' compared to the irresistible necessities of nature. 'Not to be led into temptation' is the prayer of divinity itself, and to guard against, or, rather to prevent such ensnaring situations, is one of the greatest hights of human prudence.

"He who never was an hungered man may argue finely on the subjection of his appetite; and he who never was distressed may harang as beautifully on the power of principle. But poverty, like grief, has an incurable deafness which never hears; the oration loses all its edge, and 'to be or not to be' becomes the only question."

On the influence of good wages as an incitement to a faithful performance of duty, Paine wrote:

"A good servant will be careful of a good place, though very indifferent about a poor one."

Mr. Palmer read, also, extracts from the writings of Paine embodied in his "Life," by Remsburg. These contained political and industrial sentiments from which the speaker drew the inference that had Paine lived at the present time he would hav been foremost in all the current movements for reform. Mr. Palmer's remarks were an important contribution to the speeches of the occasion, showing as they did the author-hero in an aspect in which he has not hitherto been contemplated, and that the usefulness of Paine's works has not been exhausted when we hav drawn from them all that they contain on the subject of religion. He was one of the most versatil writers of his time; a poet, a journalist, and a free lance on the sea of letters, touching at every port where there was anything of usefulness or beauty to be obtained.

At the close of Mr. Palmer's address a subscription was opened for those who wished to assist in defraying the expense of clearing the title to the ground where Paine's body was buried. Courtlandt Palmer headed the subscription with ten dollars, Dr. Foote, Sr., followed with five, and Dr. Foote, Jr., Mrs. Burnz, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and various others contributed equal amounts. Something more than fifty dollars was paid upon the spot.

Capt. George Loyd, of New Rochelle, a venerable old gentleman, made a stirring address. His memory extends back nearly to the time made notable by the presence of Paine, and he took up his residence in New Rochelle because that town contains the ground where rested the ashes of that great man. Edward McGraw, of Wisconsin, one of the original subscribers to the Paine monument, upon motion of Capt. Loyd, was made an honorary member of the Paine Historical Society,

There was considerable surprise when it was announced that Mr. Huhn would render a song. All the frequenters of the club are admirers of this gentleman as a speaker, but few were aware that he could sing. He can sing, however, and does it well. His voice is fresh and strong, and with Dr. Foote, Jr., at the piano, the workingman's song which he sang was one of the most entertaining performances of the evening, and evoked vociferous applause.

Mr. Collyer gave the poem, "Dollars and Dimes," as a closing event, and the audience, after shaking hands and exchanging congratulations, dispersed to their homes. It had been the best Paine celebration ever held in New York.

News and Notes from the Field.

I delivered my last lecture at Toronto, Jan. 25th, on "The New Heaven and Earth," wherein I endeavored to outline the new order of society, when nature shall take the place of the supernatural. I go away from Canada with high hopes of the success of Liberalism in this dominion whose prosperity is founded in real material wealth, and whose elements of growth are stable. The Secular movement has struggled against many difficulties, but it has won some remarkable victories in the just administration of government, and to-day occupies a most advantageous position. I had the pleasure of meeting Robert G. Ingersoll at Buffalo, and receiving his hearty good wishes and new enthusiasm from his wonderful labors, so adapted to the present hope and aspiration of man, and yet so far-reaching and so radical, I felt almost in the noontide glory of the "good time coming" as I looked into his kindly face, and rejoiced in the genius of his noble humanity. Surely with such a leader, all difficulties can be overcome, and our most glorious anticipations be realized.

From Toronto I went to Linesville, Pa., where the camp-fires of a veteran Liberal host blaze year after year. The village is small and has within its precincts a comparativly limited number of Liberals, but for miles around in the farming community there are sturdy Freethinkers, and they gather together two or three times a year, and hold one of the brightest festivals of progress in the whole country. Mr. G. W. Baldwin is one of their prominent leaders. He is always ready to "lend a hand," and compels success by his admirable sagacity and generosity. Through his personal activity the very best elements are brought into play, and the sinews of war always funished, even if they hav to come out of his own pocket, as they very often do. He offered to giv one of the orthodox churches fifty dollars per year for the support of the minister if he could hav the privilege of a ten minute reply to the sermons. The offer was declined, for such ten-minute-guns would soon demolish their fort.

On Tuesday morning I spoke of the "Church of the Future," and in the evening Mr. Watts on the "Aims and Methods of Secularism." On Wednesday morning he spoke of "The Fall and Atonement," which was a rattling discharge against the absurdities of Christian theology.

In the evening I gave my lecture on the "New Heaven and Earth," and Mr. Watts followed with his brilliant exposition of "Agnosticism." Quite a lively debate broke out after this address. A Mr. Atwood, a Seventh Day Adventist, I believe, though what he really was no fellow could find out, for his discourse was one of the greatest jumbles to which I ever listened. He was originally an admirer of Paine, and danced, he said, seventeen sets one night in his honor. Hereafter I shall never dance seventeen sets in one night. I shall strictly confine myself to sixteen, for the fatal effects of seventeen are simply overwhelming. It puts one's head in such a whirl that he never knows what logical tumble he may take next, that is, if our good friend is an example. Watts did his best to straighten him out, to put some argument into his miscellaneous speech, and then reply with most effectiv blows, and show the utter worthlessness of the theological claims of Christianity.

On Thursday morning Mr. Watts again lectured, his subject being, "Civilization and its Aids." On Thursday evening Mrs. Mattie Krekel was with us, and gave a beautiful oration, remarkable and original in its development of thought, demonstrating the profound reasons we hav for celebrating the memory of Thomas Paine, not simply because he was Thomas Paine, but because he was such a thoroughly representativ man, and included in the sweep of his eventful life those vast tendencies that flow to the universal republic of humanity, to the brotherhood of all nations.

Mr. Charles Watts concluded the speaking portion of the Convention with a lengthy address on the character and teachings of the hero of the evening. Mr. Watts drew a distinction between true greatness and that based upon military renown, martial usurpation, and empty titles, which, he said, were but the emblems of an artificial grandeur. True greatness consists in the exercise of benevolence, justice, humane conduct, unselfish action, the fostering of freedom, the love and practice of truth, and the endeavor to improve the masses physically, morally, and intellectually. The former was despised by Paine, but the latter he clung to and exemplified through a long and activ life. The leading traits of Paine's life were then dwelt upon with considerable force: honesty, generosity, candor, industry, and courage, were qualities shown to be possessed to a large degree by him, and also to be worthy of our emulation. Paine was a hero of three countries and an instructor to the entire civilized world. In England he gave the people a new and solid political education, in America he hastened the making of a grand republic, and in France he gave an impetus to one of the mightiest revolutions the world has ever seen.

Mr. Watts having gone through the principal events of Paine's career, and touched upon his religious and political teachings, gave the following estimate of his personal character: Thomas Paine was not perfect. Like other men, he had his faults and failings, but all trustworthy records of his life show him to be vastly superior to the descriptions given of him by his unscrupulous opponents. He was not a skeptic in the sense in which that word is accepted by the Christian world to-day. On the contrary, he was a firm believer in what he termed a supreme being and the reality of a future life. But Thomas Paine was pre-eminently an honest man. He was a world-wide reformer. National distinctions never interfered with his labors of love. Wherever he observed tyranny, oppression, and corruption he worked heartily and persistently for their removal. By his heroic efforts he established a name which became a terror to kings and priests, to tyrants and despots of every grade. His self-denial won for him a fame that for ages will cause him to be regarded as a real benefactor to the human race. He had a generous and affectionate nature, a mind superior to fear and selfish interests; a mind governed by the principles of uniform rectitude and integrity; a mind the same in prosperity as in adversity; one which no bribe could seduce, and no terror could overawe. Unlike many of the would-be teachers of the present time, Paine sacrificed no principle to personal gain, and marred no cause to secure his own exclusiv advancement. His life was unsullied by mean craft and petty trickery; his character was untarnished with avarice and treachery, and his honor was untainted with the blight of falsehood and hypocrisy. Loyalty to truth, allegiance to justice, and fidelity to friendship raised him mountains high above those hollow and pretentious shams who desire to be thought the instructors of the people to-day. Paine possessed a large and benevolent heart. He was faithful to his friends, forgiving to his enemies; compassionate to the unfortunate, self-denying to private interests, but zealous for the public good; magnanimous without being proud, humble without being mean, just without being harsh, simple in his manners, but manly in his feelings: one upon whose word you could rely, and whose countenance would never deceive you. Nobly he adorns the pantheon of the world's mighty heroes, and stands forth among the most prominent political and religious reformers of the eighteenth century—a pioneer of liberty and a harbinger of intellectual freedom. True, against him has the venom of malice been hurled, the fire of bigotry kindled, the waves of superstition ruthlessly dashed. Professing Christians hav maligned his character, perverted his teachings, and most foully misrepresented the record of his labors. During his life they shunned him, and at his death they slandered him. But notwithstanding all this calumny and abuse, this malice and falsehood, born of a corrupt theology, the hero of Thetford lived a consistent, useful life, and died full of years and honors, leaving a legacy of worth of which posterity can truly be proud. His achievements inspire within us the recollection that "Lives of great men all remind us,

We can make our lives sublime,
And, departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time;

Footprints that, perchance, another,
Sailing o'er life's solemn main—
A forlorn and shipwrecked brother
Seeing, shall take heart again."

After the addresses came music, dancing, supper, etc. Both young and old enjoyed the festival occasion, and remembrance of heroic virtue was joined with measures of delight, and with the toil and suffering of the past were mingled the sparkling threads of hope, so that a happy picture was woven of the boundless future.

From Linesville we came to Altoona to attend the State Convention of Pennsylvania, and a grand time is expected. The following program outlines something of what will be done: Friday evening, 7:30 o'clock, lecture by Ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds, subject, "Salvation;" Saturday morning, Jan. 31st, 10 o'clock, session of the Pennsylvania State Liberal League; Saturday afternoon, 2 o'clock, address on "Organization," by Ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds; addresses by H. Clay Luse, of Waynesburg; Harry Hoover, of Pittsburg; Samuel P. Putnam, of New York; and Mrs. Mattie Krekel, of Missouri; Sunday morning, Feb. 1st, 10 o'clock, Congress of Pennsylvania Liberal League, election of officers, etc.; Sunday afternoon, 2 o'clock, lecture by Mrs. Mattie Krekel, of Missouri, subject, "Duty of the Hour;" lecture by S. P. Putnam, of New York (secretary of the National Liberal League), subject, "The Church of the Future;" Sunday evening, 8 o'clock, Charles Watts, the great English champion of Secularism, subject, "Secularism."

The orthodox are on fire with excitement, and would like, a la John Calvin, to burn us up. The following from the Pittsburg Dispatch, local paper, shows what a Christian spirit is animating them, and how exceedingly desirous they are to build up the kingdom of God. The outcome of all this zeal will be duly noted next week:

INTIMATIONS THAT CHRISTIAN CITIZENS OF ALTOONA WILL INVOKE THE LAW AGAINST BLASPHEMY.

ALTOONA, Jan. 28th—The announcement that the Pennsylvania State Liberal League will hold a three days' session here, beginning on Friday next, has awakened considerable interest, and provoked no little discussion. The meetings will be held in the City Opera House. Among the distinguished Freethinkers announced to be in attendance are Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, who will lecture on "Which Way;" on Saturday evening; Charles Watts, of England; Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel, of Missouri, and Samuel P. Putnam, of New York. An ex-reverend is also announced to exhibit himself.

Some of the enemies of the sort of Liberalism advocated by this League are decidedly indignant at the inroad of Ingersoll and company upon this city, and it is whispered about that a collision will occur before the week is over. A gentleman who is believed to possess considerable grit, declared to-day that blasphemy would not be permitted to go unpunished in this city. He affirms that an organization of reputable citizens, having the enforcement of the law at heart, exists here, and that in due time proper steps will be taken to prevent public blasphemy.

"Why," said he, "it is the duty of good citizens to aid in the enforcement of the law, and what does the law say?" He then quoted section 30 of the act of March 31, 1860, as follows:

"If any person shall willfully, premeditatedly, and disrespectfully blaspheme or speak loosely and profanely of Almighty God, Christ Jesus, the Holy Spirit, or the scriptures of truth, such person, on conviction thereof, shall be sentenced to pay a fine, not exceeding $100, and undergo an imprisonment, not exceeding three months, or either, at the discretion of the court."

"The above section," said the friend of orthodoxy, "will be enforced if necessary." There is every reason to believe that he represents a considerable number of people. At the same time, a very large proportion of the religious people oppose any repressiv measures, declaring that the truth is abundantly able to take care of itself without invoking the aid of human law. They say they do not think it would be wise to giv the Liberals an opportunity to pose before the world as martyrs.

LECTURE ENGAGEMENTS.

Sunday, Feb. 8th, Watts and Putnam lecture at Pittsburg; 10th and 11th, at Alliance, Ohio; 12th and 13th, at Massillon, Ohio; Feb. 15th, at Cleveland; and at Upper Sandusky, Ohio, Feb. 17th, 18th, 19th, and 20th. S. P. Putnam will lecture at Cincinnati, Ohio, March 1st.

Special notice to all Liberal friends at Cleveland: Please remember that Mr. Watts will be with you on Sunday, Feb. 15th. Please do your best to advertise the meeting, in order that we may hav full houses and a good field-day for the campaign.

Fraternally yours, SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Jan. 31, 1885.

Saturday, 10 P.M.—A large audience gathered in the Opera House to listen to Ingersoll's bewitching eloquence, but he was compelled to be absent. In this delemma we had to call in the assistance of our plucky Charles Watts, who never spoke so magnificently in his life, and showed that, next to Ingersoll, he is our most brilliant Liberal orator. He took the subject "Which Way?" and with remarkable skill and fervid eloquence, contrasted Christianity with Secularism. The audience was thoroughly satisfied and forgot their disappointment. While there is but one Ingersoll, it is fortunate that we hav a Watts also, who, in a emergency like this, can wield his own magic wand.

Mrs. Mattie Krekel, after Mr. Watts's splendid discourse, aided us also with an animated speech that closed the meeting with a real triumph, and won for herself new laurels.

C. B. Reynolds has been chosen secretary and state lecturer, and, no doubt, with his enthusiastic labors and such co-adjutors as Professor Seymour, Pennsylvania will become one of the banner states of the Liberal cause.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Mr. Watts at Owen Sound.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Mr. Watts has just concluded a course consisting of three lectures here, subjects as follows: 1. "Secularism the True Gospel for Mankind;" 2. "Agnosticism and Christian Theism;" 3. "The Bible: Its Use and Abuse." In the handling of those subjects Mr. Watts has fully sustained his reputation as an eloquent, logical, and effectiv speaker, and the effect has been to bring home to many reluctant minds the contradictions, mischievousness, and absurdity of Christian teaching, and the truth, comprehensivness, and practicality of Secularism as a system. No effort was left untried to induce the clergy to come out to defend their position, but without result, and as that fact is well known here, the influence of their flagrant cowardice tells almost as much against Christianity as if they had come forward and received the drubbing which assuredly would hav been theirs at the hands of our champion. We had, however, come weak opposition each night, and the result was sufficient to convince us that too much cannot be said in favor of Mr. Watts's powers as a debater. Respectfully yours,

Owen Sound, Ont., Jan. 24, 1885. GEO. S. CALDBECK.

IN addition to his visit to Buffalo Mr. Watts delivered nine lectures last week. The whole of this month he lectures in the States, and returns to Canada in March for a debate and a course of lectures. In April, accompanied by Mr. Putnam, Mr. Watts makes a tour through the Western states. All applications for lectures in those districts should be sent to Mr. S. P. Putnam at once, care of THE TRUTH SEEKER office, 33 Clinton Place, New York city.

MR. WATTS was compelled to cancel his engagement for Montreal to accept an invitation from Col. Ingersoll to meet him at Buffalo for the purpose of conferring on matters pertaining to the League, or the "American Secular Union." Mr. Watts had a long interview with the colonel upon the future course to be adopted by our association, the full particulars of which, no doubt, will be published in these columns next week.

Lectures and Meetings.

CHARLES WATTS will lecture at Upper Sandusky, Ohio, Feb. 17th, 18th, 19th, and 20th. Freethinkers in that place and in neighboring places should make arrangements to attend, as it is perhaps the only course of lectures which the Liberals can hav this winter. F. E. Sturgis is the activ mover in the matter, and any information can be obtained faom him. His address is Box 614, Upper Sandusky, Ohio.

MR. WATTS writes that he listened to Col. Ingersoll lecture on Sunday, Jan. 25th, at Buffalo. Great as Mr. Watts's expectations were they were more than realized in the two hours' oration he heard from the colonel, who, in Mr. Watts's opinion (and few will differ from him in this matter), is by far the greatest orator of the present day. Historical reference, scriptural questions, anecdotal narrativs, and witty allusions, in a style as unique as it is pleasing, render a lecture from Col. Ingersoll an intellectual treat and an emotional gratification. Mr. and Mrs. Watts spent Sunday afternoon and the greater part of Monday with the colonel and his charming wife, and on leaving their genial host and hostess were impressed more than ever of the wisdom in securing such a man as Col. Ingersoll to be at the head of the great Secular movement of the States and Canada.

J. L. ANDREW writes: "I hav just returned from Texas after spending three months in that state lecturing. At the request of several Liberals, I hav decided to return there some time the coming spring. In order to economize time and travel, I would like to hear from Liberals anywhere in the states who are desirous of obtaining Liberal lectures. I will try to make my terms reasonable to all. I hav made arrangements with the manager of the Opera House at Dallas for a lecture there on some Sunday night. As it will be well advertised, I hope that the Liberals of that city will come, and induce their friends to occompany them. There will be an admission to meet expenses. If there are any Liberals in Western Arkansas who desire Liberal lectures, I will be pleased to lecture for them en route to Texas. Inclosed is $4, for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER to the names in my private letter. All letters addressed me in care Professor D. O. Bryant, Fort Scott, Kansas, will find me."

The Message of the Wind.

QUERY.

When from his slumber in the icy North
Grim Boreas wakes and issues freezing forth;
When through bare trees the Southern zephyrs sing,
And rouse our memory of the genial spring;
Or East or West the winds sweep soft or strong,
What is the one sweet burden of their song?

ANSWER.

This is the message that they bear
O'er land and o'er the water,
"The best of ANNUALS is out,
And only costs a quarter."

Religious Exercises in Public Schools.

The Supreme Court of Iowa filed an opinion upon the question of religious exercises in schools in September last, in the case of "Moore vs. Monroe and another."

The plaintiff Moore brought an action against the teachers of the school and directors of the district, and prayed an injunction to prevent the reading or repeating of the Bible or any part thereof, and the singing of religious songs in the school. The court refused to grant the injunction, and Moore appealed to the Supreme Court, where the decision was affirmed. The opinion of the court, by Judge Adams, recites that the teachers of the school are accustomed to occupy a few minutes each morning in reading selections from the Bible, in repeating the Lord's Prayer, and singing religious songs; that the plaintiff has two children in the school, but that they are not required to be present during the time thus occupied. The teacher refused to discontinue such exercises, and the directors refused to interfere.

These religious exercises took place in school hours, and if they were proper they were a legitimate part of the school training, which the teachers and the directors had a right to enforce, and to require each pupil to join in. The teachers had no right to use the school-room for purposes of propagandism outside of the regular school hours. They are employed solely for the purpose of teaching, not for prayer or praise, or scriptural instruction. No teacher has a right to institute devotional meetings for an Episcopal service, for instruction in the creed of the Presbyterian or Catholic church, to ask the children to count their beads, or to bow before the cross, in the school-rooms outside of school hours. To do so would array sect against sect, to become a propagandist of the faith of the teacher. In a graded school, with Protestant and Catholic teachers, theological discussions and conflicts would take place. If this would not be proper outside of school hours, it would not be in school hours. It is no less a perversion of the school law to hav religious exercises in school hours. The teachers hav no right to introduce text-books at their will and pleasure. They can not introduce the St. James or revised versions of the Bible, or the Douay version, without authority from the school board. The school board cannot do it without authority from the legislature. The legislature must hav constitutional authority to authorize it. The court in Moore's case held that the Bible could not be excluded from the schools because section 1,764 of the code provides, "The Bible shall not be excluded from any school or institution in this state, nor shall any pupil be required to read it contrary to the wishes of his parent or guardian;" that "under this provision it is a matter of individual option with school-teachers as to whether they will use the Bible in schools or not, such option being restricted only by the provision that no pupil shall be required to read it contrary to the wishes of his parent or guardian. It was doubtless thought by the legislature that an attempt on the part of school boards to exclude, by official action, the Bible from the schools would result in unseemly controversies, to be decided ultimately at the polls, and that such controversies would naturally disturb the harmony of school districts, and impair the efficiency of the schools."

The conclusion of the court as to the evil to be avoided is not correct. Without the statute the Bible could not be introduced. The teachers would hav had no option. But the introduction of the Bible naturally leads to sectarian controversies. The religious faith of the teacher, who has the option to introduce the Bible or not, becomes a test of fitness, and the school directors will be elected with reference to their religious views. The very evil the court says was to be prevented is produced by the law. But if the law is constitutional, it is a law to be strictly construed. It simply prohibits the exclusion of the Bible from the schools. It does not prohibit the exclusion of religious exercises. It does not giv the teacher an option to hold religious services. For the establishing of religious services by statute is to establish religion, which is forbidden by the Bill of Rights. If the legislature can giv half an hour of the school time to reading of the Bible, to prayer and praise, it can giv an hour or more. It can make religious education the principal feature of the schools. The legislature can hav no such option. If it could, sectarianism would be a test for office. One legislature would enforce the reading and study of the Douay version; the next the Protestant version. Religious strife would ensue. It would be idle to reply that no child should be instructed in a faith contrary to the wishes of his parent or guardian. If he has the right to demand this, he has the right to demand that the teacher shall not neglect purely secular instruction to giv religious instruction to the pupils whose faith is that of the teacher. He has a right to say that he ought not to be taxed to pay for purely religious instruction.

If the legislature has no option to legislate for religious instruction, much less hav the school directors. They hav no powers except those conferred by statute. The teachers hav less. They are employees only. The directors can frame the regulations for the schools, within the limits prescribed by law.

The constitutional provision which was claimed to apply to this case is:

"The General Assembly shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; nor shall any person be compelled to attend any places of worship, pay tithes, taxes, or rates for building or repairing places of worship, or the maintenance of any minister or ministry."

The plaintiff held, as the court states, "that by the use of the school-house as a place for reading the Lord's Prayer, and singing religious songs, it is made a place of worship; and so his children are compelled to attend a place of worship, and he as a taxpayer is compelled to pay taxes for building and repairing a place of worship."

The court continues: "We can conceive that exercises like those described might be adopted with other views than those of worship, and possibly they are in the case at bar; but it is hardly to be presumed that this is wholly so. For the purposes of the opinion, it may be conceded that the teachers do not intend to wholly exclude the idea of worship. It would follow from such concession that the school-house is, in some sense, for the time being made a place of worship. But it seems to us that if we should hold that it is made a place of worship within the meaning of the Constitution, we should put a very strained construction upon it. The object of the provision, we think, is not to prevent the casual use of a public building as a place for offering prayer or doing other acts of religious worship, but to prevent the enactment of a law whereby any person can be compelled to pay taxes for building or repairing any place designed to be used distinctivly as a place of worship."

This is evasiv, pure pettifogging. The object of the provision was to divorce religious worship from public affairs. Religion was considered a private affair, to be exercised on private property, not on public property, or to any extent at public cost. If the school-house is used for church purposes, it is within the prohibition of the Constitution. If the teacher holds religious service during school hours, then the teacher is a recognized part of the ministry, a school chaplain, and is paid by the state for services as such. Such a use is not a casual use of the building. It is no less religious service because the teacher waives the right to compel all pupils to attend. To that extent the teacher appropriates public time in which secular instruction should be given to the private religious worship of himself or herself and the pupils who are of the same religious faith. The teacher becomes a sectarian propagandist at public expense. School taxes are used for the support of religion.

After this evasiv construction of the Constitution, the opinion travels out of the record, and suggests that, "possibly, the plaintiff is a propagandist, and regards himself charged with a mission to destroy the influence of the Bible. Whether this be so or not, it is sufficient to say that the courts are charged with no such mission." The court stoops to excuse its lack of law by appealing to Christian prejudice.

What if he is a propagandist? The court can find no Constitutional prohibition against that, so long as he does not enter the school-room in school hours to attack the Bible. If he has no right to attack the Bible at public expense, the converse is true—the teacher has no right to insist on reading it, to go further, and offer prayer, and worship by religious songs. The court can find no more authority to preserve the Bible than it can to destroy it. It has no jurisdiction over the canon of the scriptures, the question of inspiration, the selection and approval of the true translation. The Constitution has conferred a limited jurisdiction on the court, and these questions are not submitted to its jurisdiction. The assumption that the preservation of the Bible has been commited to its care is absurd. But the court seems to be impressed with the same sense of duty to sustain religion which influenced Lord Coke, and assumes the same sort of sanctity which the ancient Christian judges of England did when they were called upon to make law at the demand of the king to uphold royal robbery or royal lust.

The law protects the school-house from religious propagandism; and the court should so declare without excepting any sect or church, and should hold the teacher down to the legal contract, with the same strictness it would if the teacher was a Catholic or a Jew. It should hav held the statute to be unconstitutional when construed as the court construes it. It should hav been so held for another reason. As adopted by the board of education originally, it referred in terms only to public schools and institutions. Under the Revised Code of 1873, it applies to all schools, private as well as public. This recognition of the Bible as a book which, by statute, is required to be in all schools and institutions, is an interference with private rights of conscience. It invades the private school which professes to be secular, and compels the proprietor to bring it into the school-room, and permit Christian children to devote a portion of the school time to reading and studying it. This is an establishment of Bible religion. The court cannot interpolate the word private into the law as it now stands. If constitutional as to public schools, it is unconstitutional as to private schools; and as the constitutional part of the law, if there is such a part, is not separable from the unconstitutional part, the whole statute falls.

If the intent of this law was to sanction the reading of the Bible as part of the religious exercises of the school, it makes the teachers an essential part of a religious ministry. In the name of the state, at the expense of the tax-payers, they do the work of the church; and they compose a religious ministry, though never licensed by a sect, or ordained as priests.

The concession that parents may prohibit their children from reading the Bible is a concession that religion is a private matter, not a state concern. The parent has the right to go farther, and to demand that the Bible shall not be read in the presence of his children as a religious exercise. He has a right to insist that his children shall not be turned out of the school-room to allow the teacher to conduct a Bible exercise. He has an equal right to insist that they shall not hav their school hours shortened for such purpose; that the time which should be devoted to study shall not be used for Bible-reading, prayer, or praise.

The right to regulate the school does not extend beyond purely Secular instruction. To go beyond this invades the province of private right and religious liberty. It is to regulate the religious conduct of pupils, and make the public schools an arena for propagating the faith of the teacher—for displaying sectarian zeal. This leads to sectarian tests in school elections. The directors and teachers will be selected with reference to their religious faith. Catholic, Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian, and Infidel will necessarily raise the question of sect, and the faith of the director and teacher will become, in fact, the chief requisit for re-election or appointment. Instead of keeping religion out of school-politics, this decision makes it a living issue, and forces it to the front. It clothes the teacher with autocratic powers. He is a greater power than the parent, the school-board, and the legislature. The Supreme Court of Iowa has already abdicated in his favor. Religious rings will be formed to maintain this power in the hands of sectarian teachers. Sects will vie with each other to place this religious local option in the hands of their members. Such religious zeal will increase religious bigotry and sectarian strife.

Bacon and Shakespere.

A CHRONOGRAPHIC PARALLEL.

A.D. 1594.

Bacon at 33 still lacks promotion, and is in pecuniary distress. His want of practice at the bar is the strongest objection to his aspiration for the attorneyship. He therefore meets that objection by making his first pleading at king's bench, Jan. 27th. He acquits himself so well that Burleigh congratulates him and asks for a note of his chief points for a report. A few days later he argues another case with eclat. Gosnold, who hears him, remarks that he "spangled his speech with unusual words," and is persuaded that "Bacon will be too hard for the Cooke"—meaning Lord Coke, whose name was originally thus spelt and sounded.

Essex is more resolute than ever for Bacon's appointment, and is angry with Burleigh for not supporting his near kinsman, who, "excepting only his four poor years of admittance," is in all other respects far fitter for the place than Coke.

On the 10th of April Coke receives the appointment. But the place of solicitor is not filled, and among the competitors there is none so competent as Bacon, who is still under a cloud at court for his late subsidy speech. Anthony writes to his mother, May 17th, that if Francis does not obtain the place before the next term, they will make no further effort for it.

By the 13th of June the queen so far relents toward Bacon as to employ him in an important investigation touching her own safety. Near the close of the preceding year her physician, Lopez, was detected by Essex in a plot to poison her. The evidence was disclosed to the government in January, 1594, but the Cecils treated it so lightly that Essex is brought into contempt. The earl then resolves to pursue the inquiry further, aided by his secretary, Anthony Bacon. The result is that Lopez is proved guilty and sent to the Tower, with two other confederates, where for three months they await execution.

At this stage of the proceedings the services of Francis Bacon are employed. Two principal officers of the king of Spain are implicated, and it is probable that King Philip himself is privy to the plot. But Elizabeth and the majority of her ministers are loth to expose the crimes of royalty, and the evidence is suppressed. The clearest narrativ of the case is drawn up by Bacon, but never published until he has been dead 31 years, entitled "A True Report of the Detestable Treason Intended by Dr. Roderigo Lopez," etc.

During the progress of the investigation Bacon journeys to the north, whence he writes a letter to the queen, regretting that sudden illness has foiled his purpose. Being near Cambridge, he makes use of the opportunity to obtain the degree of Master of Arts.

About this time he writes "The First Copy of my Discourse touching the Safety of the Queen's Person," only a fragment of which is preserved.

December comes, but no promotion. Anthony has pledged his estate for money to enable Francis to make the northern journey, and money has to be raised to pay the interest on money already borrowed. Never did Anthony appear to disapprove of his brother's conduct.

On the 5th of December Bacon begins to prepare a "Promus of Formularies and Elegancies." In these, says Mr. Spedding, "may be traced the footprints of a journey in the mind over a large field of reading and meditation, with a view to fix the leading features in memory and store them for future use." Perhaps ere this the astute biographer has been astonished to learn that these "formularies and elegancies" are nearly all reproduced in the works of Shakespere, while but a small proportion can be found in any of Bacon's acknowledged writings. We refer to an elaborate book entitled "Promus of Formularies and Elegancies, by Francis Bacon: Illustrated and Elucidated by Passages from Shakespere." By Mrs. Henry Pott. Houghton, Mifflin, & Co., Boston, 1883. We shall recur to this work hereafter.

But there is still further evidence, this year, to prove that Bacon is secretly a play-writer—one of the five classes of "vagrants," who, in the judgment of Lord Coke, are fit subjects for the grand jury, and whose end is "beggary." In December, 1594, the Christmas Revels are revived at Gray's Inn, after an intermission of four years. Lady Bacon is already grieved to learn that plays are being performed at her son Anthony's house, "very much to the delight of Essex and his jovial crew" (of whom Southampton is, of course, one), but "to the peril of her sons' souls." Plays and novels are burnt privately by the bishops and publicly by the Puritans. The pious mother is distressed to hear that the Christmas revels are to be resumed, and on the 5th of December she writes to Anthony: "I trust they will not mum, nor mask, nor sinfully revel at Gray's Inn." "But it was too late for praying," says Mr. Spedding; "the youth of Gray's Inn were already deep in sinful consultation." They elect a prince of Purpoole ("Dominus Purpoole" in 1587), and provide him with a Privy Council. The revels begin December 20th, and continue till January 3d. "It is one of the most elegant Christmas entertainments, probably," says Mr. Spedding, "that was ever presented to an audience of statesmen and courtiers;" and he conjectures that Bacon had a hand in the general design, because "we know that he had a taste for such things, and did sometimes take a part in arranging them.

On the 28th of December a grand night's entertainment is prepared, with "A Comedy of Errors" to be "played by the players." The crowd of lords and ladies is so great that there is not room enough for the actors, and the evening has to be spent in ordinary reveling and dancing. But when that is over, the "Comedy of Errors" is performed, which Mr. Spedding supposes was Shakspere's. This, says he, is regarded as the crowning disgrace of the unfortunate Grand Night, which is ever afterward called the "Night of Errors."

The next night is taken up with a legal inquiry before the court of Oyer and Terminer into the causes of those disorders. The offenders are convicted but pardoned, and the prince's council proceeds "to hold a consultation for the recovery of their lost honor."

At this stage Mr. Spedding has no doubt that Bacon took the leading parts in preparing "Divers Plots and Devices" for the night of January 3d. The speeches of the six councillors are given, and the answer of the prince, all of which the biographer says are without doubt Bacon's composition, being reproduced by him in his work entitled, "Solomon's House."

"Gesta Grayorum, or the History of the high and mighty Prince, Henry, Prince of Purpoole, etc., who reigned and died A.D. 1594," was accidentally found and printed in 1685, author unknown. But Bacon's hand is apparent not only in the speeches of the Masque, but in the Articles drawn up for the government of the new "Order of the Helmet," as Mr. Holmes demonstrated from parallelisms between the said Articles and the Plays of Shakspere that appeared after 1594, as well as Bacon's known works. The reign of the Prince of Purpoole is prolonged until the day before Lent. Bacon's contributions to these royal amusements continued far into the reign of James I.

Fragments of another Masque hav lately been discovered, evidently prepared about the same time and by the same hand, containing numerous passages that are strikingly paralleled in "Midsummer Night's Dream" and other later plays. And in this fragmentary Masque, which Shakspere never could hav seen, there is the following speech of an Oracle which is equal to the ordinary flights of the versified plays:

"Seated between the Old World and the New,
A land there is no other land may touch,
Where reigns a queen, in peace and honor true;
Stories or fables do describe no such.
Never did Atlas such a burden bear
As she, in holding up the world opprest,
Supplying with her virtue everywhere
Weakness of friends, errors of servants best.
No nation breeds a warmer blood for war,
And yet she calms them by her majesty.
No age hath ever wits refined so far,
And yet she calms them by her policy.
To her thy son must make his sacrifice,
If he will hav the morning of his eyes."

The words we hav italicized are paralleled with the following in the third part of "Henry VI." and "As You Like It:"

"Thou art no Atlas for so great a weight."
"Shall see thy virtues witness'd everywhere."

A multitude of other equally striking parallels are pointed out by Mr. Holmes between other parts of the Masque and other plays.

And here we note a few of the allusions in the plays to masques and revels:

"This harnessed masque, and unadvised revel."
—King John v, 2.

"With pomp, with triumph, and with reveling."
—Mid. N. Dream, i, 1.

"The king doth keep his revels here to-night."
"If you will patiently dance in our ronnd
And see our moonlight revels, go with us."
—Ibid ii, 1.

"A fortnight hold we this solemnity,
In nightly revels and new jollity." —Ibid v, 1.

These two plays, "Midsummer Night's Dream" and "King John," were written about this time.

Shakspere at 30 dedicates another poem, "Lucrece," to Southampton. There is no other evidence of their friendship. "Midsummer Night's Dream" has appeared. "Titus Andronicus," one of the earliest plays, is entered at the Stationers' Hall early in this year, and is said to hav been printed, but no copy is known to be extant dated prior to 1600; and important variations appear in the Folio of 1623, made certainly after 1611. The first sketch of the second part of "Henry VI.," under a different title, is printed in 1594, but without the name of the author, and perhaps surreptitiously (see 1588). The first sketch of "Taming of the Shrew" is also printed this year, but not in its complete form until 1623. After 1594 plays hav to be licensed and entered at the Stationers' before they can be printed. ANTIQUARY.

Dilemma, Eh?

Mr. Hill has a fine sense of humor; that is proven by his accusing me of "dodging"—and that, too, in such an extraordinarily straightforward article as was his!

No man who understands plain English, and desires to deal justly with an opponent, will ever accuse me of dodging an issue. Mr. Hill says that he asked me this question: "If the drunken stabbing of three innocent people upon the public street, as recently happened in this city, does not giv a just cause for legal protection against the rum-beverage traffic, what would?" If by "legal protection" Mr. Hill means prohibition, I answer, No. Perhaps he means the restraint of the criminals, in which case I answer, Yes. But it is utterly useless to try to reason with men who are so blind to facts and so impervious to reason as to argue that, because certain men, under the influence of a certain article of drink, commit crimes, therefore all men are to be forbidden the use of that article. Talk of "dodging!" In my reply to Mr. Hill I showed that there were other causes of crime which the people should be "legally protected" against, if Mr. Hill's theory of paternalism was to be honestly and impartially applied. Here is a man who shoots down his wife, her mother, and her sister, because he has become jealous of the former: If the cowardly shooting of "these three innocent people does not give a just cause for legal protection against" the love passion, what would? "Would twice three, or twenty times three, or one hundred times three, justify a Freethinker in appealing to law against the" passion "that was the direct cause of these dastardly outrages?" Mr. Hill knows that thousands of such crimes are committed, and in the mirror which I thus hold up before him he can "see himself as others see him."

In a word, the perversion of each of our faculties and appetites leads to the commission of crime, and there is but one effectual way in which crime can be stamped out, and that is by the complete extermination of the race. Here is where prohibition ends. Mr. Hill can by law secure the destruction of vice and crime, but the price will be a costly one. After he has nearly purified the race by killing all but himself, he can then commit physical, as he has already logical, suicide, and thus complete the job.

But while by despotism we cannot take even one step in the direction of that goal of earthly perfection of which we dream, we can advance slowly toward better conditions by traveling the road of education—education in its fullest, truest sense. Impress it upon your minds that there is no permanent benefit to be derived from any "reform" that denies liberty. Not one single victory has been won by man for man that did not enlarge the bounds of individual liberty. Despotism is destructiv, not constructiv. Tyranny pushes backward; liberty lifts forward.

This Was. This Is. This Shall Be.

Peroration of Colonel Ingersoll's Lecture, "Which Way." From the Investigator.

I look—In gloomy caves I see the sacred serpents coiled, waiting for their sacrificial prey. I see their open jaws, their restless tongues, their glittering eyes, their cruel fangs. I see them seize and crush, in many horrid folds, the helpless children given by superstitious fathers and mothers to appease the Serpent-God. I look again. I see temples wrought of stone, and gilded with barbaric gold. I see altars red with human blood. I see the solemn priests thrust knives in the white breasts of girls. I look again. I see other temples and other altars, where greedy flames devour the flesh and blood of babes. I see other temples, and other priests, and other altars dripping with the blood of oxen, lambs, and doves. I see other temples, and other priests, and other altars on which are sacrificed the liberties of man. I look—I see the cathedrals of God, the huts of peasants—the robes of kings, the rags of honest men. I see a world at war; the lovers of God are the destroyers of men. I see dungeons filled with the noblest and the best. I see exiles, wanderers, outcasts, millions of martyrs, widows, and orphans. I see the cunning instruments of torture, and hear again the shrieks, and sobs, and moans of millions dead. I see the prison's gloom, the fagot's flame. I see a world beneath the feet of priests—Liberty in chains; every virtue a crime; every crime a virtue; the white forehead of honor wearing the brand of shame; intelligence despised; stupidity sainted; hypocrisy crowned, and, bending above the earth, religion's night without a star. THIS WAS.

I look again, and in the East of Hope, the first pale light shed by the herald star givs promis of another dawn. I look, and from the ashes, blood, and tears, the countless heroes leap to bless the future and avenge the past. I see a world at war, and in the storm and chaos of the deadly strife, thrones crumble, altars fall, chains break, creeds change. The highest peaks are touched with holy light. The dawn has blossomed—it is day. I look. I see discoverers sailing mysterious seas. I see inventors cunningly enslave the blind forces of the world. Schools are built. Teachers slowly take the place of priests. Philosophers arise. Thinkers giv the world their wealth of brain, and lips grow rich with words of truth. THIS IS.

I look again. The popes, and priests, and kings are gone. The altars and the thrones hav mingled with the dust. The aristocracy of land and cloud hav perished from the earth and air. The gods are dead. A new religion sheds its glory on mankind. It is the gospel of this world, the religion of the body, the evangel of health and joy. I see a world at peace, where labor reaps its true reward—a world without prisons, without workhouses, without asylums; a world on which the gibbet's shadow does not fall; a world where the poor girl, trying to win bread with the needle—the needle that has been called "the asp for the breast of the poor"—is not driven to the desperate choice of crime or death, of suicide or shame. I see a world without the beggar's outstretched palm, the miser's heartless, stony stare, the piteous wail of want, the pallid face of crime, the livid lips of lies, the cruel eyes of scorn. I see a race without disease of flesh or brain, shapely and fair—the married harmony of form and function. And, as I look, Life lengthens, Joy deepens, Love intensifies, Fear dies—Liberty, at last, is God—Heaven is here. THIS SHALL BE.

A CORRESPONDENT of the London Telegraph with the Nile expedition has learned from a refugee how the Mahdi raises funds. From time to time he appears before his people, and says he has been commanded to part with all his goods; everything he possesses, in short, must go to the public treasury, or to the "Bait el Mal" (charity box). Proffers are made on all sides to save him from stripping his household, but all these he resolutely declines, saying, "The command is for me, not you." By and by their turn comes when the Mahdi says he has had a communication, from "El Hadra" that such a one is to giv all he has to the "Bait el Mal." They hav seen the prophet himself complying with these directions of the "Presence," and how dare any one else disobey? Accordingly, making a virtue of necessity, goods and slaves all find their way to the "charity box," otherwise the prophet's chest. All disputes about goods or betrothals the Mahdi quickly settles by appropriating the goods to the public treasury, and the women to his harem. He courts the poor and givs them free license to plunder, and snubs the sheiks.

A Tent for Summer Campaigning.

There is one scheme for propagating Freethought, proposed by the chairman of the executiv committee of the League, which should not be allowed to fall through. We refer to the purchase of a tent for use in towns where halls are difficult to obtain or the rent is too high to allow of more than one night's engagement. There are many reasons why a tent would be an invaluable aid to the League. In summer, people do not like to sit in close, hot halls, while they would like to hear a lecture delivered in almost open air. Then, again, in small towns there may be a dozen Liberals, who would help a lecturer, but are unwilling to take the responsibility of getting him to visit them, either because of the expense, or fearing that their Christian neighbors would retaliate by hurting their business. But if a worker like Mr. Reynolds should pitch his tent in the place and assume the responsibility for the whole affair, they would cheerfully aid him. With a tent a long stay can be made in places with comparativly little expense, and the people thoroughly aroused to the importance of forming Leagues and otherwise contributing to the spread of Freethought. The novelty of the scheme and the curiosity which fills the breast of the average human biped of either sex can be safely relied on to insure good audiences, and the eloquence, ability, and earnestness of any one of a half-dozen of our speakers we could name can just as surely be depended upon to insure good results. A hard worker with a tent could pay his way by private contributions, public collections, and by the sale of Freethought literature. And Mr. Reynolds is just the man to take charge of the experiment.

So certain are we that such a project would be a success, that if THE TRUTH SEEKER had any surplus funds Mr. Reynolds's plan should surely be tried. As it is, the best that can be done shall be done, and the League can call on the Truth Seeker Company for ten dollars cash and twenty-five dollars' worth of books and pamphlets to be sold for the benefit of the tent fund. If forty other people, forty times as able to do it as we are, will walk to the front, the League can go right on campaigning through the hottest weather with most beneficent results.

Fitting the Martyr's Crown.

Whether or not Heber Newton's head is aching for a martyr's crown, some of his brother Episcopalians seem determined he shall hav one. His sermon upon the dogmas of the trinity and original sin is to be the basis of a second presentment for heresy to his bishop, Mr. Potter. An Episcopal layman is said to be drafting the charges, and being called upon by a reporter of the Sun, he gleefully said that "the pressure which is being brought to bear upon Assistant-Bishop Potter is one to which in all probability he will be constrained to yield from a high sense of duty as the shepherd of an orthodox communion. We are urging him to take such a step, because we consider the question to be settled not a question of high church, or low church, or broad church, but whether the fundamental doctrin of our religion, which every shade of churchmanship holds in common, shall thus be openly assaulted, while the assaulter remains in a place which makes him appear as speaking by authority."

Mr. N. Quackenbos, the ecclesiastical lawyer, is inclined to be severe upon the bishop for not having ere this put a gag on Mr. Newton's mouth, or strangled him with bishoply edicts. In his judgment, "the responsibility for whatever has been brought upon the church by Mr. Newton's Infidel teachings rests solely upon the shoulders of the ecclesiastical authority for the diocese. When a bishop is consecrated, among other solemn vows he promises to be ready, with all faithful diligence, to banish and drive away from the church all erroneous and strange doctrin contrary to God's word."

The first section of the seventeenth canon of the diocese of New York is to the effect that

"Whenever, from public rumor or otherwise, the bishop shall hav reason to believe that any clergyman is under the imputation of having been guilty of any offense or misconduct for which he is liable to be tried, and that the interest of the church requires an investigation, it shall be his duty to appoint five persons, of whom three, at least, shall be presbyters, to examin the case, a majority of whom may make such examination, and if there is, in their opinion, sufficient ground for presentment, shall present the clergyman accordingly."

Mr. Quackenbos said that "public rumor" was sufficient ground for the bishop to act upon, and that he ought to hav paid attention to the previous presentment. Yet Mr. Newton, he lamented, "is permitted to go on Sunday after Sunday, and preach not simply 'erroneous and strange doctrin,' but unadulterated heresy, to the disgrace of the Episcopal pulpit and the reproach of the entire church. Had the bishop acted when the first presentment was made, Mr. Newton would hav been convicted and deposed from the ministry. But these charges were never acted upon. The former presentment still has vitality, and could be acted upon even at this late hour. But we do not propose to proceed under this old presentment. We hav a stronger case to-day. Mr. Newton's sermons are reported every Monday morning in the daily papers, and Christians and church-members stand aghast. I am credibly informed that the written reports of Mr. Newton's sermons are submitted to and approved by Mr. Newton himself before they are published. These sermons, as they appear in the papers, are therefore to be taken as authenticated reports of his utterances."

There is one thing Mr. Newton can congratulate himself upon—John Calvin is dead, and green-oak tribunals hav gone out of fashion.

The Bad Results of Revivals.

The Kearney, Neb., Courier tells of the suicide of another victim to Methodism. A young man named Eaker, whose home was near Auburn, this state, was visiting a college friend living in Divide township, Neb., for the purpose of prospecting, with a view to speculating in lands to some extent. His friends thought him a well-balanced and level-headed young fellow.

A "protracted meeting" of the Methodists had been going on for several days in the vicinity, and young Eaker took considerale interest in attending the services. One morning, at the close of family prayer, he acted morosely and had a look of despondency on his face. After breakfast he retired to his room, and, standing before a mirror, shot himself in the forehead.

There is, perhaps, no other religious sect in the world, certainly not in this country, which is responsible for so many suicides as Methodism. Its very nature is emotional; its devotees never reason; the preachers do not ask them to, being anxious mainly to convince "sinners" of the existence of heaven and hell, and of their own divine appointment as leaders to the one and from the other. A "conversion" in a Methodist "protracted meeting" has its base in the sentiment of fear, skilfully worked upon by the revivalist. When the "convert" has become thoroughly frightened, the preacher holds out the "promis of Jesus" to him who shall believe. Credulity is then the string played upon. If the convert has a large enough stock of credulity, he may believe the preacher, and become for the time happy in the thought that he is "saved." Then comes the reaction. If the convert has a spoonful of brains, doubts will intrude. The more nervous and intense the nature of the convert, the higher will be his so-called happiness over his "new birth," and the lower will be his mental depression when contending with the doubts that will occur to him. It is fortunate that these depressions usually end in what is called "backsliding," or the undertakers would be kept very busy after every "protracted meeting." But sometimes, as in the case of young Eaker, the deluded victim cannot recover the reason he has sacrificed on the altar of superstition, and, to end his doubts, takes his own life.

The blame for this must rest upon sectarianism. Catholics put their consciences in the keeping of the priests, and, after attending confession and performing such penances as the confessor directs, trouble themselvs no more with the matter. Calvinists do not believe in the hurrah style of conversion, complacently contending that all things are foreordained, and coolly reasoning themselvs into heaven and their opponents into the other place. If the premises of Calvinism were true, it would be a logical religion. But Methodism is different from these two sectarianisms. It will not allow the ministers to be sole guardians of the people's religious prospects, neither does it consider a cut-and-dried formula of creed sufficient for salvation. Every one must depend upon faith in the blood of Christ for his happiness hereafter, and must work out his salvation in fear and trembling. Every emotion in the human heart is appealed to. Fear of hell, hope of heaven, love of friends, hatred of "God's enemies," are all skilfully interwoven into the exhortations of the revivalists, and so easily moved are many people, that hundreds of emotional women are driven into hysterics and scores of nervous men to insanity. Suicide is the next step, if the overwrought brain is not relieved.

Some eight hundred and forty-two suicides occurred in this country last year, of which one hundred and fifty are attributed to insanity, and the causes of one hundred and eighty-five are unknown. Seven clergymen shuffled off this mortal coil of their own volition. Were they insane, and how many of their fellow-lunatics owed their loss of mind to religious excitement? The papers of this city in one week last summer recorded eight suicides of "insane" persons, and in six cases the cause of insanity was "religious excitement." If the same per centage continued through the tabulated "insane" and "unknown," the Christian church would hav some two hundred and fifty suicides to answer for; and of these Methodism must bear an enormous share.

Let a revivalist be a strong, positiv, magnetic person, an impassioned, fluent, and rhetorical speaker; let him hav the aid of solemn and voluptuous music, and the soil prepared for his working by years of unquestioning belief in the truth of Christianity; giv him, to operate upon, people prepared by these hereditary influences, and further giv him—as are usually found in revival meetings—men nervous, intense, negativ in character; women, emotional, passionate, perhaps hysterical through disease—and a good crop of converts can always be predicted. Under the same conditions they could be converted to Mohammedanism, or Mormonism, with equal ease. The "spirit" comes down to such assemblages, and "new births" are exceedingly frequent. But equally as certain is it that more or less insanity will be produced by the religious excitement; and upon how long the revivalist holds forth and how deep the converts are stirred will depend the number of suicides that may occur. Methodist "protracted meetings" hav the conditions we hav described, and in consequence lead to the greatest immorality. It is all as natural as rolling down hill. The "grace of God" which overcomes the converts is only a temporary suspension of circulation. The same feeling is observed when they fall in love.

"Religion," in its general or abstract sense, is an object of curiosity to the psychologist. A convert made at a Methodist protracted meeting is a subject for a doctor.

Was It the "Hand of God?"

An incident came to our knowledge last week which, if it had been reversed, is what our esteemed Christian contemporaries would call the mysterious work of God.

Some three or four months ago, a resident of Balton Spa, this state (we can giv all particulars, so our Christian friends may verify this miracle), was walking along the streets in Balston. Fluttering on the sidewalk he saw a printed sheet of paper, which some one had evidently dropped from around a small parcel. Being an observing and careful man, the citizen picked it up and thrust it into his pocket with the intention of looking it over when at leisure, which did not happen till he had returned to his home. After supper he bethought himself of the sheet, and drew it forth, brushed off the dirt, smoothed the wrinkles, and proceeded to read. Now, the gentleman was a good Methodist, and relied on the Bible as being strictly accurate. No doubt of its being the inspired word of God ever crossed his mind. But, not having heard of THE TRUTH SEEKER, the name at the top of the page he had picked up did not frighten him, and he read. Among other things, these two statements caught his eye:

"So David bought the threshing-floor and the oxen for fifty shekels of silver" (2 Sam. xxiv, 24).

"So David gave to Ornan for the place six hundred shekels of gold by weight" (1 Chron. xxi, 25).

"Mother," he said—he always called his wife "Mother"—"get the Bible. This TRUTH SEEKER must be wrong." So the big gilt-edged Bible, that cost sixteen dollars, was brought out, and the wife read while our friend followed the words along with his finger. No error there. "Mother," said the perplexed Methodist, "something's wrong." "Billy," replied his wife, "there is." "Mother, I don't want to hurt your feelings as a lady, a wife, and a mother, but one of these verses is a lie!" "Billy, that's so," she assented; "but before we make up our minds, you get a whole copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER and see." A son resident in this city was written to with instructions to find out the address of THE TRUTH SEEKER and procure a clean and complete copy. It was done. In their eagerness for knowledge upon religious subjects, our friend and his good wife sat up till three o'clock in the morning, and read the paper clear through. Then he bought Paine's works and Remsburg's "Bible Morals." The eyes of himself and wife were opened wide, and the Methodist church of Balston Spa has lost a whole family from its membership. He now considers himself to hav been foolish to pay sixteen dollars for a book that he does not like to hav his children read; which aversion was made plain to him in this wise: One evening he and his wife were sitting by the fire, and his eleven-year-old daughter lugged out the scriptures and opened them upon her little lap. Noticing the place, our friend signed to his wife to get the book away from the girl. Making an excuse to her daughter that she wanted her to do a little chore in the kitchen, the lady took the book, and the daughter left the room. Glancing at the open page, the mother blushed and hastily closed the book. It had been opened at the thirty-eighth chapter of Genesis.

We should like Dr. Buckley, editor of the Christian Advocate, and perhaps the ablest defender Methodism possesses in this country, to state how sacred a volume is that causes a mother to almost deceive her daughter to prevent her perusing it, and brings the shamed blood to her own cheek by a mere glance at it. And we should also like Dr. Buckley's honest opinion upon the providentialness of this man's picking up that scrap of paper in a Balston street.

Editorial Notes.

BY the official returns, the majority in Washington territory in favor of taxing church property is 3,661.

MR. BRADLAUGH was last week favored with a decision from the Court of Appeal sustaining his right to appeal from the adverse verdict of the Divisional Court. Since then, however, his appeal has been dismissed, and he must go to the House of Lords, which he some time ago announced he should do before giving up the struggle for Northampton's parliamentary rights.

IT will be seen from another page of this journal that Messrs. Watts and Putnam hav not only found out what to do, but they are doing it with all their might. They hav announced to start for their Western trip in April. Friends in those directions should send in their applications for lectures without delay. It will be the only visit these gentlemen can make to the West this year. Cannot a good opponent be found to meet Mr. Watts in discussion? He is both able and willing for an intellectual encounter.

WE see by the Investigator that petition in behalf of Atheist witnesses has been presented to the legislature of Massachusetts with 460 signatures. Another for taxing churches without exemption bore 956 names, of which 461 were collected in Newburyport by Mr. Raynal Dodge, who reports to Mr. Seaver that the opposition is very weak, and comes almost wholly from Roman Catholics and Episcopalians. He says, "If the case were left out to the people, I think there would be a vote of four to one in favor of this amendment here in Newburyport."

OUT of 629 persons more or less permanent residents of the Chester, Ill., penitentiary, only one avows Infidelity. On September 30, 1884, Chaplain Houts of that institution had in his congregation 245 worshipers, whose faiths were diversified as follows: Baptist, 49; Free Will Baptists, 3; Missionary Baptists, 6; Catholic, 77; Christian, 6; Church of England, 2; Congregational, 2; Episcopal, 5; Lutheran, 12; Evangelic, 3; Methodist, 55; Presbyterian, 18; Protestant, 1; Reform Church, 1; Swedish, 1; United Brethern, 3; Universalist, 1. When the editor of the Du Quoin Press called at the prison last May the warden informed him that he then had two preachers expiating their crimes. This fact was overlooked by Chaplain Houts in his report, doubtless because unworthy to dwell in the memory of so stern a lover of truth as Chaplain Houts professes to be in his abuse of the editor of the Press for making these facts public. But as Chaplain Houts was formerly a lawyer, and as he is sorry now that he ever compiled the religious statistics of his parish, he may be forgiven by his brother Methodists, fifty-five of whom are particularly easy to be reached by him.

CONDEMNING the employment of Freemasons in dedicating public structures, and particularly alluding to the Washington monument, the Detroit Evening News makes some general observations that are very sensible. "When these gentlemen," it says, "come out of their lodges into the light of day and presume to take possession of a public occasion and public ceremonial in which all are concerned, we submit that from being mysteriously ridiculous they become brazenly impudent—as impudent as any other sect or society which should presume to act for the whole American people. There are millions of American citizens who regard their mummeries as sacrilegious and impious; and other millions still who regard them merely as absurd. Inasmuch as they are religious in their nature they are sectarian, and all other sects hav a right to protest. Masonry is no more the established church of this republic than Roman Catholicism or Methodism, and should not be permitted to parade itself as the state religion on such public and state occasions as that in question. There was not so much offense in this sort of thing a few years ago, when the country was less populous, and when everybody of any consequence in the country was a member of a lodge; but now that we are a nation of 60,000,000, of all races, creeds, bloods, and colors, Masonry is by comparison a mere sect among the other sects, and must confine its operations to its own precincts. All public occasions should be purely secular in their ceremonial, and the public chaplains who open legislatures with prayers, and the grand worthies who lay cornerstones of public buildings, for which all sects pay, should all be retired."

BURNHAM WARDWELL, the friend of the convict, the pauper, and the insane, writes us this pathetic letter:

219 TREMONT ST., BOSTON, MASS. Jan. 23, 1885.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav just finished a year's confinement in a Massachusetts jail, on a criminal charge. I exposed the doings at Worcester county jail, and was sent to jail for so doing. I send you a slip cut from the Boston Star for Jan. 21st—my appeal for aid. I am now sick at the above-named address, 219 Tremont st., Boston. Mr. James brought me THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 17th inst., saying, "Here, read this; it will do you good." I did so; it has done me good—I can't stop to tell you; am not much of a writer, anyway (very poor when in bed, as I now am). The criminal libel against me was cruel, wicked, spiteful, unjust, and devilish.

But my intention now is to expose New England hypocrits as best I can. People are now looking after the truth as they never did before. Can you say a word in THE TRUTH SEEKER that will do me any good? Copy my appeal for aid on the slip from the Star, or say a word in your own way. If so, I pray you to do so.

I am having my naked photograph taken, and if you will notice me in any way, please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER to the above address, and I will send you, as soon as it is finished, my photograph, which I think you will pronounce a good Andersonville picture.

Please excuse this long and miserably-written letter. Notwithstanding it is written in bed and under other difficulties, it is not half I desire to say. It really appears as if THE TRUTH SEEKER was handed to me for a good, ever-wise purpose.

Yours hopefully, BURNHAM WARDWELL.

We hav often queried, when reading of Mr. Wardwell's humane effort, why he clung to the religion the upholders of which are his persecutors and the most prolific producers and worst enemies of the class he seeks to benefit, and perhaps a perusal of THE TRUTH SEEKER will open his eyes. We believe that he deserves aid from all lovers of humanity.

Remsburg in Nashville.

On Saturday evening, Jan. 24th, John E. Remsburg arrived in Nashville, Tenn., from the North. The Freethinkers of that city had engaged him to deliver a course of lectures, and had obtained the use of the court house for this purpose. The lectures were announced to begin at 10 A. M., Sunday. In the Banner of Saturday evening appeared the following communication from the clerk of the chancery court, a bigoted Catholic:

I find in this morning's issue of the American the following advertisment:

"John E. Remsburg, the celebrated Freethought lecturer, will deliver a course of lectures in the court house, commencing Sunday, at 10 o'clock A.M."

As an official occupying an office at the court house, and as a citizen, I desire to protest against the use of any part of the building for the purpose stated in the above announcement. I don't think that the citizens of Davidson county ever contemplated that their "temple of justice" should be used to disseminate the pretended beliefs of Ingersoll and his followers. Davidson county, in my opinion, has not yet reached a condition where she provides, at the expense of her citizens, free accommodations for lecturers of this character. This being true, the proper official of the court house should see that the "Ingersoll of the South" and his admirers should find another place to commune together and enlighten one another.

I don't like to protest publicly, but it is perhaps the proper remedy in the case. Yours, T. W. WRENNE.

On Sunday morning the American contained the following:

A BACK-SET FOR INGERSOLLISM.

Dr. John E. Remsburg, the Infidel lecturer, who styles himself "the Ingersoll of the South," is likely to meet with somewhat of a disappointment this morning. A few days ago, he went to the janitor of the court house, Mr. George Ford, and asked consent to be allowed to be allowed to deliver a lecture in the county court room, Sunday morning. The accommodating janitor, thinking that all was right, cheerfully acquiesced, and the promulgator of Freethought accordingly had himself billed for the date mentioned. Yesterday the first intimation of the Infidel theories of Dr. Remsburg came to Mr. Ford, and that officer of the county stated very decisivly that no Ingersollian should deliver a lecture in that court house on Sunday, and that the gentleman should be at once notified of the fact.

This was the first intimation that the speaker had that he would be refused the use of the hall. But Remsburg is a soldier in the army of Freethought who is a stranger to fear and who acknowledges no such thing as defeat. When Nashville was under military rule and is said to hav sheltered a mob of twenty thousand cutthroats, thieves, and harlots, though but a boy of seventeen, he was detailed by those who knew his pluck to serve on the United States police force here. This petty attempt to silence him only provoked a smile, and he declared that while they might close their doors against him they could not close his mouth, and that he would be heard. Accordingly, at the appointed hour he appeared upon the public square, and from the steps of the court honse, in a drizzling rain, spoke for an hour to an appreciativ audience—a prominent attorney pronouncing his discourse the most logical and convincing effort he had ever listened to in Nashville.

The bigots, thinking that they had successfully accomplished their work, were not expecting this coup d'etat, and were in a condition to offer no serious opposition. At the close of Mr. Remsburg's address a vote of thanks was tendered him for his courageous vindication of Freethought. Several members of the legislature and many of Nashville's best citizens were present, and denounced in bitter terms the unwarranted abuse of power on the part of the officials who closed the doors of a hall dedicated to justice and free speech. Mr. Theodore Seiferd, proprietor of the hall in the Collonade Building recently used as the Republican state headquarters, offered the use of the hall to Mr. Remsburg, who occupied it Sunday evening, delivering his now famous "Bible Morals" to an enthusiastic audience.

On Monday Olympic Theater, one of the largest theaters in the city, was procured, and the following bulletin issued:

Citizens of Nashvil'e: Yesterday morning the old Liberty Bell, which more than a century ago proclaimed Liberty throughout the land, passed through this city. At that very hour Liberty was being trampled in the mire by the minions of priestcraft. John E. Remsburg, an American orator, one whose voice has ever been raised in defense of Liberty, was insulted and opposed. Let every friend of Free Speech attend the Olympic Theatre to-night and rebuke this outrage.

One of the most intelligent audiences that ever greeted a speaker in Nashville assembled at this call. After announcing his mission, and referring to the unkind treatment received by himself and friends at the hands of the church, Mr. Remsburg proceeded to chastise this foe with his "False Claims." So well was it received that the Olympic was immediately secured and Mr. Remsburg prevailed upon to remain and deliver his lecture on "Thomas Paine" the following night.

Tuesday evening the rain came pouring down, but notwithstanding this, a good audience was in attendance, and listened with wrapt attention to Mr. Remsburg's vindication of the author-hero.

This has been the first meeting of the kind ever held in this part of the South, and the church has thrown every obstacle possible in its way. Even the press hav been controled by her. To the misrepresentations of the American quoted above, Mr. Remsburg sent the following card on Sunday, which appeared in the next issue:

To the American: I desire to correct a few errors which appeared in your paper this morning. I am referred to as "Dr. Remsburg." I hav not earned the title of doctor, and do not claim it. It is stated that I style myself the "Ingersoll of the South." This is untrue. I do not style myself an Ingersoll. This age has produced but one Ingersoll. It is also stated that a few days ago I "went to the janitor of the court house, Mr. George Ford, and asked consent to be allowed to deliver a lecture in the county court rooms." I did not arrive in your city until last night, and never met the person named. The hall in the court house is granted for meeting of almost every character. Knowing this, citizens and tax-payers of Nashville solicited and obtained permission to use it for a course of lectures to be delivered by me. They went to much trouble and expense in arranging for and advertising these lectures. At the last hour they are denied the use of the hall. Is this just?

Twenty years ago, in the service of the government, I helped to defend your city. To-day I visit it again, and its doors are closed in my face. But this exhibition of intolerance will do more than my humble words can do to aid the cause I represent. Your article is entitled, "A Backset for Ingersollism." You will ere long, I hope, be able to pen as its sequel, a "Backset for Bigotry." J. E. REMSBURG.

Among those who hav stood by Mr. Remsburg in his fight with bigotry here, the following deserve to be named: Senator Warren Smith, of Hardin Co.; Hon. Willis Idol, of East Tennessee, the youngest member of the legislature; Hon. John Ruhm, and Dr. J. E. Binns, members of the House from Nashville; B. O. Westerfield, of Franklin; W. S. Matthews, Ferdinand Pfister, L. Lille, T. B. Fisher, Capt. C. G. Cabler, W. H. Graham, Dr. Bloomstein, James N. Ramsey, Mr. Davis, Judge Lawrence, Mrs. Hann, Col. Akers, Henry Lincks, W. T. Orton, Col. Claiborne, Dr. Weise, Heber F. X. Clohiesa. Mr. Wolfe, Wm. Rich, Mr. Nelson, A. W. Butler, of Edgefield, and last, but not least, W. S. Bailey, the veteran editor of the Liberal.

On Monday Mr. Remsburg was taken to the State House and presented to members of the legislature. Several members and many prominent citizens called on him at his hotel. He has the satisfaction of knowing that while the ignorant dupes of superstition are against him, the intelligent people of the South are with him. T. C. E.

OAKLAND, CAL., Jan. 2, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5. Please credit me with $3 on subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and send me a copy of Remsburg's "Bible Morals," and apply the balance to the Campaign Fund.

I hav a number of papers, but when THE TRUTH SEEKER comes they all hav to stand aside until I hav read that from beginning to end.

I feel particularly interested in the report of the progress of Freethought in Ontario, having spent ten years of my life in that country, and knowing something of the religious intolerance of the people generally. I wonder if those apostles of religious freedom, Wakeman, Watts, Remsburg, and Putnam will ever get out to this coast. No doubt there are plenty of Freethinkers here, but if there is any organization of them in this city of about 40,000 inhabitants and, I believe, 16 churches, I hav failed to hear of it. The thorough organization of the churches, coupled with the social relations enjoyed by the members, is what givs them their influence, and the Secularists will never be regarded as an influential body of citizens until they form similar organizations for social enjoyment and mental and moral improvement. Can you explain why it is that as a rule as soon as one gets his eyes open to the untruths of the orthodox religions he feels a disposition to stand aloof from association with others of his kind, and contracts a sort of selfish, go-it-alone disposition, instead of ceing inspired with some of the zeal manifested by religious converts in the promulgation of their peculiar views? The question naturally arises, If Freethinkers do not, and will not, organize and do something for the promulgation of the truths of the "new gospel," and unite in other good works that can only be made effectiv by organized and philanthropic enthusiasm, and which occupy the attention of the churches to a considerable extent, shall we not be more benefited by associating ourselvs with the churches, without necessarily adopting their peculiar views, and sharing the advantages our families will derive from the social relations, and doing our share toward any good works they may hav in hand? You know the churches are always ready to receive us so long as we pay our pew rent regularly, and make liberal donations to the contribution-box, and treat us well. I fully believe there are as many charitable-minded Liberals as there are religionists, but single-handed philanthropy can never take the place of associated effort, and although my business has required me to travel a great deal, I hav seldom found any regular association of Liberals laboring together for the truth and the benefit of mankind. There seems to be no adhesivness among them, or central idea round which they can and do rally. It may be that time will remedy all this, but my reading of history teaches me that all other religious reformers hav been more closely cemented together the weaker and more persecuted they were, and their converts were zealous and faithful to their peculiar ideas, often even to the extent of martyrdom. I wish some one who has given some thought to this subject would try and explain why there is so little of this same spirit manifested by Liberals.

WESTFIELD, N. Y., Jan. 11, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Previous to the time Man was merged in THE TRUTH SEEKER, its editors said it existed to giv all sides a hearing. In a correspondence with Mrs. Dr. Severance, its senior editor, T. B. Wakeman, said that he found the law of correlation the bottom law of science, that he found no break in that law, and that the greater part of the scientific world hav come to the same conclusion. As I differ with both the religion and science of the day on elementary principles, I asked if interchange does not underlie all existence, including the bottom law of science. But although told that Man existed to giv all sides a hearing, the question was not only suppressed, but the statement that Man existed to giv all sides a hearing was withdrawn from a number of issues previous to being merged in THE TRUTH SEEKER. As the question of interchange vs. supremacy is of too much consequence to be kept in the background in this day of contention and strife, please allow me to ask and hope some of your contributors will answer why the same interchanging relations that exist between the roots and tops of all vegetables, each hid from the other, are not a universal law to which all grades of being from lowest to highest are alike subject, or, in other words, why so-called spirit and matter are not positiv and negativ conditions of one and the same thing, inseparable and convertible, and bearing the same relation to each other, as heat and cold, night and day, summer and winter, etc.

SOLDIERS' HOME, WIS., Jan. 10, 285.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $3 to pay for my paper up to Nov. 12, 285. It seems but a trifle, but when we come to raise it, it reminds me of the immortal Burns, who declared that,

"He that does the utmost that he can,
Will wyles do mare."

And so you can easily see if all our friends would observe this superhuman adage of the greatest poet living or dead, none would be without the best paper published on this green orb, the great TRUTH SEEKER; and few, if any, would be in arrears I hav been no stranger to THE TRUTH SEEKER, for the last ten years at least, nearly since its birth. Many years ago I lived in Arkansas, at that time, if not still, the most illiterate state in the Union. Bigotry, superstition, religion, and ignorance ran wild. "The woods were full of them." A man with any sense at all was not safe to talk much. Although I was Infidel for all the term was worth, yet I was not fully enlightened. I was twenty miles from any post-office, and had nothing but the Bible to read, and you may bet I made good use of it. While in this fix, going it blind, as it were, lo and behold, I received four TRUTH SEEKERS, and shortly after six more. Our brother, John H. Haslam, one of the very oldest subscribers then, living more than forty miles away, had heard of me, and in the goodness of his heart armed me with a weapon most formidable, with which I fought those godly idiots with all my power. Sometimes I would be compelled to leave one neighborhood for another, but always left an impression in the mind of the youth. It is a singular fact that I never could make an impression upon a negro. In one of my TRUTH SEEKERS I found Bennett's description of the flood according to the Bible. I learned it thoroughly, word for word, and on all occasions wherever I met a crowd of fanatics I would address them like an orator (using Bennett's language, of course). Many times I hav riddled their flood story till it wouldn't hold "black Jack Brush," much less all that imaginary water. I always succeeded with a crowd of young fellows, if there were no old soreheads about. I generally took them single-handed. I never saw Haslam to know him, though I shall never forget him. He was most certainly the origin of my usefulness.

Now, my dear Mac, I hav given up the Mexican Pension bill, and turned my attention to the beautiful art of sawing wood. Yes, I am an artist Can clear over fifteen cents a day. Some of my friends here declare it is low, menial labor. If so, why should the greatest American poet that ever had an existence, the immortal John G. Saxe, laud the art of wood-sawing to the very skies if it were not honorable? He sang thusly:

"In his office sat a lawyer,
On the street stood a sawyer;
On the lawyer's anxious face
You could read a knotty case
Kneading law.
While the sawyer, gaunt and grim,*
On a rough and knotty limb,
Ran a saw.

This conclusion then I draw,
That no exercise of jaw,
Twisting india-rubber law
Is as good
As the exercise of paw,
On the handle of a saw,
Sawing wood."

It may seem strange to you that I don't get some subscribers for our paper, but if you were here it wouldn't seem so. The fact is, they are not all artists like your humble servant, and prefer spending their money for strong drink or whatsoever their hearts lusteth after, according to the commands of their God. Yours as usual, NELSON HUNT.

*That's me.

DETROIT, Jan. 15, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Will you please allow me to say a few words to friend J. G. Malcolm? Mr. Malcolm has written an article on "Money," and says that in '79 we had $683,943,799 of paper money. Why does Mr. Malcolm take '79 as a starting-point in paper money? Why not go back to '65, when there was in circulation about $200,000,000 of paper money—real money, not bankers' debts, as was the paper reckoned by him in 1879? Also, in '65 there was no money in the Southern states until the robber bankers sent their carpet-bagger agent there with carpet-bags full of their debts to loan as money upon the real estate of those who had lost their chattel slaves that had before the war been their usual collateral security. So that in '65 there was over $50.50 for each inhabitant of the country, though but little more than one-half of the country had the use of any of it. I think Mr. Malcolm makes a mistake in saying that money has no value, but represents value, much as x represents the unknown quantity in the algebraic problem. If this is true, then the carpenter's rule has no fixed quantity or distance, but is only imaginary; and pound weights and bushels and quart measures contain only fictitious quantities. If the government will issue real money sufficient to do all business on a cash principle, so as to hav no debt or interest, the value of money will appear as truly fixed as the yard measure and foot rule, and crime and misery would pass away. But so long as bankers and money-lenders are allowed to hav the control of the amount of money that is in use, and to put the value upon any kind of money, and to make the amount so small as to compel people to borrow their debts over and over, until much of their bills may be drawing three to five hundred per cent interest, and thus make money so scarce and the want so great that one man will kill another for five cents, just so long there can be no fixed value in money. Interest is eating away the life of this nation at a fearful rate. The whole business of the country has turned to gambling. There never was a nation so foolishly sold into slavery as was this people when they allowed their own money to be destroyed—$1,800,000,000—on purpose to make a want so great that national bankers could lend their debts and get rich on the interest of what they owe. And the only way possible to hav a money that cannot be changed in value by money-lenders is to hav money issued by the government sufficient to keep all debts paid every day, and hav no need of borrowing.

MAYNARDSVILLE, TENN., Jan. 5, 285.

MR. EDITOR: You say my subscription, on account of Man, to THE TRUTH SEEKER has expired, and if the paper suits me you would like to place my name on your regular list. Place it there and continue THE TRUTH SEEKER until I order it stopped—and this I will not do so long as THE TRUTH SEEKER continues to be what it is now, or I become disabled to pay for it. THE TRUTH SEEKER suits me better than any Liberal paper I hav yet seen. If the air it ventilates does not suit any intelligent mind, it is because it does not blow hard enough to carry away the mists of fog and vapor that surround them.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is doing a great missionary work for Liberalism, and wherever it goes it is bound to make Liberals, even out of Christians, for there are so many ready to let loose and search for something better, and I am sure that is Liberalism in any shape. I am a Materialist, therefore hav nothing to do with the Gods, devils, hells, and their revelations. I make corn, wheat, and potatoes without them, and do not call on any of these imaginations, as Christian Gods, for their help. I am the only Infidel in this vicinity that I know of, and these Christian hell-believers are astonished at how my crops grow for me as theirs do for them, after my talking about their God and Bible as I do.

I tell them matter and her productions through force are all that I know anything about, and if they know anything beyond or outside, to tell it. This they can't do. The idea of a personal God, or God at all, before matter existed, is simply absurd, there being no plea for his existence. The idea of a God in a big rocking-chair, and nothing to rock on, is purely absurd.

I herewith send you $2. Send me Ingersoll's lecture on "Orthodoxy," and THE TRUTH SEEKER for the remainder; also your catalog.

I will try to get some new subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but this will be hard to do in this orthodox place. I hav asked several of them whether they would read THE TRUTH SEEKER if I would loan it to them, or order a specimen copy to them, and they say, "Don't order it, for I don't want it in my family." Is there no way to fool them, in order to get a ray of light into their dark, ignorant minds? Liberalism would drive every drop of orthodox bile from their system, renovating it anew, if they didn't know the medicin they were taking.

T. H. BUTCHER.

BOSTON, MASS., Dec. 20, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I sincerely pity my old professional and prejudiced brother, Dr. Winter, Cincinnati, Ohio. I know that he feels bad; I did when I was in a position similar to his. I was born and brought up a Quaker; circumstances separated me from them, and I found myself surrounded by Methodists, and joined that class. Here my reasoning powers began to work, so that I came out a modern Universalist, and went to hear Abner Kneeland, and went with him into Atheism, Infidelity, and Materialism.

Here I saw the folly of condemning what I knew nothing of, and made a pledge to never again condemn what I knew nothing of, so that I began to honestly reflect, and said to myself that Nature was my god, that I had no perception of anything above Nature, and as I was a student of Nature, that I would use a little space in nature, and see what I could work up.

From the mineral ultimates the vegetable; from the vegetable, the animal; and the human, or rather the humane, is the highest development of the animal species.

"What?" I said; "the great power folded up its arms, nothing more to occupy its mind and forces, after the development of puny man? It don't look reasonable."

Using the human anatomy as my text, I went back, and said: "From the mineral ultimates life. In the vegetable is our first perception of life. From the vegetable sensation, animal instinct, human intelligence. What? this great power folded up its hands? It don't look reasonable." I went back again, and saw that the mineral had no perception of its ultimation into the vegetable, the vegetable into animal, the animal into human. Poor ignorant, stupid, and superstitious human beings hav just as little perception into a higher plane of life.

That mode of reasoning convinced me that these ultimates were perpetual—are one, forever one; that nature never makes any mistakes, never creates any demand without the means of supply; never a want without the means of supplying that want.

Hence, from that time (four years before the "Rochester knockings") I was looking, watching, and listening for some demonstration of a higher plane of life.

Since, when I see in the secular press accounts of strange sounds in the Fox family, over in Hydesville, N. Y., I then in old Concord, Mass., I remembered my pledge to not condemn without proof.

I went there, and found the Fox family. There, among all strangers, by calling the alphabet, mentally, and promiscuously, was spelled out, in answer to the question in my mind, "Who? if there is a spirit here, who is it?" "Thy mother." All done by those electric sounds which hav bid defiance to the literary world. Prove that they are not what they claim to be.

Since that, I hav not had a doubt but that, then and there, I did correspond with my mother, and since then she has manifested herself in every way that she ever did while in the body, even to that of materializing herself and sitting in my lap and hugging and kissing me just as positivly as she ever did. And not only her, but hundreds of others of my old acquaintances and friends.

And I want to say to my old prejudiced and vituperous friend, that before he can be useful in his profession he must learn that there is no end to life; that it is an eternal principle; that it is only the bodies that die, or decompose; and that when he has seen, felt, and experienced what I hav, he will be a much happier, wiser, and more useful man, and will cease making a fool of himself, and will quit insulting people that he don't know anything about, and will cease to believe and begin to know something.

And, Mr. Editor, I will send with this writing my printed challenges, and other documents, and you need not fear to publish them, or any part of them you may think best. I shall also send them to Brother Dr. Winter. And shall also inclose with this $3 for my next year's TRUTH SEEKER.

I want very much to see you, and dear old Mrs. Bennett. I am in my seventy-eighth year, growing old, infirm—and some will say, I suppose, demented. N. H. DILLINGAAM, M.D.

GOLDSBERRY, Mo., Jan. 10, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: In your note to my letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 20th, you say it would be unjust in me to stop my paper because things are published therein that are contrary to my views. Now, I am not going to stop my paper, unless money gets very scarce; and I fear you did not get the right spirit, or meaning, of my language. I only said if I knew you indorsed—and, I should hav added, advocated—certain things, I should refuse to read it any longer. I consider THE TRUTH SEEKER a great and useful journal. I should feel lost without it, because it comes to me each week as a kind friend laden with many rich presents. I wish it could go to many households over which the shadow of the church hangs like a pall, with its rays of brilliant light, and rout all the phantoms of superstitions, that all might enjoy that mental freedom without which the world can never advance. I hope to see some of the work that is now before the Liberals of this country accomplished ere another year rolls around. P. J. BURTON.

PLYMOUTH, MINN., Jan. 15, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: In answer to Mr. Somerby's call, I hav sent what I certainly owe. I would pay you also for necessary troubles, but you hav got to let me off with what you hav got. It is not necessary for me to excuse myself, since you know that the times occupy man's brain and means for needed life requisitions; you will, therefore, readily forgiv. I don't think you can fail on account of "old" subscribers, since I believe that, by force of such principles as the founder, yourself, and some contributors of THE TRUTH SEEKER advocate, failure can not be feared. Still, every one should be prompt, but it is this wherein I failed. Fear of "want" prevented me last spring from giving the last dollar in my possession. My little crop was fair, but in market nearly worthless; and the fate of that which I would not sell for the current prices last fall will probably be the same in spring.

Since it is that I commenced farming but a few years ago, and alone at that, and as I need a hundred and one things before I can say, This will barely do to liv comfortably; for I hav not even a comfortable shanty, since the one I hav the wind blows through and chills me while I write these lines, and that is tough for Minnesota—in view of all this, I must accustom myself to the absence of THE TRUTH SEEKER—which, of course, got to be dear to me—for at least a year, hoping that at the expiration of which I shall be able to subscribe and pay for it again, for it has been a tax on my mind to use your generosity under the circumstances of last year.

A word as to the so-called hard times. They are generally attributed to government and commercial causes; the latter hav more to do with it than the former, so far as greed is concerned, but the main causes are ignorance of economy, intemperance, extravagance, and dishonesty in the individual. Under a Democratic government like ours they will, and must, often come, even for the benefit of progress; they are more regretted by the rich and greedy than by the poor. They are harmless. The prudent, and others, hav to learn by bitter experience to save in time to hav in want; otherwise, it would take a communistic, or family government, to manage all our affairs.

Yours for justice, MAX BRIGGS.

BISHOP CREEK, CAL., Jan. 3, 285.

MR. EDITOR: As it is a good plan to compare thoughts and theories in this corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I wish to present a paragraph from a letter recently received from "Elmina." She says: "I don't think justice has anything to do with the laws of the universe; I reject all gods and, consequently, all design, and, if there is no design in nature, there is no justice or injustice. To base proof of a life to come upon compensation for sufferings here, is all lost philosophy. Nature is neither just nor unjust; all is governed by law."

Now, this is contrary to all teachings heretofore upon this subject, but it does not establish or overthrow any truth. To me it seems that the laws governing the universe must hav justice, including compensation, in order to be laws at all; at least, to bring order out of chaos, and to produce the harmonious development of worlds and their inhabitants.

But it would take more knowledge than I possess to prove or disprove the theory of design, or from whence, why, and whither life's origin or destiny. This fragment of time is full enough of mystery to keep us busily thinking and investigating while we liv; and the deepest philosophers hav only theorized upon this greatest of all problems. I leave the elucidations to others.

Again, she says: "The day of miracles is over." If there ever was a miracle performed, then the same laws and conditions could produce the like to-day; since the operations of cause and effect are forever the same. Greater miracles, so-called, are produced by occultism than any narrated in the Bible, if we are to believe the writers on this science, as they claim it to be. From what I hav seen of Spiritual phenomena, I think many of these things might be explained by the learned adepts of occultism. It is time that this long-hidden light should shine out from the secret crypts of its temples. In my mind's effort to reconcile the amount and preponderance of evil in this world of ours, I hav thought it might be that this little globe has been made a theater, whereon the effects of wrong-doing, and the various experiments of life, should be enacted for the benefit of other worlds whose ambitious Lucifers might hav a desire to rebel and raise war in their too harmonious states, and to see what would be the result. A peep now and then upon the wars and into the vile dens and dungeons of earth, and tracing the causes of crime and misery to the violation of nature's laws, might hav the effect to quell their ambitious projects, and arouse their pity for us poor mundane actors of tragedy for their benefit. We must look upon the whole universe as a unit, if we are to ever solve the great problem of life and its eternal duration.

LUNA HUTCHINSON.

FARMINGTON, O., Jan. 11, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I agree with you that the citation of facts by Spiritualists has little effect upon Materialists; and it is not for the benefit of the Thomas Winter stripe of men that I write. I am an old man; hav been through the church, into Materialism, and would be there now but for the proofs I hav received of the communication of spirits with mortals.

I am free to admit that Materialists are, as rule, good men—far above Christians, and, perhaps, Spiritualists; but because a few are naturally strong and self-poised—better by nature than others are by grace—it does not follow that these do not need the grace to be as good as they are. The masses will hav a faith (if not a knowledge) reaching within the veil. Spiritualism is, and is to be, that knowledge, as I firmly believe. The time has not come for Ingersoll and Watts to see that light—they are reaching more minds where they are; but it was in the true order for Chainey to be a Spiritualist. Do not worry, brethren; God, or spirits, or evolution will take care of all these things. It is for those who will hav a home "over there" that I write; they are legion, and will be more in spite of your philosophy.

On New Year's day we laid in the grave the mortal part of our dear old mother, aged eighty-seven years. She was a Methodist most of her life, though not a bigot, and enjoyed my talk about spiritual things.

Ten years ago her youngest daughter died, leaving a husband and one child; three years after the child died. Time went on, and it came to be whispered that this bereaved husband and father was drinking. Mother knew nothing of this. What I now relate she told me not long prior to her death.

She had retired to her bed, but not to sleep, as she knew, when she saw this daughter standing by her bed-side; she asserted the above fact in regard to her husband, to the great surprise of mother, and asked her to say to E—— that M—— came to her and asked her to say to E—— that his wife, M——, came to mother to ask his pledge that he would stop drinking. Mother said, "M——, I can't do that errand; E—— is not in our family now; I can't tell him that." But M—— would not be put off; she said if mother would do the errand E—— would make the promis, and he would keep it. Mother then promised to do the errand, which she did, and E—— gave his pledge, and has kept it. Do you say "a dream?" But you could not make mother believe it. Why should she dream of things of which she had no knowledge or thought? And there was a grand purpose in this spirit-visit, which was accomplished.

The querist will ask, "Why not a heavenly-visitant for the thousands of other like cases?" I answer, there is; but the conditions don't exist for so palpable a manifestation. In most cases the door is closed by our positiv state of negation, by ignorance and fear. But the spirit world is rapidly getting nearer to earth; and I hav evidence that the wise and good men and women that hav lived on earth are powerful auxiliaries in the grand Liberalizing and Secularizing movement in which we are engaged.

With a word of appeal, I close this. I ask Spiritualists and Materialists not to be dogmatical—it is a weakness. None of us know so much as to justify mere assertion. On one thing we are agreed: the manifest desire and intent of the Christian church to subvert the liberties of the people, "for Christ's sake," must be checked. We, the people, hav a sake of our own to look after; and especially now, when dishonest priests and thieving politicians hav brought millions of the people to starvation.

O beautiful religion! O beautiful government! Lambs, truly! Statesmen, truly! Here is common ground for work on which all true Liberals can stand. If any love their creed better than their kind, they not true Librrals. Priestcraft and statecraft must be throttled; this is our work.

E. F. CURTIS.

BURR OAK, MICH., Jan. 10, 285.

MR. EDITOR: I did not intend to touch upon either Spiritualism or Materialism for some time, but some of the letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 3d seem to require a few words of comment. I do not now write to prove or disprove anything, but chiefly to insist that Spiritualists shall remain on their own ground. There is an evident determination on their part to assume the truth of their hypotheses, and throw the burden of proof on their opponents. I once heard a Methodist preacher say, when preaching on the inspiration of the Bible: "This book is said to be the word of God. Let any one prove that it is not, if they can. They can't do it," etc. If I had been given the privilege of replying, I should hav said: "Yes, it is said to be the word of God, but there was a time when there was no Bible, and it could not hav been called the word of God then, hence there must hav been a time when it began to be called the word of God; therefore it devolved on those who first made for it the claim of divine authorship, and on all who hav continued to reassert that claim, to prove that the book is the word of God. It is not for others to prove a negativ." So it is with modern Spiritualism. There is neither logic nor common sense in taking the opposit ground, declaring their position to be established, and requiring unbelievers to prove the contrary or admit the truth of their claims. An infinit number of unreasonable propositions may be set forth, not one of which it may be possible to disprove. I may assert that there is a boiling spring at the North Pole. No one can prove that there is not, neither is anybody required to believe that there is such a thing, because its non-existence cannot be proved. Brother Kingsley says: "The eternal difference between Spiritualism and Materialism is, Spiritualism givs proof, while Materialism givs assertions as follows: 'Faith,' and 'feeling.'" There was nothing more amusing than that in all the "ironical" utterances of the late Artemus Ward. Some of the remarks of Mr. Kingsley, and others, show that there is a pressing necessity for some competent Materialist to come forward at once, and define Materialism. If Mr. Kingsley is right, and "Materialism givs simple assertions, negations, and annihilations," there is a vast ocean of ignorance on this subject that needs drying up. I had an idea that this material universe is a hard fact which is believed in by all living men, without regard to race, color, or previous degree of insanity. I thought that the aforesaid hard fact was the foundation of Materialism, and that the Materialist simply confined his knowledge to things which are absolutely known to be material, and the laws which pertain to them. A denial that spirit existence has been proved is no part of Materialism. It is a refusal to accept another ism without wholly different proofs from any that hav been offered. Mr. Kingsley, as usual, again goes on about his "glorious" teachings, and winds up with the question: "Does Materialism make one happy in time or in eternity?" Doubtless other replies will be given, but my reply is that his question has nothing whatever to do with the truth of either Spiritualism of Materialism, and, furthermore, that the seeker for truth and knowledge has no just right to consider the question whether his discoveries will bring happiness or not. He who pursues happiness alone will not find truth. To be more direct, I must say that I am personally acquainted with quite a number of good Spiritualists, and about an equal number of Materialists, and, so far as appearances go, the latter enjoy life as well as people of any sect that can be found. As to the eternity part of the question, I withhold decision for the present. In plain words, I don't know; and, notwithstanding all the glorious teachings, I utterly fail to believe that Mr. Kingsley knows any more about it than I do. On the following page of the aforesaid issue was a letter signed, "Dr. Geo. Hardcastle," that was a genuin curiosity. Truly, the sublime and the ridiculous are often in very close proximity. The first half of that letter is excellent, suggesting, as it does, a way to increase the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER, but the second half is the veriest bosh that has been in print for some time. The doctor says, speaking of Anti-Spiritists: "They are the positivly truly credulous on a negativ." I am shocked to hear of such iniquity. What would such persons be on roller-skates? It is horrible. Probably Comstock will soon put an end to their career. Why was not this negativ set out so that we could all hav a look at it? And he says: "They hav not the remotest idea of fairness in the proof or disproof of facts. The great lights of earthism (whatever that may be), almost to a man, fail to admit the facts of Spiritism, showing, therefore, to be either ignorant, cowardly, or dishonest." Isn't that sublime cheek? If any one can produce a specimen of stupendous assumption to surpass that, let him do so at once. The man who does not believe everything that the doctor and some others believe, is necessarily either ignorant, cowardly, or dishonest. And this writer accuses people of having "not the remotest idea of fairness!" But perhaps it is all right, for nothing very good could be expected of great lights of earthism. The demonstration of a scientific fact does not depend on fairness or unfairness. It is wholly independent of opinions. A man who writes "Dr." before his name must surely hav noticed the difference in this respect between established scientific facts and the so-called facts of Spiritualism. Of course the parenthesis in the above quotation did not appear in the original. The remainder of the letter is composed of some rubbish about "one world at a time," and is too pueril for comment. Any reading man or woman who does not now know what is meant by the well-worn phrase, "One world at a time," could not understand an explanation of it. But if any "old-time" or new-time Spiritualists are amused by the "scoring" which the doctor mentions, I am very glad, and I am quite willing to overlook some of their vagaries and wild statements, in view of their good-will towards the League and Liberalism generally. EAU CLAIRE, WIS., Jan. 6, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: In reading the communication of C. Close about future punishment I find Christians praised for their benevolent institutions and Infidels inferentially criticised for not having so many. I demur. It is the unanimous testimony not only of political economists, but of Christian philanthropists who hav spent their lives among the poor and ignorant classes trying to improve their condition, that these institutions are the great obstacle to any such improvement and the efficient cause of pauperism. I do not overlook the effect of social injustice. Under the ancient civilizations there was plenty of that, but there was no pauper class until about the time of Cæsar, and then only in great cities like Rome. It was Christian benevolence which diffused this dreadful curse through fhe rural districts of Europe. Far from correcting the injustice, the palliativ influence of Christian charity made it in a measure tolerable, and by making its victims content with dependence impeded, as it still does, the work of agitation for reform. No one who has specially studied the history of the Dark Ages, as I hav, can doubt that this was one reason why the emperors eventually came to regard the church as a natural ally of their system. I do not doubt the purity of the motivs which impelled the Christians to almsgiving. But, like everything which their fanaticism touched, it was run into the ground. Among the pagans beggars were relieved as often as judicious; but giving to the poor was not made a cover for the multitude of sins, nor consequently a cause of idleness, vice, and contented slavery. The right way to practice philanthropy is to labor for the suppression of monopolies, which would make charity unnecessary. Until this can be effected, it is well enough to organize such benevolent enterprises as insurance, the education of orphans, the protection of aged and disabled persons, etc., provided that these enterprises are put upon a co-operativ basis, exacting from each member some return for what he gets. If they propose only to relieve suffering, without teaching justice and industry, they do mischief. When we reflect on what a dreadful thing pauperism is, we may well doubt whether Christians hav done most harm by "burning the bodies" of Infidels or "giving their goods to feed the poor." C. L. JAMES.

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 13, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: The account of J. E. Remsburg's lecture in our city, published in your last issue, contains so many errors that I feel prompted to write. The hall occupied is known as Memorial Hall, although the entrance is the same as Hancock Hall, where we hold the regular meetings of our League. The chief point gained by the correction is that the hall occupied, seats six hundred people, and the other two hundred and fifty. The larger hall was so full that extra seats had to be brought in. The lecture gave universal satisfaction, but no secretary of a Bible society put in an appearance, and should they wish victims they can find them every Sunday at our hall; although we admit that it would be more scriptural to "go for the stranger within the gates." The "Rev. Dr. Westbrook" was none other than our Liberal friend so well known in New York, Judge Westbrook. How he will relish being called a "D.D." I know not; but then, a rose by any other name would be as sweet.

Friend Remsburg's impeachment of the Bible is certainly just, and we only wish the jury of the whole American people might become familar with his bill of particulars, in which case many copies of the "Holy Book" would find their way to the old junk dealer, and human progress would be greatly accelerated. Respectfully, E. M. LESTER.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Paul and Hilda.

Only a Norse-boy, white and small—
How the wild wind tossed his yellow hair!
We call him Paul, our Jansen Paul,
He charmed us so with his graceful air.

His home, a cottage by the wood,
Had simple flowers about the door,
And dusky bees in the solitude
That sang to him of the Norseland shore.

The door-yard fence a woven wall,
From the hazel thicket's tangled deep,
Where Hilda and Paul, our Jansen Paul,
Found bluebells in a dreamless sleep.

Wild strawberries lit their crimson cones,
Each drooping stem a burning bush;
The crow-foot rolled her thousand zones
Like stars around the brooding thrush.

Dapple-Gray in the straw-roofed shed,
Where Hilda played when her task was done;
Had chains of flowers upon his head,
Bright with the dews and morning sun.

They often called in a treble tone,
And "Hilda! Hilda!" a double bass,
But Hilda and Gray in the shed alone
Had a light of joy on either face.

Sheep and cows in the meadow lot,
That Hilda and Paul had tended well;
I'd hav you see, if so you've not
The grace from the land where the Vikings fell;

That older land whence the Sagas came,
And though our Paul, our Jansen Paul,
And Hilda bore both toil and blame,
An inborn grace was over it all.

A charm from the shores whose Eddas dim,
And treasured tomes are filled with song—
Song wild and sweet ere the cradle hymn,
Of these new hills had swept along.

A nameless something seen in dreams,
Though Hilda's gown was a world too small,
And made us forget the fraying seams,
And the ragged coat of Jansen Paul.

Clearwater, Neb. MARY BAIRD-FINCH.

The above is true as regards Hilda and the charming manners of the children of many of the Swedish people, who are, as a rule, so polite that they hav been styled the "Frenchmen of the North." Since writing the above I thought of another poem for the Corner which is also true of the prairie-dog, the rattle-snake, and a snow-white owl, that is to be found in all towns of the prairie-dog—and he is only a dog so far as the bark is concerned; otherwise he is a species of gopher. The three strange companions make as queer a trinity as has been found in any part of the world. [This story of the Trinity will appear next week.—ED. C. C.] I hav still another little story that would perhaps interest the children, but I fear it is too long, covering more than eight pages of foolscap. It is a poetical rendering of a night of horror endured by a woman I well knew, who had lost her way on an Illinois prairie, and was overtaken by a fierce pack of timber-wolves just as night came on; but fortunately she found a small grove of low trees, and, climbing into one of these, sat there till morning, amid the howling of the storm, and the still more terrible howlings of the wolves that gnawed the tree till she thought it must break and let her down. But the tender-hearted children of the Corner will be glad to hear that she got safely home to her children.

With best wishes for the success of the Corner, I remain, Your friend, MARY B. FINCH.

[We think the story is not too long. A poetical rendering of a story is always charming, and we know our children will be delighted with it, if you will take the trouble to send it for them, and we shall be truly grateful for your kindness.—ED. C. C.]

Naughty Fanny.

Fanny Alstone was a good, noble-hearted, truthful little girl of ten. She was generous even to a fault, and if she possessed anything in the way of sweetmeats, her class-mates always received their full share, and no boy or girl in trouble ever appealed to her in vain. She was ready at all times to sympathize with and encourage those in need of counsel and friendship. But with all her good points Fanny lacked one merit, or rather she was cursed with one fault, which at one time promised to poison her whole future life, namely, an unruly temper.

Her father and mother had exhausted all their eloquence in the denunciation of this blemish, and repeated again and again their displeasure and opposition, but without avail however. So at last it was decided to let her bad temper take its course, and when she grew up to woman's estate, it might possibly find its death in her otherwise kind and gentle nature. But one day an incident occurred that effectually settled the whole issue without the assistance of mature age.

A snow-storm had been brewing for several weeks, and just a few days before the opening of our story it came on in earnest, great flakes falling thick and fast, here and there, until the whole earth, as far as the eye could reach, was encased in a pure white robe. The limbs of the trees, the fences and out-houses, all bore evidence of the severe storm, while inside of Mr. Alstone's cozy residence a scene was enacted that beggars description. And Fanny was at the bottom of it all.

Her little brother Willie, a boy of eight, had been for some hours past amusing himself with a huge picture book which she wanted, and which he absolutely refused to giv up when requested to do so.

"Giv me that book!" she cried, making a surly grasp at it; "it's mine, and you hav no business with it."

"Please let me look at it a little while; I won't harm it," pleaded Willie, clinging to the book.

"No, you can't! You hav already soiled it with your dirty fingers," replied the girl, fiercely tearing it from his hands.

In the struggle that ensued one of the largest and prettiest pictures was entirely torn out, and Fanny, still more incensed at this, gave Willie a hard rap on his head, which sent him sprawling on the floor. Rolling against the cradle he brought the baby down in the general confusion.

Mrs. Alstone, who sat knitting in her favorit corner as if her very life depended upon her accomplishing a certain amount of work in a certain length of time, came rushing to the rescue of the little one, and for three minutes one would hav supposed the room had been converted into a lunatic asylum, so great was the din.

"It's all your fault, too, Fanny," said her mother, with an angry expression upon her kind, motherly features, as she stooped to pick up the baby.

"I don't care if it is," sullenly replied the girl.

"How dare you speak so rudely to your mother?" angrily exclaimed Mrs. Alstone, taking the book from Fanny and returning it to Willie.

Before Fanny could respond, her father, who had been attracted to the room by the noise, entered, and, stepping forward, he placed his hand lightly, but firmly, on her shoulder.

"Fanny, what is the meaning of all this?" he sternly asked.

"I don't suppose it's necessary to explain, as you seem already well acquainted with my ways," decidedly said the girl, not a bit frightened by her father's harsh words.

"Do you know," asked Mr. Alstone, earnestly, "that you are allowing your temper to run away with your politeness? What is to be the end of all this ill-nature and snarling, anyway?"

"Giv it up; ask the telegraph pole," mischievously answered the girl, as she pointed tauntingly to a tree outside. Her merriment was only momentary, however. "And, besides, is it any of your business?" her black eyes flashed scornfully as she asked this question, and her voice had a scathing contempt that argued well for fighting capacity.

"Fanny, you should be ashamed to use such disrespectful language to your father," responded the old gentlemen, scrutinizing his daughter very closely, scarcely realizing such depravity existed in the girl. "It's terrible—shocking in the extreme!" and unable any longer to retain his pent-up passion, Mr. Alstone placed himself before Fanny and raised his hand as if he would strike her to the floor.

And Fanny with a determination to hav the best of the argument in this little family dispute, was about to retort when her mother interposed for harmony's sake.

"John, don't abuse the girl; she's nothing but a child yet," pleaded the wife and mother in a tone which plainly showed that her love was as deep, broad, and expansiv as the ocean—a love which neither time nor temptest can destroy.

"I'll try not, Mary. But who can help it when she is constantly in an uproar about something or other. Especially when she speaks so respectful to her parents, and that's only when it's convenient for her to do so," and in spite of wrath, Mr. Alstone cast an admiring glance where Fanny stood waiting—waiting for what she termed the "next thing on the program."

"You must not blame the girl for her misfortune; for remember she takes after her father," replied Mrs. Alstone, in defense of Fanny.

"I may be a little cross sometimes, I admit, but I'm not continually growling like our interesting girl there; no, never!" returned Mr. Alstone, proud of his own good nature.

"But Fanny's young yet, and has plenty of time to reform," returned his wife.

"Reform! fiddlesticks, ha, ha!" said the husband, bursting out into a hearty laugh at his wife's simple faith. "Are you not aware," he added more calmly, "that if you allow her temper to hav full sway in this manner, it will end in her death?"

And the old gentleman not waiting for an answer to this important home question, took up his hat and left the room.

"I can't see," remarked Fanny, after the door had closed behind him, "why papa is always scolding me. He finds fault with me all the time. I ain't worse than other girls, I'm sure."

"You may not be in some respects, Fanny. But if you don't curb that bad temper of yours, it will end just as your father says it will, in your death," assuringly replied Mrs. Alstone, anxious for the welfare of her daughter.

"Oh, I'm not afraid. Papa may be wise in some things, but he's not quite as wise as the gods," emphatically answered the girl, as she too left the room.

"I do declare," mused Mrs. Alstone, when her daughter had gone; "I hardly know what to think of Fanny. She's constantly quarreling with Willie, and if her father or I attempt to reprove her, her passion breaks out anew and makes matters much worse than before. What's to be the end of it all I know not. Her father would, undoubtedly, punish her severely if not for me, but as I don't believe in punishment as a means of reformation, I won't allow him to beat her. Something else must be employed to bring her to a sense of her duties, and what that something is I can only conjecture as yet. It's a question which involves her whole future existence, and if nothing is done to reform her, the toils of her sin will become too tightly drawn to be ever severed, except by death itself."

The next morning at the breakfast table, Mrs. Alstone announced her intention of sending Fanny over to Mrs. Moor's, a neighbor near by, on an errand. It wasn't pleasent news for that young lady, for the weather was very cold, the snow some eight or ten inches deep, and walking difficult. Hence she would rather stay than go. But, as I hav intimated, she was a good, kind, loving, and gentle girl, with the exception of an unruly temper, and was ready at all times to obey the slightest wishes of her parents.

"And, Fanny, when you cross the creek, be sure and go to the bridge; the ice is insufficient to bear your weight," admonished her mother, her voice saddened with apprehension.

"I will, mamma," unhesitatingly declared the girl aloud, while to herself she muttered: "Mamma seems to think if I cross on the ice I will get drowned, but I know bettter than that. And pray, who cares to go half a mile out of their way to reach that villainous-looking old bridge, especially in such wretched whether as this?"

Procuring her hat and shawl, Fanny, wishing to convey the impression that she intended following her mother's advice, but in reality her designs were just the opposit, took a round-about path in the direction of the bridge.

When out of sight of her mother, who stood on the doorstep watching her movements, the bad little girl soon arrived in the vicinity of the creek. Proceeding to its bank, she was in the act of placing her shapely foot on the ice, when she was arrested by some one calling her name.

Turning she beheld Phil White, a neighboring farmer's son, standing a few paces away, intently watching her.

"Fanny," he said, "you are not going to cross on the ice, are you?"

"Certainly I am, you little idiot, but what's that to you?" crossly asked she, her fingers twitching with excitement, as she vainly tried to suppress her rising agitation.

"Oh, nothing," replied Phil, edging off a little, fearing a blow from his fair companion, "only, if I was you, I would go to the bridge; its only a few steps further on, and—"

"Take that you meddlesome fellow, and mind your own business," vehemently responded the passionate little girl, finishing Phil's sentence with a hard slap in his face, which made that young gentleman believe his teeth had gone down his throat, to investigate the condition of his stomach.

When he recovered from the blow sufficiently to look around, he discovered Fanny half way across the stream, which was some seven or eight feet wide.

"Fanny," he loudly yelled, "come back. You can never reach the other side in safety.'

"'Tend to your own business, and—" but at that moment crack! crash! went the ice, and poor Miss Fanny felt herself going down, down! In the almost hopeless effort to save herself, she clutched wildly at the sides of the ice, and, luckily for her, she succeeded in obtaining a slight finger-hold, and there she hung struggling for life with all the intensity of her sensitiv nature.

While hanging between life and death, as it were, oh, how she wished she had profited by her mother's advice, and gone to the bridge. But this was no time to brood over idle speculations, for her present dangerous position should occupy her full attention. Yet she could not help thinking how miserable she was, with all the probabilities in favor of her ending her unhappy existence in the cold waters below. An instant later this sickening thought occurred with even greater vividness than before.

For it was with an indescribable horror that she realized that her fingers were slowly but surely slipping off the ice, and she dare not reliuquish her present hold to obtain a fresher one, for fear of losing it altogether. Therefore with as good grace as she could command she awaited her death, which at this time appeared inevitable.

However, such a state of affairs, or, to more properly put it, her increasing suspense, was not fated to last long. For, with her poor' weak body cold and chilled almost to the bone, having given up all hopes of ever seeing her dear parents—dearer now to her than ever—alive again, she discerned her father and precious mother running toward her, the latter urging her husband on to greater exertions.

It seems that Phil, after witnessing Fanny's mishap, ran to the house and hurriedly informed her parents of her peril, and they speedily came to her rescue, Mr. Alstone carrying a stout rope, which he had the forethought to pick up as he ran through the kitchen.

"Here, Fanny, take the end of this rope, and hold on for dear life," cried Mr. Alstone, throwing the young girl the rope, which she succeeded in catching.

Immediately she was drawn from the ice to the bank, and her father, taking her into his strong arms, carried her to the house. Here, covered with huge blankets and quilts, with the assistance of a good cup of hot tea, she soon recovered her accustomed health, and—but no; I was going to say, her bad temper.

Her late experience taught her a never-to-be-forgotten lesson, for she says:

"It had almost conquered me, but now I will conquer it." And she succeeded admirably.

A short time ago the writer received a letter from her husband, Philip White, who is now a prosperous merchant in one of our large cities, detailing the particulars of the incident above narrated, and saying that Fanny makes a noble, true, loving, and honorable wife. He also says he has never forgotten the blow dealt by her dear little hand some twenty years before, as they stood upon the bank of the creek.

Correspondence.

NEWARK, N. J., Jan. 15, 1885.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I herewith send you a conundrum. I do not know whether it will be acceptable or not. It is original. I am a very poor hand at making out riddles, but I shall try my best to make them out in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I suppose practice makes perfect. Hoping you will excuse my writing, I am

Yours very truly, WM. DUFFY.

P. S.—I am thirteen years old.

[We hope to hear from William again, and that he will write us all about his school, work, and all that interests him.—ED. C. C.]

UTICA, MINN., Jan. 19, 1885.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I liv on a farm of 320 acres. My father has lots of sheep, horses, and cattle. We hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for seven years. My father calls himself a Materialist. He used to be a Universalist, and has taken a Universalist paper for twenty-five years. I hav three brothers and two sisters. One sister, thirteen years old, plays the organ and sings, and I help her sometimes. I am eleven years old. I had a side-saddle for a Christmas present a year ago; so did my sister Lizzie. We had nice times riding horseback last fall. We hav very cold weather this winter. The thermometer has been down to 35 degrees below zero, and is down to 26 this evening. I hav two brothers living in Dakota on the Northern Pacific Railroad. I was out to see them last fall. People hav large level farms out there, and raise a great deal of wheat. They had a hail-storm the day I got out there. You must excuse mistakes.

Yours truly, ALICE W. PEABODY.

DUNDEE, MINN., Jan. 19, 1885.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I hav never seen any letters in the Children's Corner from this part of Minnesota, I thought I would write one. I am a little girl ten years old. My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I like to read the Children's Corner very much, but do not read much of the rest. Papa says when I am old enough to understand it I will like that, too. We liv in the country on a farm. I hav a little brother; he is two years younger than I am. We go to school in the summer, and in the winter when it is not too cold. We hav a little red sled, and go coasting on the hills. I hav a little black pony; his name is Nig. I call him Nigger because he is black. I was learning to ride him last summer, and will try it again next summer. I would like very much to hav some of you girls who write for the Corner to write to me, and I will answer as well as I can. I hope you will hav room for this letter in the Children's Corner.

Your little friend, LAURA D. LINDGUIST.

GREENVILLE, OR., Jan. 18, 1885.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I often thought I would like to write a little piece for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and as it is Sunday I thought I would take the opportunity. I am a little girl about thirteen years of age. I go to school and read in the Fifth Reader; and I am in the new Normal Arithmetic. I hav seven sisters and ten brothers. and they are all living yet. One mother is the mother of them all. My mother is 53 years of age, and she is as good as ever yet. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and we feel that we could not do without it. I am glad to learn that the Freethinkers are increasing so fast in Canada. We came to Oregon in 1876. I read the Children's Corner, and I think it is very nice.

Yours in friendship, JEMIMA BENNETT.

J. R. PERRY writes: "'The Story Hour' came to hand, and I must say it is a beautiful book in every sense of the word. There is nothing in it to offend the most orthodox Christian, Spiritualist, or Materialist. Poetry.

A Surprised Clergyman.

"Tom Paine is dead," King Satan said,
And stirred his fires anew.
"My lads, make hot the brimstone pot,
For we hav work to do."

The devils danced, around him pranced,
And wagged their tails for joy.
Aloud they boast, "We'll hav a roast;
Our tortures we'll employ."

"Then straightway hie," did Satan cry;
"The fleetest imp of all,
To upper earth, and bring him forth
Into our brimstone hall."

Like arrow sped, a devil fled
Unto the upper air;
Then down he came, through smoke and flame,
And brought his culprit there.

All oped their eyes with blank surprise
Upon the stranger guest.
"No Paine is that—too sleek and fat,"
The devils all confessed.

With belly big, with hat and wig,
And surplice flowing wide,
With bloated cheek, and garments sleek,
And head erect with pride,

The lordly man began to scan
Those flames that burnt so blue,
Then silence broke, to Satan spoke,
"Pray, who the devil are you?"

"I'm king of hell; you'll know me well
Before you quit this den.
But never fear, for you'll find here
Your brother-clergymen."

"For mercy's sake! here's some mistake,
As shortly will appear;
They've lugged Tom Paine in heaven to reign,
And brought my reverence here."

Then Satan took a massiv book,
And oped its pages wide:
"By this you must—by this I trust You're willing to be tried."

"Yes, I'll engage that sacred page
Will take me out of hell.
I've taught its laws, and in the cause
Of Jesus labored well.

"Where many meet in crowded street,
And in the market-place,
In churches tall, and spacious hall
I've preached redeeming grace.

"In solemn way, the Sabbath day
I've kept, as we are bid."
The devil said, and shook his head,
"That's more than Jesus did."

"I've fasted, prayed——" "But I'm afraid
'Twill help you not a jot;
You've closed your door against the poor,
And Jesus knows you not."

"But I hav spread the wine and bread
Before my faithful flocks;
And, what is best of all the rest,
I'm soundly orthodox."

"And so am I," did Satan cry,
With all my brimstone crew.
Your Bibles tell how fiends in hell
Believe and tremble too."

"Sir, that's all fudge! You are no judge
At all of sacred things;
But I've been praised, to honor raised,
The favorit of kings."

"Oh, fatal boast! then you must roast,
If truth these pages tell;
For they are worst, and most accurst,
Of whom the world speaks well."

"Nay, sir, you jest, for men the best
Hav held my sermons dear;
They've given me, with homestead free,
A thousand pounds a year."

"How dare you, then, if paid by men,
Ask wages of the Lord?
Your story's told—in tinsel gold
You've had your full reward.

"But hence! away! No more I'll say
To such a bag of sin.
Yon kettle boils; to ease your toils
My imps shall help you in."

The saintly priest spoke not the least,
Till in the broth he fell:
Then, "Save me, Lord," he vainly roared;
And how the fiends did yell! PAXTON.

ELEMENTS OF UNIVERSAL HISTORY, FOR HIGHER INSTITUTES IN REPUBLICS AND FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION. By Professor H. M. Cottinger, A.M. Price, $1.50.

This book of 336 pages is divided into ten periods, and embraces all the principal events of ancient and modern times, from the beginning of historical certainty to the present. To each period of political history is subjoined a sketch of civilization, showing its various stages of advancement. Thus the student, or general reader, gains a clear idea of events as they hav transpired, and can, from the division of time, easily keep them in his mind.

The best authors hav been consulted in this compilation, and the whole matter is well and neatly arranged. The exercises at the close of each period are well calculated to keep dates and events in the grasp of the memory. It is a good book, and everyone should be acquainted with the facts therein contained. As a text-book in schools, it would occupy an important place; in the family it would be no less important, as conveying information that all should be acquainted with. I thank the author for writing it, and so will all who hav the pleasure of its perusal. To those who hav not the means of consulting all histories, or the time to study them, this work will be especially valuable.

It is inscribed to the "Congress of the United States, the ward of public liberty, promoter of sciences, arts, and public education, and the protector of commerce and industry," and has a picture of George Washington. It is published simultaneously at Boston, Milwaukee, and San Francisco. It is for sale at THE TRUTH SEEKER office. Let all purchase a copy, and find the value of their money, and much more besides, in the contents of the book. SUSAN H. WIXON.

"BIBLE MORALS."

Blind men like Talmage and one-eyed Hull hav no use for this work, but every Liberal, every candid, thinking Christian, ought to hav a copy. It is clear, concise, and invincible. As a handy reference book upon Bible questions I know of nothing better. With a copy of this work, the Liberal is prepared to meet priests and preachers upon almost any Bible question of importance without hunting through the filthy, disgusting old mainstay of superstition. Talmage says that part of the Bible was "not intended to be read," and Hull says "it was not given to all to understand." Until a satisfactory explanation is given of these remarkable utterances, the person who is seeking light will do well to let the Bible rest and read "Bible Morals" instead. Mr. Remsburg truly says at the close that when Bible defenders quote passages in opposition to those quoted by him, they will demonstrate that the Bible is contradictory in its teachings and therefore wholly unreliable as a guide. Lukewarm Christians, and others of unsettled opinions, will read this work if you approach them mildly. THE TRUTH SEEKER givs a discount on a dollar's worth and upwards. Send for a half-dozen copies.

MISS WIXON'S NEW BOOK, "ALL IN A LIFETIME."

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Having the pleasure of a hasty perusal of Miss Wixon's new novel, the opening chapters remind me of the time I "went a-fishing" for mackerel in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, sailing with a handsome fleet from Cape Cod in the good schooner Chance of Dennis. We had been in the gulf only a few days, when the gale off Prince Edward's Island wrecked nearly a hundred vessels, carrying mourning and destitution into more than a thousand families at Cape Cod and Cape Ann.

In this terrible disaster the author of this work lost four brothers, out of five in the family. The bodies of the drowned brothers were recovered and placed in a new vessel bound for their old home. But, strange to relate, that vessel containing the precious freight was never heard of after.

The father, Capt. James Wixon, closed his affairs, and removed with the remainder of his family to Fall River, Mass., where he was elected to the office of sheriff, which position he held until his death.

Miss Wixon, I am proud to say, was a pupil of mine in early life, and even then gave promis of the intellectual grace that has crowned her maturer years. A review of "All in a Lifetime" in the present article would extend it beyond warrantable limits; but I may say that I hav read few books that hav afforded me more pleasure. It is handsomely bound, and will be a prize on the shelf of any family library. If its sale equals its merits, the edition will run into many thousands.

E. M. DEWEY.

"All in a Lifetime" is for sale at THE TRUTH SEEKER office, price $1.50.

The Agnostic, Vol. I., No.1, is the first issue of a monthly journal of Liberal thought published by Charles A. Watts, London, Eng., in which Agnosticism, in its various aspects, is learnedly discussed. All England's capital is gathered there. "G. M. McC." takes the initiativ with an able and suggestiv article headed "The Confession of Agnosticism." The "parrot-cry" for "one world at a time," this writer holds, is not to be granted, because there undoubtedly are two, i.e., life as it is, and life only as it appears. With this dual aspect of life he is content to deal without fretting for a third, which may bring a fourth in its train. To the extent that a man recognizes these two worlds, one an appearance, the other a reality, he is a Secularist and an Agnostic. "G. M. McC." will continue the subject. G. L. Mackenzie contributes eight lines of sentiment in verse. "Ignotus," in an "Exposition" which regards Herbert Spencer as the greatest of philosophers, compares some Comtean and Spencerian propositions, in which their dissidences are plainly set forth. J. P. Gilman asks the question, "Is Agnosticism Philosophical?" and finds that it is pre-eminently so. Dr. W. B. Carpenter takes his stand upon the individual consciousness of the Ego, and from that position replies to Captain W. B. McTaggart's article in the "Agnostic Annual." Captain McTaggart rejoins. Mr. Charles Watts, now of America, points out the true definitions of "sacred" and "Secular" in the plain and logical manner which has made him famous; A. McDonnell discusses "Agnosticism vs. Dogmatism;" and then "Julian" dips into church history and throws some light on the age of the canonical books of the New Testament. W. Greatheed's article is headed "A.D. 2500. Antipodean Agnosticism: Its Whence and Its Whither." Herbert Junius Hardwicke, M.D., F.R.C.S., discourses on "Man: Whence and Whither?" which will be continued in subsequent numbers of the Agnostic. "Shelley and Some Other Poets" occupy Gregory Greymore for two pages, and "Reformers" receive a measure of praise from F. Sydney Morris. "Notes and Scraps," by the editor, make an appropriate closing for one of the best publications of the day. The Agnostic sells for 25 cents per copy. We will undertake to forward subscriptions.

Probably no book on the subject of the use of narcotics and stimulants has ever been printed equal in plain common sense to James Parton's "Smoking and Drinking" (Fowler & Wells Co.). Mr. Parton is fair enough to say that some good men drink, and that some who are gentlemen occasionally smoke. He believes they would be better off if rid of these habits, and no one could read this book without acknowledging that he has grounds for his belief. Strong drink is a curse. There can be no question about that. Every one ought to hav the good sense to let it alone. Tobacco is a nuisance to all except the user, and it is an injury to him. It is a solace and a quieter, and, perhaps, keeps many a man contented with his surroundings when he ought to be in rebellion against them. As Mr. Parton points out, tobacco is the great rival of woman, because men gather in clubs, and smoke when they should be spending their time with their wives or female friends. Of course drinking liquor does not pay; neither does he who smokes ever get a return for the money invested in tobacco. Rum and tobacco will probably be forced out of use by an increase of refinement in taste. Books like "Smoking and Drinking" are worth more to the cause of temperance than would be a law of equal length on the statute books of the several states. Mr. Parton writes so well on every subject that it is a pleasure to read him. The price of the present work is 50 cents. Sold by The Truth Seeker Company.

A handsome pamphlet bearing the imprint of the Thinker, McPherson, Kan., is "Slaughter the Innocents," by Chas. O. Donnovan, barrister-at-law. It is a tilt against the Irish. Mr. Donnovan may be a little too severe on this people as a race; but in so far as his remarks apply to the Catholic portion of that people, they are woefully and startlingly true. Catholicism ruined Ireland. As was shown in a recent paper by C. L. James, published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, Ireland was a nation among nations until the church captured and degraded her. There is something about Catholicism that robs a man of all sense of honor, and all respect for human rights or human laws. If an Irishman could be found who is not a Catholic, there is no doubt that, other things being equal, he is as good as the rest of mankind. It is by accepting the diabolical teachings of Catholicism that the Irish people hav laid themselvs open to the truthful strictures of Mr. Donnovan. We should say that 25 cents would be a fair price for this pamphlet.

Mr. E. C. Walker, junior editor of Lucifer, has collocated from that paper a number of articles, and published them in pamphlet form under the title of "Practical Co-operation." Mr. Walker is one of those vigorous writers who say what they hav to say in such a manner as to attract and hold the attention of whoever glances at his articles. He may be rash, and liable to run his head under the ax, but thus far it is not known that he has suffered decapitation. He is dead in earnest from the word "Go!" to the finish, and it is not his fault if he does not always win. Not to let our admiration for Mr. Walker's verve make us forgetful of his pamphlet, we would say that "Practical Co-operation" sells for ten cents, and can be obtained at this office.

From Auckland, New Zealand, comes a pamphlet entitled, "The Kingdom of Heaven; or, The Teaching of Jesus, as Found in the Gospels, Criticised." A. Campbell, bookseller, is the publisher. The teaching of Jesus is found not to bear the test of criticism in the light of faith and reason. The pamphlet is a credit to Archd. Campbell, who is its author. 25 cents. A second pamphlet by the same writer is, "Spirit or Matter?" in regard to which the same remark is applicable, and which sells for the same price. A third, which is named "Jesus Who is Called Christ," is equally good. "Pictures We Hav Seen of the Unknown God" is a fourth. We are glad to see so much Freethought literature emanating from the vicinity of the sixth continent.

"Spiritual Specifics—Mind in Medicin" is the title under which M. L. Holbrook publishes a discourse by the Rev. Cyrus A. Bartol on the relation between mind and malady. The book has no especial value further than that its odd pages advertise some of Mr. Holbrook's other publications, which are really worth reading. Among these are, "Eating for Strength," $1; "Liver Complaint, Nervous Dyspepsia, and Headache: The Causes, Prevention, and Cure," $1; "Fruit and Bread a Natural and Scientific Diet," $1; "Muscle-Beating; or, Activ and Passiv Home Gymnastics for Healthy and Unhealthy People," 30 cents. Any of these may be ordered from this office, and will be sent postpaid on receipt of price.

Spiritualism has acquired a new ally in the shape of a monthly magazine called Spirit Voices. Editor, George A. Fuller; assistant editor, Mrs. G Davenport Stevens; manager, James A. Bliss. These three, with the assistance of a printer who evidently understands the art, hav produced a handsome publication. Those who wish to patronize this new undertaking should address Manager Bliss, 121 West Concord street, Boston, Mass.

Fowler & Wells hav recently issued a new edition of Redfield's "Comparativ Physiognomy; or, Resemblances between Men and Animals." Dr. Redfield thought he discovered physical resemblances between men and animals, and that the likeness extended to the mental characteristics. In a book of 330 pages these resemblances are set forth and illustrated with 330 cuts. Price, $2.50. For sale at THE TRUTH SEEKER office.

People having members of their family under five years of age may be interested to know that a publication espousing the cause of the human infant is published monthly in this city. Babyhood is the title of the magazine, and it is devoted exclusivly to the care of infants and young children, and the general interests of the nursery. Published at 18 Spruce st., New York; 15 cents per number.

"Proceedings of the Pennsylvania Yearly Meeting of the Progressiv Friends, held at Longwood, Pa., 1883-1884." C. D. B. Mills, Syracuse, N. Y., and M. M. Bailey, Marlboroville, Pa., are the clerks of this Society of Friends, and those interested in the proceedings can doubtless obtain the pamphlet under notice by addressing either of these gentlemen.

"Saladin," the editor of the London Secular Review, reprints from that paper, in pamphlet form, his article on the "Crusades," and sends a copy of it to this office. The little book contains 14 pages, and is the story, told in "Saladin's" eerie way, of how the Christians of England and elsewhere attempted to drive the Infidels out of Palestine.

"A Common-Sense Guide to correct English," by J. L. Barker, Columbus, Ga., price 50 cents, would strike the observer as coming rather high for a book of its size, but it is as full of meat as an egg is of vitellus and albumen. It can be read with profit by all writers who aim at accuracy of expression.

Vick's "Floral Guide" for 1885 contains pictures of hundreds of flowers as big as life, and needing only color to be as natural. The "Guide" is a catalog of the flower and vegetable seeds which James Vick, Rochester, N. Y., has to sell, and can be obtained of him for ten cents.

John G. Hertwig is well known to the public as a writer on the Sabbath question and woman's rights. His latest work is "Silver Coin," as its names indicates, an argument on finance. Price 10 cents. For sale at this office.

M. E Marks, Oak Park, Ill., prints a circular headed "Hav We Reliable Evidence that Jesus Arose from Death and Ascended to Heaven?" He concludes that we hav not.

G. F. Rinehart, Colfax, Iowa, contributes a 56-page pamphlet to the subject of "Intellectual Development." It is ably written. Price, 50 cents.

Books that the Press Appreciate.

The Nonconformist, just before the holidays, printed this notice of Mr. Putnam's latest novel. The advice in the last paragraph is as good now as then:

"Waifs and Wanderings" is the title of a new work by Samuel P. Putnam, published by The Truth Seeker Company, 33 Clinton Place, New York city. Price, $1, cloth; paper, 50 cents.

Just to giv an idea of the novel, it begins with Mr. and Mrs. Cupples, who hav no children of their own. One stormy night Mrs. Cupples was aroused from her slumber by a noise which she insisted was burglars, and demanded that Cupples arise and advance forthwith to the cellar and catch them. This was an entirely new business for Cupples, and before resolving finally what course to take, he listened, and both at the same instant determined that it wasn't cats nor burglars, but a baby, and it was soon discovered to be on the door step. So it was brought into the house where it proceeded to stir up music. Mrs. Cupples demanded that Cupples giv the bottle to the baby, while Cupples insisted he saw no bottle, but when Mrs. Cupples fished one out, found it was filled with milk, and rammed it into the child's mouth, the noise ceased, while Cupples, filled with amazement at what a bottle could do, simply ejaculated, "Well, I'll be damned," not, however, that he meant it; the expression was hyperbolical with Cupples, and no harm at all.

The story goes on through thirty-three chapters taking that child through all the vicissitudes of slave life up to the close of the war, defeating the grossest injustice, sometimes the Bible being on one side and sometimes on the other, both law and gospel accommodating themselvs to circumstances, until at last justice triumphs, but no thanks to either law or gospel.

This book would make a most charming holiday present. It is written in Mr. Putnam's happiest style. Few authors are gifted as Mr. Putnam is with the ability to seize on and hold the attention of the reader without flagging from first to last.

We commend this book of 192 pages, well printed and elegantly bound, to those who desire at this season of the year to make a present to their friends of a truly interesting and valuable book.

The Banner of Light also commends the book:

Mr. Putnam excels as a writer of fiction embodying the views of Freethinkers. In this, as in his previous works, he exposes the real characters of those who employ religion as a cloak to their selfish and nefarious acts, and with pretentious sanctity impose upon the sympathies of honest but simple-minded people. The frame-work of the story is the civil war, incidents of which are vividly described, reaching at times points of intense interest. Radical truth are freely uttered; every page sustains the right, condemns the wrong, and encourages those who are looking for better conditions for all mankind.

Of Mr. Remsburg's "Bible Morals," the New Thought speaks in these flattering terms:

John E. Remsburg never writes without having something to say, and he always says his say as well as it can be said. Mr. Remsburg proves beyond the possibility of a doubt that the Bible sanctions falsehood and deception, cheating, theft and robbery, adultery and prostitution, murder, wars of conquest and extermination, despotism, intolerance and persecution, injustice to woman, unkindness to children, cruelty to animals, human sacrifices, cannibalism, witchcraft, slavery, polygamy, imtemperance, poverty and vagrancy, ignorance and idiocy, and obscenity.

Mr. Remsburg believes the Bible was true to the conditions that produced it; that it contains many good things; it is only when the claim is made for the Bible that it is God's infallible book that he finds it necessary to show that it partakes of human fallibility. He says: "In opposing the Bible, do not suppose that I am so uncharitable as to deny to it any merit. There is much in it to be admired. The Mosaic code, crude and barbarous as it is, contains many statements that are wise and just; the proverbs constitute a store-house of oriental wisdom; Job, dressed in the rich imagery of the past, is a poem of surpassing merit; many of the psalms are gems of poesy; David's lament for Saul and Jonathan, and the words spoken over his dead Absalom, are touchingly beautiful; the Sermon on the Mount, with all its vague and impractiable teaching, is composition that has charmed and will continue to charm thousands who reject the dogma of its author's divinity; those chapters in John which record the last hours of Jesus with his disciples are so full of pathos that in reading them we forget the Christ, and hear only the sad, human voice of the 'gentle Nazarene;' Paul's writings reveal a master mind, and through the clouds of his theology there bursts forth many a ray of truth." This book can be had of its publishers at 25 cents each.

CONSULTING ROOMS,

Something for Invalids to read and study over.—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

Ah! but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would not submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we hav treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all form of chronic invalidism.

ALL in a LIFETIME,

A ROMANCE.

BY MISS SUSAN H. WIXON.

"The great charm of this novel is its absolute fidelity to nature. Its personages are those one meets with in common life, and are portrayed with a vividness and perspicuity I was scarcely prepared to expect to find, in such a marked degree, even from so gifted a pen as that of Miss Wixon, whose [illegible] and lucid style is familiar to most readers in the Freethought ranks. . . . But what pleased me most in this charming story was the unflinching honesty with which its author holds up to the derision of the world the rottenness of average ministerial character, particularly that of revivalist type. I hav not space here to treat, in detail, of the characters of this truly absorbing novel. Suffice it to say that it is safe to predict that anyone who reads its first chapters will be loth to lay it down till the denouement is reached. Miss Wixon has long been doing a noble work in educating our children into the ranks of true Liberalism, thereby robbing the church of hundreds of those who, in after years, might hav become its willing dupes and servil tools, and she certainly deserves the generous and substantial recognition of all Freethinkers. Let everyone send for a copy of 'All in a Lifetime.' It will yield a liberal reward for the outlay.

Gems of Thought.

IN the ancient world we may consider the Stoics to hav been the most distinguished, practical philosophers. Their leading moral doctrin was "to liv according to Nature." If they were asked, to what Nature? some answered, according to the human, others to the general Nature, or universal law. Now, human nature is adapted to the dominion of reason over the desires; therefore, the philosophical emperor, M. A. Antoninus, wrote that, to the reasonable being, acting naturally was equivalent to acting reasonably. And as the same reason, moreover, which is said to reign in man is also the divine principle pervading the whole universe, according to the doctrin of the Stoics, the man acting in consonance with his own reason, acts also consonantly with universal reason. And as by this reason he knows himself to be part of the world, and especially a member of the great community of rational beings, he recognizes it as his duty to liv, not to himself alone, but also for the general good.—Strauss's Old and New Faith.

To be learned in the lump in other men's opinions and to be in the right by saying after others is the much easier and quieter way; but how a rational man, that should inquire and know for himself, can content himself with a faith or a religion taken upon trust, or with such a servil submission of his understanding as to admit all and nothing else but what fashion makes passable among men, is to me astonishing. I do not wonder that you should hav, in many points, different apprehensions from what you meet with in authors. With a free mind, which unbiasedly pursues truth, it cannot be otherwise.—Locke's Familiar Letters.

SEEING these things, seeing that, by the confession of the most obstinate enemies of innovation, our race has, hitherto, been constantly advancing in knowledge, and not seeing any reason to believe that, precisely at the point of time at which we came into the world, a change took place in the faculties of the human mind, or in the mode of discovering truth, we are reformers; we are on the side of progress. From the great advances which European society has made, during the last four centuries, in every species of knowledge, we infer, not that there is no more room for improvement, but that in every science that deserves the name, immense improvements may be confidently expected.—Macaulay.

IN our era of the world, these same church clothes hav gone sorrowfully out-at-elbows; nay, far worse, many of them hav become mere hollow shapes or masks under which no living figure or spirit any longer dwells; but only spiders and unclean beetles, in horrid accumulation, drive their trade; and the mask still glares on you with its glass-eyes, in ghastly affectation of life—some generation-and-a-half after religion has quite withdrawn from it and, in unnoticed nooks is weaving for itself new vestures, wherewith to reappear and bless us or our sons or grandsons. As a priest or interpreter of the Holy is the noblest and highest of all men, so is a sham-priest the falsest and basest; neither is it doubtful that his canonicals, were they pope's tiaras, will one day be torn from him to make bandages for the wounds of mankind; or even to burn into tinder for general scientific or culinary purposes.—Sartor Resartus.

THE Power, incensed, the pageant will desert,
The pompous strain, the sacerdotal stole;
But haply, in some cottage far apart,
May hear, well-pleased, the language of the soul,
And in his book of life the inmates poor enroll.
—Burns's Cotter's Saturday Night.

MANY religious exercises are entered into with seeming fervor, where the heart, at the time, feels cold and languid. A habit of dissimulation is by degrees contracted and fraud and falsehood become the predominant principle. Hence the reason of that vulgar observation, that the highest zeal in religion and the deepest hypocrisy, so far from being inconsistent, are often or commonly united in the same individual character.—Hume's Dialogs Concerning Natural Religion.

THE inner life of every man is hidden from his fellows by a thick veil; whenever accident draws this partly aside, are we not invariably amazed at the unexpected incongruities it lays bare? Are we not, on such occasions, made aware that we are habitually forming the most egregiously mistaken estimates of the essential condition of those around us? For myself, I can truly say that whenever circumstance has made me intimately acquainted with the deeper secrets of my fellow-men, I hav been utterly confounded at the unlooked-for nature of the revelations. Among the lowest I hav found "seeds of almost impossible good;" among the most virtuous in appearance (and, in some respects, in reality) guilt or frailty that scarcely any evidence could make credible.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

Polonius.—We are oft to blame in this:
'Tis too much proved—that with devotion's visage,
And pious action we do sugar o'er
The devil himself.
King.—Oh, 'tis too true!
How smart a lash that speech doth giv my conscience!
The harlot's cheek, beautified with plastering art,
Is not more ugly to the thing that helps it
Than is my deed to my most painted word:
O heavy burden! —Shakspere's Hamlet

BY the common consent of all wise men and philosophers, that is the noblest type of government which governs the least, which makes the least display of itself, which has the fewest court houses, the fewest jails, the smallest standing army, the smallest police, which makes the slightest external demonstration of its life. That is the finest, truest, noblest government where the laws are written in the intelligence and the heart of the people, where it simply governs itself. So that religion is not necessarily the best, not necessarily the most intense, where there is the largest external manifestation architecturally, the most elaborate ritual, the most costly sacrifices, processions, and external displays. That is the grandest and divinest development which the world has ever seen, when the laws of God, of truth and right, are written on the fleshly tables of the heart; where there is the least display of external power, for the simple reason that it is not needed.—M. J. Savage.

STATUETTE OF THOMAS PAINE.

This Statuette of the author-hero is a fac simile of the model of Prof. Richards for the monument proposed to be erected in Lincoln Park. It is admitted to be a fine work of art, and is the only correct outline of Thomas Paine's head and face in existence being executed from a mask taken at the time of his death, and sent, with other effects, to a friend in France, from whence Prof. Richards procured it for his design.

Size 20x16 inches, weight 35 lbs.; finished in the same style as Rogers's groups.

Price reduced from $14 00 to $10.00. Sole agent, E. A. STEVENS, 480 W. Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

Odds and Ends.

"POETS are born." This, by the way, is the case with everybody.

"SEE how plain a tail shall put you down," remarked the alligator as he swept the little darkey within easy lunching distance.

A YOUNG lady being refused a new dress by her father, told him he resembled a part of a stovepipe. "What part?" he asked. "The dampar," she replied, and wept copiously.

AN Oakland obituary notice referred to a deceased citizen as having "gone to a happier home." The widow is about bringing a libel suit. These Oakland women are too sensitiv for anything.

A SOUTHERN editor asserts that all angels are blondes. A gentleman who married a light-haired woman with a sultry temper says that he is not prepared to deny the assertion, but he is pretty confident that all blondes are not angels.

A GERMAN, says an exchange, loves to contemplate himself, a Frenchman to talk about himself, an Englishman to blow about himself, an Italian to mourn about himself, an Irishman to swear about himself and a Yankee to outlie them all.

ONE of the Japanese students, while out for a stroll, was accosted by a sophomore with the inquiry, "What's your name?" The gentleman from Japan answered politely, giving his surname. "Oh," rejoined the questioner, "you heathens don't hav but one name, I see." "What was the first name of Moses?" was the reply.

"WEALLY, ah, I beg youah pardon, miss, if I intrude," said a dude from Cincinnati the other evening on discovering a pretty girl milking a cow. "No intrusion, sir," said the girl, blushing like a rose. "Ah, my dear damsel, cawn't I assist you?" "Certainly, sir. Just stand where the cow can see you." "Of course I will, me chawmer; but what do you want the cow to see me foah?" "She will think you're a calf, and giv down her milk faster."

DEACON DE BLANK: "Yes, dear, I know the church ought to hav a new organ now that the opposition church in the next square has one, but I shall not subscribe anything toward it." Mrs. De Blank: "But all the other members are subscribing liberally toward it, and we must do something." "I know; but I can't afford it, my dear. My income has totally stopped." "Good gracious! Why, what has happened?" "The police hav raided, cleaned out, and demolished No. 60 Slum street." "But what has that to do with us?" "That was my property."—Philadelphia Call.

AN English lord who visited this country was at a dinner given in his honor at a private residence up-town. A little daughter of his host, who was too well-bred to stare, but who eyed him covertly as the occasion presented itself, finally ventured to remark, "And are you really and truly an English lord?" "Yes," he responded pleasantly, "really and truly." "I hav often thought I would like to see an English lord," she went on, "and—and—" "And now you are satisfied at last," he interrupted, laughingly. "N-no," replied the truthful little girl. "I'm not satisfied. I'm a good deal disappointed."

"WHO preached to the disciples on the day of pentecost?" asked a Newman Sunday-school teacher of her class. "Peter," shouted the class in chorus. "And what appeared unto them?" "Cloven tongues," said the class. "What is a cloven tongue?" The class remained silent, and the teacher was about to explain when the smallest boy exclaimed, "My pa's got one." "You are mistaken," said the teacher. "This was a miracle, and miracles do not occur now." "Yes, he has a cloven tongue," said the boy, "for I saw him put a clove on his tongue this morning as soon as he took a drink out of the jug."—Pious Paper

ELDER FILLIPS, who was a jovial soul, settled many years ago near the head waters of the Susquehanna. He was, in fact, a Presbyterian dominie. He was full of humor, and ready with his repartee on all occasions. Jack Rickitt, a quasi parishioner, who was more punctual at the river than at church, presented the elder one Monday morning with a fine string of pickerel. Elder Fillips thanked him graciously for the gift. "But, elder," suggested Jack, still retaining the fish, "those fish were caught yesterday. Perhaps yer conscience won't let ye eat 'em." "Jack," replied the elder, stretching out his hand toward the string, "there's one thing I know; the pickerel were not to blame."

TO A GOAT.

Thou hast a serious aspect, but methinks
Beneath the surface, Billy, I discern
A thoughtful tendency to play high jinks,
A solemn, waiting wickedness supern.
Within the amber circle of thine eye
There lurketh mischief of exsuccous kind—
A humor grim, mechanical and dry;
Evasiv, subdolous, and undefined.
I would I understood thee better, Bill,
Beseech thee of thy courtesy explain;
Now, doth the flavor of a poster fill
Thy utmost need? Of old hats art thou fain?
I pr'ythee, goat, vouchsafe some information.
Oh, say! Come, now! Get out! Oh, thunderation! —The Critic.

A BROOKLYN lawyer's little daughter goes to Sabbath-school, and is in a class with other little girls. The teacher last Sabbath was going over the good old story of King Solomon and his wisdom. "Now, dears, who was the great queen who traveled so many miles and miles to see the king!" Silence prevailed. The name had been forgotten by the class. In order to help them, the kind but misguided teacher began to offer a little assistance. "You do know, I am sure. The name began with S, and she was a very great queen." Just then up shot a little hand, and out spoke the triumphant voice of the little girl. She transfixed the listening school-room with the following brief statement, in a clear, business-like voice, "I know, teacher; it was he queen of spades."

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 12. No. 7. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY. | New York, Saturday, February 14, 1885. | 33 CLINTON PLACE. | $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

A NEW religious sect has established itself at Jerusalem. The members call themselvs the "Overcomers," and hav divine revelations through the wife of their leader.

DUNCAN C. ROSS, the athlete, says the story of his intention to enter the ministry is all nonsense. Considering the morals that hav already been drawn from Mr. Ross's alleged conversion, this declaration will be quite a set-back for Christianity.

A NEW ORLEANS reporter says that an audience listened "two hours breathlessly" to a sermon by the Rev. Joseph Cook. This is evidently hyperbolical, as it attributes to a number of people a degree of long-windedness only attained by the Rev. Joseph Cook himself.

THE religious periodical known as the Princeton Review has suspended publication. It was a dry and unreadable print, and was of little interest to any except those who wrote for its pages. By way of consolation the Norristown Herald remarks, "We hav the census reports of 1880 left."

AN esteemed exchange, the Christian at Work, has the following society item, which contains a moral: "Yes, brethren," says the clergyman who is preaching the funeral sermon, "our deceased brother was cut down in a single night —torn from the arms of his loving wife, who is thus left a desolate widow at the early age of twenty-four years." "Twenty-two, if you please," sobs the widow in the front pew, emerging from her handkerchief in an instant.

THE Alta Californian promulgates the statement that the Nevada gold seekers hav discovered a new use for fowls. It is a common sight there, it says, to see men and women carrying a hen under one arm and a basket of chickens under the other. When they reach their destination, the hens are picketed, and, being already hungry, begin to scratch and eat. After three or four days' honest toil they are killed and their craws examined for gold. As much as $8 has been found in one craw.

LAST Sunday's papers contained this dispatch from Lebanon, Pa.: "Elder Dickinson, a Philadelphia evangelist, is holding revival meetings in this place and vicinity in the interest of the Methodist church. More than one hundred persons were converted here in three nights. At Morgantown it is reported that only one grown person in the village is left unconverted. He is an Agnostic, and has not attended any of the meetings." Morgantown must be an awful lonesome place for its only sensible inhabitant.

THE Christian Register says: "Not a little discussion has taken place in New Orleans as to whether the Exhibition should be open on Sunday. It has finally been decided to open it on that day, but the machinery is not to be in operation. The grounds of this discrimination are not stated. If with a view to release those who tend the machinery, well and good; but if made under the assumption that the holiness of the day will be marred by putting it in motion, the directors seem to hav overlooked the fact that the machinery of the universe keeps on moving just the same on Sunday as on any other day. In the many inventions which, according to the preacher, man has sought out, the visitor to the Exhibition might find opportunity for instruction and much occasion for gratitude."

A MILWAUKEE paper relates this story of a talented Christian young man: George Parker, a fine appearing young man employed by Hildebrand Bros., the ice firm, slipped from a loaded ice wagon, which he was driving near the Kinnickinnic bridge about two weeks ago, the wagon passing over him and injuring him quite seriously. He was taken to the residence of the Hildebrands, near Forest Home cemetery, where he was cared for. On Friday evening, having quite recovered, he led the meeting at the Young Men's Christian Association rooms, on the south side. Saturday he was left alone in the house while the members of the family were away. Upon their return Parker was missing, and further search revealed the fact that two gold watches and fifty dollars in money were also missing. Parker's old shoes sat in the place of a pair of new boots which had been standing in the room, and an air of desolation pervaded the house. The matter was placed in the hands of the sheriff, who will search for Parker.

IN a religious paper an English rector has lately given examples of the way in which children in national schools are taught to gabble over the church catechism. One wrote, "To bear no manners or atred in my heart." Another, "To sucker my father, obey the queen, and all that is put in thority; to submit myself to my governess, teachers, spirit pasters." Another, "Suffered under the Pontius Pilate, was crucified, he descended into heaven." Another, "My duty toward my nabour is to do to no men as I would, and no to obey the queen," etc. These are samples of fifteen examples of what is called "religious instruction."

AT the late meeting of the California State Teachers' Association A. L. Bancroft delivered a lecture on a proposed new alphabet. The Sacramento Union says: "Previous to the address charts were distributed showing the proposed 'San Francisco alphabet for revised English spelling, 1884.' This shows a scheme of thirteen vowels, four diphthongs, and twenty-four consonants. The system may be summed up practically in the statement that it is 'shorthand' written in a long way. The characters, apart from the ordinary alphabet, resemble ordinary letters now in use generally. Mr. Bancroft explained the chart at length, and claimed for the 'San Francisco alphabet' a variety of advantages."

IN the Rev. Heber Newton's sermon on the "Trinity" this passage occurs: "The number which first finds expression for unity in variety is the number three. One is the mere unity. Two represents mere variety without a bond of unity. It is the number which denotes analysis—the severing and differentiating of the primal unity. Three expresses a return to a higher unity—harmony. It has variety, but that variety is not the mere separation of analysis, as is the case with two. It makes a new synthesis. It is a unity in a triunity." If Mr. Newton desires to preach that doctrin, there should be none to object; but he ought to call it by the right name and tell where he got it. It is not Presbyterianism; it is Universology!

KATE FIELD spent several months among the Mormons of Utah, and in giving her observations in the New York World relates the following: "Not long since I visited a polygamist endowed with thirteen wives, every one of whom is a beast of burden. All hav their allotted duties. Several liv on different farms, the care of which is confided to them. One cooks, another sews, a third is dressmaker and tailor, a fourth weaves cloth, a fifth makes butter and cares for the milk. The youngest bears children, and between her and the brute to whom she looks up there must be a difference of at least thirty years. Though the man is well-to-do, all liv like pigs, and when I sat down to lunch, expecting of course to meet the whole family, I had for companion the master only. The first wife waited upon the table and the 'plurals' ate in the kitchen. This scene occurred not many miles from Salt Lake. The man is Danish. So are his wives. They are not women; they are 'cows.' Miss Field says that Mormon women generally claim that they would never enter the polygamous state except for their religion, and that the Old Testament is read to them every Sunday in support of plural marriages.

FOUR of the seven churches in the town of Keene, N. H., are without pastors, and without immediate prospect of their being supplied; and report says that the pastor of a fifth church is about to resign. What is worse, a discussion has been started in a local paper of the question "When did the first rainbow appear?" One correspondent, signing himself "Hazel," holds to the Mosaic story about the first rainbow being set in the sky to reassure Noah and his family; but a more skeptical writer laughs at the idea, and in reply uses this derisiv language: "No rainbow before the flood, says 'Hazel.' Let me explain my mistake. When I pick up a piece of fossil coal and find impressions of ferns and barks of trees, I am told that the plants which made up the coal grew millions of years ago. Tropical nuts are dug up at Brandon, Vt. Big California trees are found fossil in Greenland, coal in Labrador. Now those trees required rain and wind and sunshine and rings round the sun and moon; but 'Hazel' says there were no rainbows till after the flood, and treats us to the story of Noah's ark. Compared to the age of coal, Noah was quite recent. Six or seven men like Methuselah could join hands across the whole six thousand years of the Bible creation. We wonder if a rainy March of forty days would put Monadnock under water! We venerate the past and sympathize with Mark Twain. When this distinguished traveler was in the East, he found the grave of Adam. It was forty feet long and fallen in. He wept for hours over the grave, and when the sun went down he still stood there in tears."

MR. NEWTON'S recent radical sermon has caused Mgr. Capel to express an opinion. There were so few points of contact between the views of the Catholic and those of the Episcopal clergyman that Mgr. Capel could only point out the wide difference. "In the Catholic church," said he, "whatever we hav that is said to be of faith or of doctrin is absolute and unchanging. A priest with us, therefore, who would deliberately and obstinately persevere in proclaiming a doctrin contrary to those laid down by the church would hav his authority withdrawn at once. It would be impossible for a Catholic priest to preach heresy from a Catholic pulpit. He would be called upon to explain his teachings, and, being told that they were not the teachings of the Catholic church, inhibition would naturally follow. Our doctrin is fixed, definit, and all preaching must be within those limits. But in the Protestant church, as I understand it," he continued, "there is no such body of dogmatic truths, though they hav creeds which are capable of the widest possible interpretation. A latitude is allowed for the exercise of private judgment, and Mr. Newton would say, therefore, that he had exercised only his private judgment and intellectual rights in proclaiming his theories. To exclude such theories would imply the possession of infallibly authority by which the decision is made. And one would naturally ask why should the church be right and Mr. Newton wrong. I can easily understand how annoyed Protestant-Episcopals are at Mr. Newton's interpretation of the Thirty-nine Articles, but it is logically unjust to condemn him or any other clergyman for any interpretation as long as there is no infallible and unerring reading of those Thirty-nine Articles. Mr. Newton is as liable to be right as his bishop. To lookers-on from the Catholic church it is but one more illustration that doctrinal teaching, as such—theories on eternal punishment, original sin, etc.—will, at no distant day form no part of Christian theology. In other words, the fight is to be between Agnosticism and Catholicism, and, indeed, all thoughtful men on the other side of the Atlantic already recognize this. How infrequently, even now, does any prominent Protestant preach on doctrinal points? Your popular preacher does not touch them, but givs his hearers politics and the question of the hour. I sympathize with this movement, for who could believe the doctrin of three distinct persons in one God unless on some authority greater than the light of reason? It is certainly beyond the mere ken of human reason. In a lesser degree the same may be said of the other question, original sin—its co-relativ doctrin of the atonement. As a question altogether outside the Catholic church I shall not venture to anticipate the judgment of Mr. Newton's brother clergy." Mgr. Capel said he was sorry that Mr. Newton was weakening the Christian religion at a time when it needed strengthening, and added that the Protestant clergyman's attacks were scholarly and well put, something he could not say of most clerical writing in America. The clergy generally, he thought, were not scholars.

News of the Week.

CAPT. PHELAN, the man who was stabbed by Short, is so as to be out, and has appeared against his assailant.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY'S health at Naples is by no means satisfactory, and he is compelled to liv in absolute seclusion.

A COLLECTION is being raised in Germany to make Prime Minister Bismarck a birthday present. The sum collected is assuming enormous proportions.

TALMAGE preached last Sunday on the blasphemy of Colonel Ingersoll's recent lecture in Brooklyn, and advocated the suppression of such teachings by the police.

A "REPLY to Ingersoll," in Brooklyn last week, by the Rev. Thomas Mitchell (the same that debated with Mr. Wakeman at Rochester), was attended by an audience of eight.

O'DONOVAN ROSSA, the dynamiter, and editor of a dynamite newspaper, was shot in the back and slightly wounded, last week, by an Englishwoman named Yseult Dudley. The woman is deranged.

PRESIDENT-ELECT CLEVELAND spent last Sunday at Greystone, N. Y., the residence of Mr. Samuel J. Tilden. Gov. Hendricks was in New Orleans, where he was received last Saturday with an address of welcome.

CARLTON NORWOOD & Co., of Rockport, Me., will launch in the spring a ship capable of carrying 4,000 tons dead weight. She will hav a keel 263 feet long, 45 feet beam, and 28 feet deep. This is said to be the largest keel on record.

PORTER C. BLISS, Freethinker, journalist, archeologist, and historian, died last week, and was buried at Randolph, N. Y., on the 6th. Local journalists, and members of the Society for the Advancement of Science, acted as pallbearers.

A MEETING of New York Socialists was broken up by the police one evening last week, and the audience were severely clubbed. Mr. Edward King, who was to hav spoken, describes the clubbing as an outrage and altogether unnecessary.

NATHANIEL POPE, the head cashier of the New York office of the Liverpool and London and Globe Fire Insurance Company, [in this city, speculated in Wall street. He is now $27,000 short on his books. He has confessed to stealing.

A "WHITE CROSS SOCIETY" has been organized in the Episcopal church of New York, the object of which is to encourage the observance of the seventh commandment. It is hoped that the dignitaries of the church will now giv us practice as well as precept.

IT is reported that a branch of the Salvation Army was mobbed in Fall River, Mass., last Sunday. Some of the women were seriously injured. There is a good deal of lawlessness just now in Fall River, and the cause of it all seems to be religious differences.

REINSDORF AND KEUCHLER, the anarchists who were sentenced to death some weeks ago by the Imperial Court a Leipsic, Germany, for attempting to cause the death of the emperor and other royal persons, were executed at Berlin on the 7th. The prisoners' heads were cut off with a sword.

A NEW sect announced in Russia is that of the "Jerusalemists." Each of its members wears constantly on his breast a card bearing a printed dispensation from the Patriarch of Jerusalem, and is pledged to visit that city at least once in his life. All religious gatherings of the sect are held at night and with no other light than that of faith.

KHARTOUM, in the Soudan, Africa, has fallen into the hands of El Mahdi, the False Prophet, and the fate of Gen. "Chinese" Gordon is unknown. It is guessed that he has either been killed or has gone further up the Nile to escape being "rescued" by the English troops under Stewart. One report has it that he has gone over to the enemy and become a Mohammedan.

Hypercriticism.—Iconoclasts.

"Another cherished delusion destroyed" is a saying daily heard. A carping, skeptical spirit has attacked, one after another, many an old story and dismissed it as fabulous. But there is an incredulity that rests on a basis of credulity, and which is, perhaps, more misleading than superstition itself. For instance, one must believe that even the most intelligent people who lived a few centuries ago were fools, liars, imbecils, to hav given credit to things that we wise men, so far removed from the stage of action, so easily detect as false and often very foolish. And this carping, doubting spirit is satisfied with the veriest trifles that aid to make asserted facts seem fables. The story of Tell and the apple is triumphantly dismissed as a lie as soon as the doubters find the like story told of persons who lived ages before the date of Gessler and Tell. It never occurs to the doubters that probably Gessler and his advisers knew the old story, and men being the most imitativ of all animals, it delighted them to re-enact the scene. Some persons once expressed grave and owlish doubts as to the story of the siege of Troy, declaring the whole thing to be a myth, and that no such city as Troy ever existed. Yet it was the most universally credited fact among all the ancients. The earliest records we get go within about three hundred years of the date of the seige—traditions go to the very time. It became an epoch from whence to date, just as has our July 4, 1776. It is clear that people must hav begun to refer to it as the greatest event of ages during the lives of the heroes concerned in the war. There is some circumstantial evidence stronger than all the direct testimony of eye-witnesses. Ten thousand eye-witnesses may swear to a fact, but the present, living fact is far above all testimony. Not a man living can swear he heard the Declaration of Independence read July 4, 1776. Yet tradition, beginning during the lives of a generation living at the time, to whom this was a matter of fact, has never ceased for even one month to refer to the event. So began this of Troy, and all the histories, poetry, traditions of antiquity, date from that event. Actuated by the same spirit, certain critics reject mountains of evidence that show a reputed author wrote the works attributed to him, and permit trifles light as air to giv the credit to another. How if justice were to thus serve an accused whom all the world calls guilty, who confesses, also, and enjoys the fruits of the crime, and should seek for some unsuspected person, and gathering up a thousand trivial circumstances, fasten them on him, and call to the world, "Behold the guilty one?" It is astounding how quick is the world to join in the cry, or would be, did we not know how presumptuous we are wherein we are most ignorant.

Doubts hav been cast on Shakspere's authorship, just as doubts may be in time cast on that of any writer. Those busy in publishing these doubts with strange eccentricity would make one the author who never claimed to be it, and on whom not one of his contemporaries ever dreamed of fastening the honor —Bacon.

See now their positions: Shakspere, who lived and was an undoubted real person, of whose daily life we know more than is known of Bacon's, claimed to be the author. He lived and moved for more than twenty years constantly among play-writers and play-actors, the most jealous of beings. He wrote with them and for them. He claimed to be the writer and author. Enemies who hated and attacked him never dared deny his authorship during life, though some of them accused him of plagiarizing and assuming too much. He also lived among literary men in an age of great literary activity, and was the contemporary and intimate acquaintance of some of the greatest minds and most profound scholars the world has ever known—in an age, too, when the literary life made up by intensity what it lacked of universality. These contemporaries so much admired Shakspere in his lifetime that they continually panegyrized him, and after his death lauded him in immortal lines—lauded him as none but the author of Shakspere's works, of all the sons of men, deserved, and made for him by their praises such a monument, to use the language of John Milton concerning him, "that kings for such a tomb might wish to die." And they were as much influenced by the impression made on them by their intercourse with him, by his talk and conduct, by the man himself, as by his writings. Two hundred years after his decease, it is discovered by these iconoclastic critics that some person else is the author of Shakspere, and far-fetched facts, with wondrous speculation, are triumphantly related as proof that one did not write and the other did.

A late writer in the Manhattan concludes that Shakspere could not hav composed the Sonnets because of his poor education and opportunities. What Latin could he hav known? He had access only to Lilly's Latin grammar, all in Latin. What law could he hav known? Yet he writes as though he understood law. He was never even a lawyer's clerk. Therefore he could not hav written the works of Shakspere. This is said in spite of an every-day experience of the, shall I say supernatural, power of genius. One might say of Blind Tom, What music has he ever studied? We are speaking of one to whom the term "universal genius" in its broadest sense applies; to whom his every-day acquaintances gave the name, "myriad-minded;" not only

> "Nature's darling child,
> Warbling nativ wood-notes wild,"

but one who, as Bacon describes the spider, hanging in mid-air from his self-woven web, draws from himself all the material for habitation, production, subsistence, and daily exercise. Of this power of genius to rise above environs let Burns furnish example—the inspired clodhopper, whose ornate, polished verses are even among his best, art not quenching his light and heat. One year of intercourse with the better educated made him a master. As to language, let the once notorious Eugene Aram illustrate—he got hold of Lilly's Latin grammar, and though it was in a "language unintelligible, every word in it Latin, learned it by heart; the same with Camden's Greek grammar, equally unintelligible, till," says the biographer, "this self-taught classic by mere chance unfolded the meaning of a few classic lines and then with rapid steps advanced to the comprehension of the more difficult authors, till all the stores of Latin and Greek literature were unfolded to his understanding. He also mastered Hebrew." But why go on? History and experience are full of examples. Indeed, we may well suspect that our fault is too much art, too little nature. Among all the singers of the past, who stands higher than Capparaelli? He lived and sang to a very great age, dying in 1783, at the age of eighty years. Writers say his success was due to the course taken by his teacher, the great Porpora. For five years he kept him singing nothing but little sets of scales on a small bit of paper. Finally, during the sixth year, the youth was utterly discouraged, and broke out passionately, "Do you believe it likely I will ever get beyond the merest rudiments of the art?" Porpora for a long time had been looking for this, but quietly. "Now," said he, "young man, you can leave me. I hav nothing more to teach you, for you are to-day the greatest singer in all the world." And he was! The truth is, all the great excellences of man come from within. The rudiments merely show how to evolve these.

But forsooth, says my Manhattan critic, Shakspere was not even a lawyer's clerk. How could he write so lawyer-like? He had but Lilly's Latin grammar, all Latin, and a few oral lessons from a a stupid teacher of a hedge school. How could he quote Latin? Here is criticism for us on the deductiv plan. We all know how misleading that plan has been in the sciences. And these critics would take the anti-Baconian method, and prove Bacon to be the real Shakspere. In the same way many exclaim, "How could Patrick Henry, been a polished orator and profound statesman? He read nothing but Livy, and passed his days dreaming in the woods, or lounging along streams, or loafing with crowds of common people in country stores, relating tales to wondering clodhoppers, playing upon their passions." The critic did not suspect that this man was daily, for twenty years, singing the little scale that fitted him to become the greatest of living orators, and, as time is beginning to show, of statesmen, too. When he was called upon the larger stage to play his part, his audience was, after all, of the same human nature as the peasants whose hearts he had so long studied, and his country only a new Rome whose foundations were to be laid with due regard to the lessons of history.

But, after all, the best evidence, if any is required, as to the authorship of Shakspere, is found in the tributes paid to his memory by his personal friends. I venture this assertion, that as Shakspere was probably the greatest mind of any age, the panegyrics of his contemporaries were worthy of him, and such as never before or since hav been composed over any human being. There are those of whom more extensiv praises hav been proclaimed, but never in any instance has any reputation called forth such high eulogiums from his acquaintances and immediate friends and followers.

Let us examin some of them, and then ask whether it be possible they could hav been written of a myth, or of a pretender, whose very presence must hav proclaimed him a fraud.

Twelve years after Shakspere had been engaged as a writer of plays, F. Meres published his "Wit's Treasury," a work comparing the English authors with the ancients. At one place he says, "As Plautus and Terence are accounted best for comedy and tragedy among the Latins, so Shakspere among the English is most excellent in both kinds for the stage." He enumerates his "Gentlemen of Verona," "Love's Labor Lost," "Comedy of Errors," "Love Won," "Midsummer Night's Dream," "Merchant of Venice," "Richard II.," "Richard III.," "Titus Andronicus," "King John," "Henry VIII.," and "Romeo and Juliet."

In 1598, Richard Bamfield, in "Remembrance of some English Poets," says:

> "And Shakspere, thou whose honey-flowing vein,
> . . . . . .
> Whose 'Venus,' and whose 'Lucrece,' sweet and chaste,
> Thy name in Fame's immortal book hav placed,
> Liv ever—you at least in fame liv ever.
> Well may thy body die, but fame die never."

And there are many like references.

Among the papers of Lord Ellesmere is a letter from Lord Southampton, in which, among references to other persons, he speaks of Shakspere as a most worthy man, "and the writer of some of our best English plays, which, as your lordship knoweth, were most singularly liked of Queen Elizabeth."

The Rev. John Ward, who lived in Shakspere's nativ town, and wrote a diary of affairs from 1648, refers to Shakspere as a once well-known person there, "who wrote for the stage two plays every year [perhaps in his later days], and for it had an allowance so large, I hav heard, he spent at the rate of a thousand pounds a year."

During Shakspere's life an anonymous writer published some verses in which Shakspere is represented as

> "He that from Helicon sounds many a rill
> Whose nectared veins are drunk by thirsty men.
> Crowned be his style with Fame, his head with bays."

Within four or five years after his death a monument was erected to his memory.

Digges, in a preface to his plays, in 1623, seven years after his death, says of this monument:

> "When that stone is rent,
> And time dissolves thy Stratford monument,
> Here we alone shall know thee still."

On the monument referred to, and below the bust of Shakspere, is a tablet inscribed:

> "Read, if thou canst, whom envious Death has placed > Within this monument: Shakspere! with whom
> Quick nature died, whose name doth deck ye tomb,
> Far more than cost, sith all that he hath writ;
> Leaves living Art but page to serve his wit."

In an age when pictures and busts were rare, it is surprising how many were left of this man Shakspere.

A folio edition of Shakspere, 1623, has a likeness, and these lines by Ben Johnson, the illustrious contemporary and intimate friend of Shakspere:

> "This figure that thou here seest put,
> It was for gentle Shakspere cut.
> Therein the graver had a strife
> With nature, to outdo the life.
> Oh, could he but hav drawn his wit
> As well in brass as he hath hit
> His face! The print would then surpass
> All that was ever writ in brass."

There are little squibs, verses, hits by Shakspere; and always in character. Says the critic, he could not hav composed the elegant, chaste lines of the Sonnets, "Lucrece," etc.

Look at these lines on the monument of Sir Thomas Stanley, in Tongue Church, which we are assured on the unimpeachable authority of Dugdale "were made by the late famous tragedian, Shakspere:"

> "Not monumental stone preserves our fame,
> Nor sky-aspiring pyramids our name.
> The memory of him for whom this stands
> Shall outliv marble and defacers' hands.
> When all to Time's consumption shall be given,
> Stanley, for whom this stands, shall stand in heaven."

Shakspere all over, with his glories and his faults.

What a mysterious creature was this "Shakscene," of whom modern mule-nest finders hav made a nonentity; so well known to the daily life of his own time; of whom hundreds of portraits were made, several monuments, innumerable verses; in whose name so many poems and dramas were published; whose friends so admired living, and worshiped dead! No Man in the Iron Mask, but it was reserved for our day to thus disguise him.

Scarcely was this fabulous creature; this common, ill-educated, and uneducated person; this fellow who, living, had permitted grand works to pass under his name; this humbug almighty, borne to the tomb, ere his fame was memorized in such verses as the like never honored human being by those who had been his daily intimates, or his later contemporaries. As thus:

> "What need my Shakspere for his honored bones
> The labor of an age in piled stones?"
> "Dear Son of Memory! Great Heir of Fame!
> What needs then such dull witness of thy name?
> Thou in our wonder and astonishment
> Hast built thyself a lasting monument,
> And so sepulchered in such pomp dost lie,
> That kings for such a tomb would wish to die."

Another says:

> "This book, when brass and marble fade, shall make thee look fresh to all ages."
> "Be sure, our Shakspere, thou canst never die,
> But, crowned with laurels, liv eternally."

One of the few immortal ones, Ben Jonson, a rival, and familiar friend, writes that he honored him "this side of idolatry," and thus worthily composed an obituary:

> "Soul of the age!
> The applause, delight, and wonder of our stage,
> My Shakspere, rise! I will not lodge thee by > Chaucer or Spenser, or bid Beaumont lie
> A little farther off to make thee room.
> Thou art a monument without a tomb!"

Search all the records of the past and find me such eulogies, warm from the heart and glowing from the imaginations of great appreciating souls who knew the man face to face, soul to soul.

Again of him is written:

"He was not for an age, but for all time.
. . . Nature herself was proud of his designs.
Sweet swan of Avon! . . .
But stay! I see thee in the hemisphere,
Advanced and made a constellation there."

Soon after Shakspere's death, Puritanism-like, another deluge overwhelmed all the world of art. For music there was howling; for laughter, scowling; for dancing, praying. Poetry was regarded as vice, and play-going as the sin against the Holy Ghost. In the old world of fancy all that breathed, perished. No wonder that in Charles II.'s day play-goers, like Pepys, supposed that Shakspere's plays were being acted for the first time. And yet, amid the dark of that solemn, gloomy time, Shakspere was known to the greatest scholars; his life and memory were vividly recalled by those who, as children, might hav known him personally. Milton calls him

"Sweetest Shakspere, Fancy's child,
Warbling nativ wood-notes wild."

Gray writes of him:

"In thy green lap was Nature's Darling laid;
What time the lucid Avon strayed;
To him the Mighty Mother did unveil
Her awful face. The dauntless child Stretched forth his little arms and smiled."

Collins said:

"The muse, blushing, hides her wreath at Shakspere's name;
No second growth our western isles could bear;
At once exhausted with too rich a gem."

Churchill said:

"In the first seat sat Shakspere.
He looked through Nature at a single view,
And taught new worlds to rise, new suns to roll,
And passing Nature's bounds was something more."

But why go on quoting? Away with all dull-edged speculation about Shakspere's learning and certain impossibilities. That word genius solves the whole question. And Shakspere's genius has been, by his contemporaries, described as "myriad minded"—genius that sees all, hears all, comprehends all, and forgets nothing. We explain the phenomenon, Blind Tom, or Colburn, by this word, and must solve the problem given us by the true poet in the same way, although Ben Jonson says of Shakspere:

"A good Poet's made as well as born;
And such wert thou! Even so the race
Of Shakspere's mind and memory brightly shines
In his well-turned and true-filed lines."

In Memory of Paine.

THE DAY IN CHICAGO.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Since the Radical Review suspended, the Liberals of Chicago will hav to look to THE TRUTH SEEKER for their means of communication and information as to the trend of the Liberal movement. Our League has had more entertainments and dancing parties this winter than ever before, and although they hav not netted as much financially, nor appeared to pay for the efforts incurred, they hav attracted young people to the League, and that is the chief aim of the president. Several ladies hav given receptions, card-parties, sociables, etc., at their residences, and we hav just concluded the grandest Thomas Paine festival ever held in this city. The following from the Inter-Ocean of Jan. 30th givs some idea of what the press generally said:

PAINE'S ANNIVERSARY.

The Liberal League last night celebrated the 148th anniversary of "America's Revolutionary Author-Hero and Mental Liberator, Thomas Paine," at Fort Dearborn Hall. The president of the League, Mr. E. A. Stevens, presided, and during the evening some admiring friend sent to the platform a basket of beautiful cut flowers, bearing his name. The hall was decorated with evergreens, quotations from the great Freethinker's works, and the Stars and Stripes. The audience was large and completely filled the building. A short opening address was delivered by the president, who touched but lightly on the life, character, and services of the revolutionary hero, statesman, patriot, and philosopher, gracefully giving way to Mrs. A. M. Freeman, who delivered the oration of the evening.

Words fail me to describe the eloquence, the rhythm, the diction, the animation, and the grace which this gifted poet, authoress, and playwright threw into her grand oration. Mrs. Freeman never uses notes or manuscript, but her lectures and orations flow with an uninterrupted ease, using the finest figures of rhetoric, and the smoothest alliterations. Her outpourings of eloquence are like the murmuring and rippling stream, flowing in silvered beauty through domestic scenery, sylvan shades, and delightful dales. There are a few majestic cataracts, impetuous cascades, but the smooth, flowing notes of a rhythmal chorus are always there. Her literary style is sometimes climacteric and cumulativ, but always elegant and abounding in figurativ yet vigorous language. Added to her natural genius and grace, she possesses the beauty and charm of an "enchantress"—as that word was overheard by the writer, shortly after the oration was finished, while a gentleman was trying to express the effect of the oration and the oratrix upon him. The following ladies and gentlemen took part in the program: Mrs. L. M. Swank, Mrs. Moore and daughters, Messrs. Larsen and Dupuy, C. L. Geiger, Professor Scully, the Boyer children, and Chas. Wood—the last named appearing in costume and taking the parts of Richard III., the ghost, and Catesby in the tent-scene of "Richard III." Charles Wood is a Chicago wonder—a poor colored newsboy and bootblack who was induced to go before Professor Lyman and giv a Shaksperian recitation, never having taken a lesson, and his rendition was so remarkable that Mr. Lyman now has him in training to travel in star parts. His first public appearance was at one of the League entertainments this winter. The other vocalists and elocutionists were chiefly from the finest professional talent of the city. After the oration, the president proposed a resolution of fraternal greeting to the Scandinavian Freethinkers, who for so many years were the only society in Chicago to pay respect to Paine's intellectual and moral worth, by celebrating the day of his birth, and who were then in session in Wolff's Hall, which passed unanimously, and a suitable resolution was returned. Olaf Olson Ray, who delivered the oration at their meeting, is also a member of our League, and has translated all of Ingersoll's lectures into the Scandinavian language.

The hall was then given up to the younger people, who wore the merry hours away with dancing.

Before the dancing concluded the following was passed unanimously:

"Resolved, That we, as Liberals and friends of the Chicago League, return our thanks to the president, E. A. Stevens, for the efforts he has used on this occasion to make this anniversary so enjoyable to all its participants."

Now I hav to relate something that is not so pleasant, but it has, fortunately for the League, been brought to a satisfactory conclusion after a very determined struggle. In this matter let the Chicago press tell the story.

TOO LIBERAL FOR THEM.—MEMBERS OF THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OBJECT TO INCENDIARY UTTERANCES OF ANARCHISTS.

From the Chicago Daily News, Jan. 24th.

Over the signature of President E. A. Stevens, it is announced that the usual Sunday-evening meeting of the Liberal League will not take place to-morrow evening, owing to the preparations which are being made for the anniversary of the death of Thomas Paine for Thursday night. On the other hand, there is an announcement, which is not signed, that there will be a meeting at Liberal League Hall Sunday evening, at which August Spies will speak on scientific Socialism, "other notices to the contrary notwithstanding."

Mr. Stevens was much perturbed to-day over the publication of the latter announcement. He asserted that it was unauthorized by the League, and said, furthermore, that Mr. Spies was not a member of that body. In explanation of his announcement that there would be no meeting of the League to-morrow evening, Mr. Stevens said that a majority of the members were opposed to the utterances of one or two dynamiters at the meeting. For some time these men had been permitted to speak, but latterly their utterances had been more and more incendiary in tone, and the liberty allowed them had been perverted into license. According to Mr. Stevens, the self-respecting members of the League were disgusted with this wild talk, and many kept away from the meetings. Mr. Stevens says that most of them believe social reform necessary, but think it should be brought about by the exercise of the franchise. They threatened to invoke the aid of the police to expel the objectionable members in case they persisted in attempting to make their inflammatory harangs at the next meeting. A caucus was held last night, and as it is desired to avoid any trouble until after the celebration of the Paine anniversaay set for next Thursday evening, it was decided not to hold the usual meeting to-morrow evening. Mr. Stevens said the committee had authorized him to make the announcement.

August Spies, one of the members of the German dynamite party, said he is not a member of the Liberal League, and had nothing to do with the making of either announcement. He had been invited by a member of the committee on lectures to speak to-morrow evening and had chosen the subject of scientific Socialism. He understood that certain members of the League objected to President Stevens's rulings, which they considered arbitrary and partial, and had decided to call a meeting without consulting him.

A BREAK IN THEIR RANKS.—SOME MEMBERS OF THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OFFEND OTHERS BY TALKING SOCIALISM.

From the Chicago Daily News, Jan. 26th.

Fort Dearborn Hall was well filled last evening despite the announcement made by E. A Stevens, president of the Liberal League, that the usual meeting would be omitted. William F. Fury, one of the vice-presidents, took the chair in the absence of the president with a suitable apology. Mr. Simpson, acting secretary, said that Mr. Stevens had promised to pay the janitor for the hall if he would keep the doors locked. Samuel Fielden said that a president who attempted to stifle free discussion was not fit to be at the head of such an institution as the Liberal League, and moved a vote of lack of confidence. George A. Schilling said that Stevens had usurped the privileges of the association. A motion to postpone the matter for a week was then adopted.

August Spies delivered a lecture on "Scientific Socialism." [Then followed a brief report of lecture and the debate.]

E. A. Stevens, president of the League, was seen after the meeting and said that not more than ten members of the League had attended last night's lecture. There had been an attempt on the part of the Anarchists and dynamiters to monopolize the talking at meetings, and bring a lot of claquers to applaud their sentiment, until a greater part of the members of the League had ceased in disgust to attend. The constitution of the League provides that the charter may be revoked whenever the objects for which it is created are perverted. The objects are the secularization of the government, and the abolition of all recognition of religion by the state. The constitution provides that lectures shall be given under the management of a lecture committee. The committee met on Friday night, and decided not to hav any lecture Sunday night, on account of an anticipated disturbance by them, some of whom threatened that if they could not hav their Anarchism ventilated, they would organize a "guerrilla warfare." Yet the other crowd managed to get the hall last night by representing, Mr. Stevens says, that a majority of the members wanted to hold a meeting.

On Thursday, January 29th, a meeting of the board of directors was called, and the following motions passed with but one dissenting vote:

1. That there should be no lecture Sunday, February 1st—nothing but a business meeting of members.
2. That the president be authorized to advertise the same, and invite only members good on the books.
3. That the president be authorized to take such steps as will exclude from the hall persons who are not legitimate voters.
4. That the board of directors approve the action of the president in postponing the meeting of Sunday, January 25th.

ALL IS PEACEFUL AND SERENE.—BUT IT WAS A HARD FIGHT WHILE IT LASTED.—A QUESTION OF DYNAMITE.

From Chicago Herald, Feb. 2d.

All that was needed to complete the fun at last night's meeting of the Liberal League was the introduction of a dynamite bomb. It was dynamiter against anti-dynamiter—which should control the League—and the anti-dynamiters won. At a special meeting called by the secretary, last week Sunday, the dynamiters were out in full force, and passed resolutions breathing blood and thunder and denouncing the president for pledging the League to a peace policy. Last night the meeting was a turbulent one. It was understood that it was to be a fight for the future policy of the League. A number of members had been admitted at the special meeting, and they all came up to vote last night. But the regulars refused to admit them to the hall. They stormed the door and tried to batter it down, but were driven back. Then the dyamiters within the meeting attempted to shout down the peace faction. They moved to lay motions on the table and to adjourn, they shouted out objections, they called for divisions, they tried to out-talk their opponents. In none of these were they successful. The peace party, by a large majority, passed a resolution indorsing the action of President Stevens. The secretary was censured for having called the special meeting. Then the meeting adjourned. The resolution passed was as follows:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting that the discussion of dynamite as a factor for adjusting real or imaginary evil is injurious to the interests of the Chicago Liberal League, and we, as members, deprecate any effort to force such discussions on this society, founded, as it is, for the dissemination of other principles."

THE CELEBRATION AT PITTSBURGH, PA.

From the Pittsburgh Daily Post.

The Pittsburgh Liberal League and the friends of Freethought celebrated the 148th anniversary of the birthday of the author-hero, Thomas Paine, at Lafayette Hall. The program was a varied one, and was of both social and literary character, Staley's orchestra rendered a number of classical selections, and later in the evening furnished the music for the dance.

There were present about three hundred Liberals and their friends who had come to honor the memory of Paine, who stands distinctivly and pre-eminently the forerunner and expounder of the doctrins of the Liberals of America. His revolutionary career tinges his history with an interest to Americans that no other man holding his views has been able to excite.

The stage, which was decorated for the occasion, bore on the right a portrait of Paine, standing with hand uplifted toward the sun of Justice and Liberty, and beneath his feet the emblems of superstition. On the left was displayed the portrait of Gen. Guiseppe Garibaldi, the Italian hero and liberator.

Professor William Seymour opened the exercises by a brief introductory address, in which he touched upon the general character of Paine. He requested that those within his hearing would throw away dark religious beliefs, and if they were members of a religious denomination to forget it for the time being and join in the occasion which honored the man who uttered the sentiment, "The world is my country, to do good my religion." As a progressionist, he said he did not believe in perfect men, and he would not hold Paine up as a perfect man. But the man had been fearless in announcing what has since been demonstrated to be the truth, though it brought upon him a torrent of abuse which none but a hero could hav withstood and conquered.

He then introduced the speaker of the evening, Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel, wife of Judge Arnold Krekel, of Kansas City, Mo. She is a large, shapely woman, with brilliant and determined-looking eyes. The lineaments of her face denote strong characteristics, and her hair is just beginning to silver. She was dressed in a plain suit of black velvet, and wore no ornaments except a single breastpin clasped at her throat and a jeweled ring upon her left hand. Her voice is pitched rather high, but during a lengthy oration she showed no evidence of fatigue. Her delivery is deliberate and ornamented with but few gestures.

In opening her remarks she alluded more particularly to the doctrins of Liberalism than to anything concerning Paine. In drawing historical comparisons she said that those who stand nearest to and are intimately associated with the great minds of any age generally fail to fully understand the magnitude of their works or the depths of their thoughts. One hundred years from now John Brown will be looked upon as a second savior by those who recall his history in connection with the events which hav transpired within our knowledge. Paine is now beginning to stand in his proper light before people with liberality of thought.

When the times are ripe for a leader, the mind fitted to supply the demand will be projected into the world. This was the case with Thomas Paine. As far as his personal life was concerned it was commonplace, and subject to the human frailties of all mortals. But in the face of the bitterest denunciation he dared to sow the seeds of what he believed to be right.

During his services in the cause of American freedom, his religious views were not questioned, but afterward the weapon of slander was raised against him, and with it he has been hounded for over a hundred years, both dead and alive. When he had come to the relief of a suffering people the church would not forgiv him for his utterances, but the day has dawned when liberty of thought does not ask or need the forgivness of the church.

Paine was a man of three countries, all of which disowned him. England never forgave him because he labored for the success of American independence. France never forgave him for his mercy in trying to save the life of Louis XVI. America disowned him because he tried to disenthrall men's minds as he had their bodies. In closing, Mrs. Krekel said: "Those who hav been loudest in the denunciation of Paine are those who know least about his writings. But the veil of falsehood which has been thrown over the life of Paine shall be lifted, and we shall see how unjust has been the judgment which distorted his character. The trenches dug by theological tools to bury Paine will be filled up. What grander figure stands before us than that of heroic Thomas Paine, who fought for liberty in three different lands, a leader and a teacher?

Paine has been martyred, not by the fagot, but his bones hav been dragged from the grave and burnt in theological slow fires. But in the broader light of Liberalism his spirit will come back clothed in the living flesh of justice to humanity."

After the applause following the close of Mrs. Krekel's oration had subsided, Maggie Bailey, a charming little miss, recited the pathetic poem of "Sister and I."

The floor was cleared for dancing, and the social festivities of the evening held sway. The younger ones glided through the mazes of the dance to the music of the band, while the sedate entertained themselvs in quieter sociability.

At midnight an elegant banquet was served, during which the following toasts were responded to: "Thomas Paine," Professor William Seymour; "Paine's Contemporaries," Scott Douthitt; "The Liberal League," Mr. E. A. Wood; "Hypatia and Bruno," Harry Hoover; "Woman," Frank Gessner; "Man," Mrs. Mattie Krekel.

After the literary exercises a large quantity of Liberal literature was exposed for sale, including all of Paine's works and other authors, and the current publications indorsed by the apostles of Liberalism.

The Liberal Club.

It was so ordered (under providence) that the 365th regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club should be one of great interest. The evening was cold, and the attendance was chiefly male. Mr. J. B. Gardner lectured on "Alcohol, the Real, True, Unmitigated Devil." It had been some little time since an unmitigated devil had been introduced to the club; hence the interest.

The lecturer, being duly presented to the audience, explained that devils, according to Swedenborg, were not necessarily personal. He then described the sensations which a drinker experiences in passing from ebriety to inebriety. These are accompanied by various illusions, and prove the truth of the Bible statement that "wine deceiveth him that drinketh." Liquor had been known since the days of Noah and Lot, and how much longer it was impossible to state. Ardent spirits were used by the first experimenters in chemistry. Galen, in the second century, prescribed brandy for a voracious appetite. The Spartans had a custom of intoxicating their slaves to illustrate to the rising generation what a fool a man would make of himself when he was full; and an ancient humorist recommended that the upper part of a shoe should be made from the mouth of a hard drinker, because that was never known to admit water. Liquor affected different races in different degrees. For instance, an amount which taken inside an Eskimo would scarcely produce exhilaration, would paralyze a Hindoo. It was a delusion, the lecturer said, to suppose that alcohol was a food. In $233.60 worth of Bavarian beer, subjected to analysis, there had been found the nutritiv constituents of a moderate-sized loaf of bread, and a man must drink eight quarts of beer per day for a term of years in order to imbibe the nutriment contained in a sirloin steak. The speaker held the priests and doctors mainly responsible for the continued use of alcoholic beverages, and the example of the moderate drinker was worse than that of the inebriate.

At the close of the lecture Mr. King was called for, but did not respond. Mr. Wakeman observed that while Mr. King—who was not to be readily found because of smallness of stature—was being searched for, he would call attention to the reporter of THE TRUTH SEEKER (which paper all should read), who was of larger proportions. That individual had reported Mr. Wakeman as saying, in his speech at the Paine celebration, that Webster must hav known that the Fugitiv Slave law was unconstitutional. This was erroneous. Mr. Wakeman did not believe that Webster would stand up and defend an unconstitutional law if he knew it to be such, and he (Mr. Wakeman) had made no such statement. The reporter would here say, parenthetically, that undoubtedly Mr. Wakeman is correct, although several persons understood him to speak as reported. The writer of the account of the Paine celebration took no notes at the time. He was one of the committee of arrangements, escorted two engaging young ladies to the hall, and, if the complainant had been observing, he would hav noticed that the reporter's time was altogether taken up. As a lawyer and jurisprudent, Mr. Wakeman must be forced to admit that these are mitigating circumstances which will stand both in law and equity. The speech was a good one, and deserved a fuller report than the crowded columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER would permit.

Mr. Wakeman said that he wished both Paine and Webster could hav listened to Mr. Gardner's lecture, taken it to heart, and put its teachings in practice. Alcohol was certainly the prince of devils, and had no redeeming qualities. Temperance was not the word to use in connection with ardent spirits. Total abstinence should alone be spoken of. Liberals were free from the old theological devil, but they are now confronted by a worse one—the Demon of Drink. In this matter the lawyers were bad, the ministers were worse, but the doctors were the very worst. The sacramental wine used in communion and mass was an evil which the church should get rid of, but the prescriptions of doctors were an abomination which it was beyond the power of the speaker to describe. He wished it understood, however, that he did not favor the measures advocated by the prohibitionists. Mr. Wakeman spoke earnestly and impressivly, as every man must feel inspired to do when discussing this question.

Dr. Weeks followed. There was a community of Mormons in Scranton, Pa., from whom the church should learn a useful lesson. These Mormons use water in their communion service. They justifiy this on the ground that from Christ's side flowed both blood and water, and they were permitted to take their choice, and preferred water. The doctor recommended water sweetened with molasses. The speaker further said that it was a mistake to suppose that alcohol was a stimulant. It was a poison and an irritant.

Mr. Graham made some semi-amusing remarks. The subject, he thought, had not been treated with fairness. He was not in favor of drunkenness, but would like to see cultivated in men that quality known as manhood, so that a man might pass a grog-shop without going in, or might go in and drink without getting drunk.

Dr. Lambert read some extracts from eminent physicians to show the evil and useless character of alcohol. Nearly one-half the wealth produced yearly in this nation was expended for liquor and tobacco. Out of $3,500,000,000, he claimed, $1,500,000,000 goes in this way. This material is mainly used by the men, so that but $2,000,000,000 is left to be divided between the sexes for useful purposes. Woman, therefore, got the benefit of but a half of one-half of the money expended, which was but one-half of her just due. The doctor wondered why women should fool away their time contending for the privilege of the ballot, which was not worth having anyway, when they should be opposing this great evil. A lady here arose and was understood to say that when women came to vote, legislation on the liquor question would be different.

Mr. Gardner closed the discussion by correcting those who had misunderstood him.

There were various incidents during this meeting. The lecturer claimed, in one part of his address, that the use of intoxicants was as habitual with the gentle sex as with the male biped. This Madam Delescluze denied with considerable vehemence of language. Her female acquaintances were numerous, but there was none among them who drank liquor. Again, the lecturer said that poverty among workingmen was due to indolence and general laziness. This statement was received with tokens of manifest disapproval.

The Kramer brothers, each one of whom looks as much like the other as like himself, sang with manly voices a song to the tune of "Coronation." These gentlemen wish to encourage volunteer singers to enlist for Mr. Reynolds's tent campaign. They would be valuable auxiliaries to such an enterprise.

Mrs. Dr. Herrick will next week point out the "Obstacles to a Higher Civilization."

Lectures and Meetings.

MRS. A. H. COLBY is speaking for the Spiritualists of Portland, Maine, during February. Her address is in care of T. P. Beal of that city.

W. S. BELL gave a course of five lectures in Durand, Ill., the last ending with the Paine celebration, and on the 1st instant gave two lectures at Chebanse, Ill.

THURSDAY, the 12th, and Friday the 13th, at two and eight P.M., the New York State Woman Suffrage Association convenes at Steinway Hall, this city. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, Lillie Devereaux Blake, and other notable advocates of the cause make addresses.

MESSRS. WATTS AND PUTNAM will be at Cleveland, O., tomorrow, the 15th. During the week Mr. Watts will giv a course of lectures at Upper Sandusky, Ohio, the 17th to 20th inclusiv. Our readers living in the vicinity of these places will do well to make arrangements for attending. The League Secretary and first vice president are hard at work, speaking nearly every night, and they should be supported and encouraged by large audiences. The Nine Demands of Liberalism must hav a strong public sentiment in their favor before we can expect their accomplishment, and this public sentiment must be created by Freethought lectures and the circulation of Freethought journals and other literature. The sense of fair play inherent in the American people will insure the final adoption of our platform if they can be made acquainted with the true status of religion in this country, and how it is in reality a government-subsidized institution instead of as it should be, if it exist at all, a voluntary association of similarly-minded people. To forward this Freethought propagandism, the Liberals of the country should, whenever possible, engage Messrs. Watts and Putnam for one or more lectures.

The League President.

From the following note from the first vice-president of the League, we judge that we shall next week hav the pleasure of printing Col. Ingersoll's first official communication to the League:

"PITTSBURGH, Feb. 9, 1885.

"MY DEAR EDITOR: I hav great pleasure in announcing in THE TRUTH SEEKER that Col. Robert G. Ingersoll has accepted the presidency of the National Liberal League. Next week fuller particulars will be given. CHARLES WATTS."

News and Notes from the Field.

In our pursuit of truth and description of its progress we hav somewhat forgotten the world of art. Truth, however barren it may seem at first, leads, in the final result, to the noblest poetry, and our pathway as pioneers is not altogether unadorned with glimpses of that beauty which must come from a regenerated world. All over the land we hav had Paine jubilees, and with their brilliant accompaniments of song, and dance, and bright speech, new hope springs within our hearts.

Linesville, Altoona, and Pittsburgh hav sent their fires forth, and added nobly to the general illumination.

Mr. M. H. Hamlin and daughter, of Greenville, Pa., furnished excellent music at the Linesville celebration. They are skilful players as well as outspoken Freethinkers. Nevertheless, the orthodox are very glad to employ their talents in the musical line, not realizing how much heresy there may be in their strains. Unconsciously, music will liberalize the human soul, and while the preacher is thundering about hell-fire in the pulpit, the Freethinker in the choir is demolishing all his theology with the rhythmical voice of nature. I think friend Hamlin has put a good deal of Freethought into his notes, and preached to the congregation with more potent eloquence than the minister.

I must not forget the pictures and mottoes presented to the Linesville Liberal League by Miss Martha Brockway, of Jamestown, Pa., the work of her own hands. She is a gifted artist touched by the genius of Freethought. One motto skilfully wrought in graceful foliage, is from Thomas Paine: "One schoolmaster is worth a hundred priests;" and another is from Thales, the noble philosopher who lived 650 years before Christ, and who said, "Avoid doing what you blame in others." There are also excellent crayons of Ingersoll, Denton, and others of our leaders. So the flowers of art flash over our advancing way.

I found another gift, at Altoona, from some unknown friend to the secretary of the National League, and so I suppose the genius of poesy sent this by express, or Eve, alias, Adam's Express Company—forwarded it for the general good. I shall accept these painted flowers as indication that many hearts, all over the land, desire that our thorny pathway in the vanguard of Liberalism be cheered with nature's sweetest aspects, and that the "winter of our discontent" be followed with the brightness of summer's laurels; and so we will hope on, and bear many discomforts, while such happy omens cheer our course.

Our Altoona friends are of the right sort, and I hav great faith in their future work. Louis Plack, John R. Kemp, and Mr. Cline are thorough-going Liberals both in head and heart, and will help on the cause with generous devotion. Mr. Watts and myself enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. Plack while at Altoona, and we found a good resting-place and plenty of cheer in his elegant home—the spirit of democracy and true liberty in the midst of wealth and fortune.

We are now among our famous allies of the Pittsburgh League, who are full of enthusiasm and ready to lend a hand. We shall hav much to say of them when our week's labors are over.

Mr. Watts lectures on Thursday and Friday evenings at Waynesburgh, Pa.; at Monongahela City, on Saturday evening. I lecture, Sunday morning, before the Pittsburgh League; Mr. Watts lectures in the afternoon and in the evening at Allegheny City, and on Monday evening again in Pittsburgh. On Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, Feb. 11th and 12th, he lectures at Alliance, Ohio, and on Thursday and Friday evenings at Massilon. On Feb. 17th, 18th, 19th, and 20th, he will lecture at Upper Sandusky, Ohio. A certain Major or Gen'l Gibson in that region has been attempting to reply to Ingersoll, and has expressed his willingness to meet any representativ man on our side. So a challenge has been issued to this doughty warrior to meet Mr. Watts. If he does so, you may be sure we shall hav a lively report to giv of the combat. At any rate, an opportunity will be given the orthodox to show their colors, and if they refuse, we shall demonstrate their cowardice. Time will tell whether this champion of Christianity has the courage of his conviction or not.

A like challenge has also been issued to the clergymen of Pittsburgh, and, from signs in the air, I shouldn't wonder if we had a field-day of debate next Sunday.

We hav had quite a lively time in Waynesburg, a quiet village of about 2,500 inhabitants, among the hills of Southern Pennsylvania, near the Virginia line. Here is where H. Clay Luse livs—a fiery young Liberal, born of radical Abolitionists, and so he has good blood in him for reform. He is author of that bright little book, "An Antidote Analyzed." He, with his father, Samuel Luse, and uncle, Henry Luse, are the main promoters of every advance movement, and keep the town wide awake, although the ministers would like to hav it as sleepy as Rip Van Winkle. Mr. Watts gave his first lecture on Thursday evening. A good audience was present. The town hall was nearly full, and I should judge that about half were orthodox. They all paid strict attention to the discourse, which was pronounced even by the Christians themselvs to be the best they had ever listened to from a Secular platform.

After the lecture, a challenge was issued to the clergymen present. This was responded to by a Dr. Miller, who at first seemed to be quite cheery and smooth, and though an old-fashioned Presbyterian minister, and president of a college, declared that the lecture was almost as good as a Christian sermon, and really strengthened his faith. Its morality was like that of the Bible. As for science, he admitted its marvelous service, but without a blush affirmed that Christianity was the source of science. He also slyly confessed that Mr. Watts was a good man, and would no doubt be saved on the ground of his morality, only he was quite curious to know what would become of the thieves, murderers, etc. He evidently thought that he was dealing with a novice in the person of our vice-president, and seeing the splendid effect of Mr. Watts's eloquence, wanted to be "devilish sly," and scoop it all in to the credit of Christianity. Watts utterly demolished these pretensions, and showed that orthodox Christianity was utterly opposed, both in morality and philosophy, to Secularism; that the former could claim neither sound morality nor knowledge, for it had always put itself in opposition to these, and only adopted good things on compulsion, because if it didn't, the world would utterly ignore its theological claims. Mr. Watts challenged Dr. Miller to debate these very points, and show whether Christianity could stand at the bar of reason and vindicate its value to human progress.

Dr. Miller found that he had been caught in his own trap. Then the tiger came out, and he incontinently "gave himself away" by saying that the lecture was a tissue of falsehood from beginning to end, and that Mr. Watts did not know what he was talking about, thus saying the very opposit of what he had first affirmed. His litttle game was a failure, and the smile that was "childlike and bland" was succeeded by the grinding of teeth, as if he would like to burn Mr. Watts, who quickly took him on his new tack and challenged him to prove the falsity of anything that had been said. Dr. Miller said that he wasn't prepared for debate. "Not prepared?" said Watts; "why, I am prepared in five minutes to meet any or all of the ministers who attack those principles which I believe to be true and good. You hav studied Christianity for thirty years or more, are president of a college, a minister of the gospel which you say is absolutely necessary to the salvation of the world, of those who are here present, men and women, and yet on an open platform you dare not defend those principles. Do you not know what they are? Can't you state them? Can't you giv reasons for your belief? Can't you try and convince your neighbors, who will be damned according to your creed if they don't accept it? Not ready for debate! Well, I will giv you twenty-four hours in which to prepare, and will meet you here to-morrow evening, and you shall hav as much of the time as I, and let us settle who is right in this matter. Come on."

The reverend gentleman was nonplussed. He was in a box and knew it. He squirmed mightily. Of course he wanted to avoid debate. But he had forced the issue and he must meet it, or gracefully, like a gentleman, back down and confess defeat. This, of course, his orthodox soul did not wish to do, and for a while he was puzzled as to how to save his skin. At last he made the following desperate proposition whose unequivocal meanness could hav been born only of one who regarded King David, the liar and the murderer, as a man after God's own heart. He said that he could not debate with Mr. Watts, but that he would debate with anyone who would bring credentials—he did not say from whom, but I suppose from the Cumberland Presbyterian church—that his opponent was, first, a man of moral character; second, a man of scholastic attainments; and thirdly, a man who was acknowledged to be a representativ of his class. Everybody could at once see that this was merely a blind, couched, however, in terms of coarse insult. Dr. Miller thought to escape, but he only jumped out of the frying-pan into the fire. The scathing he received from Mr. Watts was simply terrific, and I guess he will remember it as long as he livs. The sympathy of the audience was entirely with Mr. Watts, with the exception of a few students who came, no doubt, to see their president wear the laurels of victory; and, instead, had to see him roasted over a logical fire, with every evidence that he did not enjoy the operation a bit. The reverend scholastic had said that Mr. Watts was ignorant of the Bible. Mr. Watts dared him to come upon the platform and repeat scripture texts right then and there, from Genesis to Revelation, and see who could giv the most of the Bible, himself or Mr. Watts. This pleased the audience mightily. The minister hid his head. He had no concordance with him, and had, by his silence, to confess that the skeptic knew more of the Bible than he did. The people dispersed with great excitement, and all the next day the streets were full of talk. The Christians admitted that their man was badly used up, and hardly knew whether to make another trial or not, for Dr. Miller was about the biggest gun they had, and if he was so woefully discomfited, what would become of the lesser lights?

The hall was crowded on Friday evening. The best citizens of the place were present—ministers, lawyers, etc. I gave my lecture on "The Coming Religious Demands." Mr. Watts then delivered a most vigorous and destructiv address on "Christianity and Its Claims." It was welcomed with repeated applause, although this was probably the first time that the majority of the audience had ever listened to such a radical discourse. It shows how wide-spread is the spirit of skepticism and what a faint hold Christianity really has upon the minds of the people; and when the plain truth is spoken, it is readily accepted. No one appeared to defend Christianity. It seemed to be a useless task. Dr. Miller was not present. I presume he had a realizing sense of his incapacity. Like Falstaff, he perceived that discretion was the better part of valor. No doubt, when Mr. Watts is a thousand miles away, he will come out of his hole and bark, to his own satisfaction, of course. I never knew a dog that didn't. But it will hav no effect upon passers-by—only upon those who, like himself, don't know that the sun shines.

Fraternally yours, SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Pennsylvania State Liberal League.

ITS FIRST ANNUAL CONVENTION AT ALTOONA, JAN. 30, 31, AND FEB. 1, 1885.

The Opera House was handsomely decorated for the occasion, the stage adorned with life-size portraits of Thomas Paine, D. M. Bennett, and Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, with handsome and appropriate mottoes. Everything was arranged and in complete readiness on the morning of the Convention. The first meeting was held on Friday evening, January 30th. Few delegates had arrived, but there was good attendance to hear Ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds on the subject of "Salvation," and the meeting was inaugurated under most cheering auspices.

Saturday morning, at 11:30, the Convention was formally opened by First Vice-President Wm. Seymour, of Philadelphia, and the reality of the hard times was impressed by the failure of many Leagues to send full delegations. The secretary (the able, earnest, and devoted Liberal, Harry Hoover, of Pittsburgh) read the minutes of the last year's meeting, when the state League was organized; also the constitution and Nine Demands, after which the usual committees were appointed, and the convention adjourned till 2:30 P.M.

At the afternoon session, very interesting addresses were made by Professor Wm. Seymour, Harry Hoover, C. B. Reynolds, S. P. Putnam, and others, after which the routine order of business was resumed, and the convention proceeded to the election of officers for the ensuing year. The following persons were unanimously elected: President, Wm. Seymour, of Philadelphia; Vice-Presidents, Henry Clay Luse, of Waynesburg; George Thorn, of Clearfield, and J. G. Kline, of Altoona; Treasurer, S. F. DeJones, of Pittsburgh; Executiv Committee, J. R. Perry, of Wilkesbarre, O. H. Wheeler, of Bradford; Roman Staley, of Pittsburgh, and Miss DeLouie, of Philadelphia; Finance Committee, Louis Plack, of Altoona, George Baldwin, of Louisville, and A. Adler, of Lancaster. Mr. Harry Hoover made an eloquent, telling speech, in regard to the necessity of more efficient organization, and in favor of the action already taken in regard to securing and paying an efficient state lecturer and organizer, and called attention to the advisability of this position being held in connection with the secretaryship of the League. Mr. C. B. Reynolds was then unanimously elected state lecturer and organizer.

In response to earnest and repeated calls, Mr. Reynolds said:

"It is not enough to hav grand and noble purposes—they must be faithfully, persistently carried out. The success of the state League depends on the character, zeal, and energy of its individual members. The hardest trial under which the National Liberal League labors is that so large a portion of its membership act as if there was no claim upon them whatever: they hav no duty to do, are under no obligation to make sacrifice or in the least inconvenience themselvs to advance its interests. They fail to realize that to declare themselvs Liberals is to obligate themselvs to cultivate every instrumentality for diffusing the light of truth; that doing justly, loving mercy, and diligently striving to make others happy is what constitutes Liberalism. When Liberalism fails to inspire a spirit of self-sacrifice—an earnest desire to aid and benefit humanity—they may as well crawl back to the creeds of superstition. We hav talent, devotion to truth, love of our fellow-creatures, and the spirit of self-sacrifice in the Liberal ranks fully equal to that in any or all Christian denominations; what is needed is unity on a systematized plan of work, which shall incite all to earnest effort."

Mr. Reynolds then explained the mode of organizing and conducting the local League—the science school on Sunday; the district meeting; how literary socials, dances, and sleighing parties in winter, excursions and picnics in summer, could be made to defray all expenses of local Leagues. He continued:

"Nothing can be done by any state lecturer without the earnest, activ co-operation of the Liberals of the state, nor can good and effectiv work be expected without remuneration. There is no justice in expecting anyone to devote all their time and energies to upbuilding the cause, while others do absolutely nothing. Let all help to the extent of their ability. All are equally benefited by every effort made to popularize Secularism, and should at least be willing to giv half as much to uproot error and plant seeds of truth as they used to giv to uphold priestcraft, ignorance, and superstition. The state of Pennsylvania needs earnest, effectiv work the whole year round. It is for the friends of the cause in Pennsylvania to decide if they will hav the great and sure benefits of tent labor the coming summer. This can only be secured by prompt action, by immediate contribution to the Tent Fund. Let all make an earnest effort, and at once remit to Courtlandt Palmer, No. 850 Broadway, New York. If there is delay, hesitation, the golden opportunity will be past. Act at once. Let it not be proved we are Liberals only in name. Let us sow the good seed of love and truth, and we shall reap a harvest of success—build up our cause, and find surest happiness in thus securing that of our fellow-creatures."

The remarks were well and enthusiastically received, and the long-continued applause evinced the appreciation of the audience of the suggestions made.

If, as is alleged, the prayers of God's people kept Colonel Ingersoll away, then we certainly had another instance of his Satanic majesty defeating the purposes of the great I Am. Ingersoll could not hav made greater impression than did Watts. Never did people listen with more earnest attention; never was speaker more clear, logical, and eloquent, carrying conviction to all, despite the prejudice of creed and belief cherished from childhood.

Just as Mr. Watts reached his final peroration, Mrs. Krekel arrived (came direct from the train to the Opera-House), and at once followed Mr. Watts with a most interesting and able address, which was most enthusiastically received. When it is considered that the lady came under such disadvantages—tired and worn with travel; no moment of rest or refreshment, no time even to collect her thoughts—it is a wonder she could speak at all. Then, too, the great English champion of Secularism is a hard man to follow. The experienced, able, and eloquent men dwarf into pigmies compared with him. Yet this lady, realizing all this, had the noble courage to face the audience, and, by the force of her genius and charms of eloquence, won tributes of admiration and rapturous applause.

Thus was the most melancholy disaster turned into a great and glorious triumph. All were aroused to enthusiasm, and the convention was an assured success.

Sunday morning, Professor Wm. Seymour delivered a very able lecture on Heaven, to quite a large audience.

In the afternoon, at 2:30, long before the appearance of the speakers, the house was filled. The announcement that Mrs. Krekel would speak was alone sufficient to hav filled the theater. But in addition, the genial child of song—who wins the love of all hearts—S. P. Putnam, had been announced to follow Mrs. Krekel, and the very large and intelligent audience were loud in expressions of satisfaction and delight at the dual intellectual treat provided.

The success of the convention, despite all obstacles, filled our good Christian friends with gall and bitterness, and their only relief was the outpouring of smut, and blacking, gross personalities, and perversion of facts by the two little daily papers.

During the convention, the house of a poor colored man caught fire, and his wife and two children perished in the flames. Home, clothing, furniture, provisions—all were consumed.

All the meetings of the Convention except Saturday evening had been free. It was intended to take up a collection on Sunday night to help meet expenses, which had been quite heavy. But in lieu of this an appeal was made and a collection taken for the unfortunate colored brother. The unfortunate man was a devout Christian, but Liberals never ask in regard to the unfortunate, "How about their religious belief?" but "How can we most speedily assist and comfort them?" Thus, with practical evidence of living out the profession of loving mercy and helping our fellow-creatures, this most eventful and successful convention closed.

FRACKVILLE, SCHUYLKILL CO., PA.

From Roulette we went to Port Allegheny and lectured on the 21st and 22d. The Camp Bros., the most enterprising merchants in the place, gave us use of their hall. We found the avowed Liberals consisted of doctors, merchants, and business men, who all proved of the "willing order"—they were willing we should work, get out bills, advertise, and deliver lectures, and pay for everything ourselvs; which we did, and more than willingly left them.

Friday, 23d, we started for Frackville, the great center of coal supply, mining from twelve to fifteen tons of coal per day. Frackille is emphatically a mining village, with something over two thousand inhabitants. We had supposed coal miners were a rough, uncultured, barbarous people, all brawn and little brain. To our surprise, we found them fully as well developed mentally as physically. They compare favorably with any class of skilled labor in culture, refinement, and intelligence. We visited quite a number of families, and found neat and tasty homes, with every comfort—organs, violins, and flutes, many of the young folks being quite accomplished musicians; well-filled book-cases, containing the best scientific and philosophical works and the standard poets and novelists; and these little libraries were not for show, but actual use, as converse with the inmates proved.

Messrs. Phillips, Thomas, and Chappel, the leading men of the place, are actual working miners, yet they hav again and again been elected both on the school board and town council. Their influence and that of their sons and daughters hav Liberalized the community.

We delivered three public lectures—audience increasing at each lecture; on Sunday evening the hall was crowded to excess. In our visits among the friends we laid before them the necessity of organization, and mode of instituting and conducting local Leagues, which at once met hearty approval. Fourteen of the best leading citizens enrolled as members on Tuesday, and we learn that since we left they hav completed organization, elected officers, members of vigilance, educational, and social committees, and elected delegate to Altoona State League Convention.

We are confident of their success. The officers of the Frackville League are: Thomas Phillips, president; Richard Chappel, vice-president; Jas. Thomas, secretary; Mr. Thomas, treasurer. C. B. REYNOLDS, Ch. Ex. Com. N. L. L.

Address all communications for the League to S. P. Putnam, 33 Clinton Place, New York. Drafts, checks, and postal orders should be made payable to Courtlandt Palmer, treasurer N. L. L., 850 Broadway.

Infidel Philosophy.

Every religious enthusiast claims that his particular religion is true, and that every other system is false in whole or in part. Each believes his religion too pure and too sacred to be investigated. Each believes that some Jehovah, Jove, or Lord is the author of his religion, hence to investigate or question the truth of it is to question and dishonor his God.

The more sincere the devotee, the more he will be shocked at the idea of investigation. Not that he will be seriously injured himself, but he is afraid his god will be dishonored. And then, however monstrous his religion may be, he believes that the welfare of the whole human family depends upon its dissemination. Hence every system of unnatural religion has a tendency to clip the wings of thought.

As a matter of fact, scientific investigation must ever be butting against the walls which these unnatural systems hav erected; and hence all systems of supernatural religion must prove the direct foe to science; and hence, as science is the friend of man, and these unnatural systems his most implacable foe, there must ever be an irrepressible conflict between science and these false systems, until the one or the other obtains complete mastery.

What can involve a greater inconsistency than the idea that it is wicked and dangerous to investigate a system of religion which has an all-wise and omnipotent god for its author?

To argue that man can overthrow or materially change a system of religion instituted by God himself, is to argue that man is more powerful than God, or that he can undo what God has established.

But why should the Christian, or the advocate of any other system of supernatural religion, be afraid to hav the peculiar claims of his religion investigated? If it is founded in truth it will stand every test which human reason can apply. The man who has pure gold is not afraid to hav the acid applied.

Science declares that the earth is globular, that it is connected with a family of worlds; the revolutions rates of motion, etc., hav been accurately determined, and scientists stand ready to make good their declaration, nor tremble because somebody questions the truths at which they hav arrived. But mark the difference between the scientist and the religionist. If a reasonable doubt is raised in the mind of the scientist, with the doubt there will be manifested that zeal for truth which will urge him on in the field of investigation until he settles down on the bed-rock of truth.

But the religious enthusiast, ever ready to defend his God, who is too feeble to take care of himself, and believing that his religion is the great panacea for all the ills, will regard one who questions the truth of his religion as the common enemy of mankind. But as his religion is false, and touches nearly every phase of human welfare, correct views will seem to him as unreal and unnatural as a nightmare to a man in his wakeful moments, and hence he will ever be floundering in a mire of error. There is but one true religion, and that is the religion of humanity. The human family is the God, human happiness, the only heaven, and human suffering the only hell.

Every so-called revealed religion is a fraud, and has inflicted the deepest wounds in both individuals and in the bosom of society. Every believer is a fanatic, and fanaticism has ever proved a bar to human progress by opposing honest investigation and keeping men chained to dead carcasses of the past.

The aggregated wisdom of the present age is entirely inadequate to giv rules for those who may come after us a thousand years hence, and yet the Christian will insist that we must accept the teachings of a barbarous age separated from ours by thousands of years.

It seems impossible to bring the mind of the Christian to see that his God has all the imperfections of an ignorant, cruel, and barbarous age.

The moment he comes to see that a wrathful, vindictiv, and cruel God is only the reflection of human ignorance and cruelty, that moment he ceases to be a Christian. Hence a man's confidence in all systems of revealed religion must be broken up before he is prepared to keep step with the music of human progress.

The creeds and dogmas of a man's religion are his all-in-all. His soul is shriveled and his mind contracted by the narrowness and imbecility of the age in which his religion originated, and he cannot rise above it, although it may be thousands of years old. The devotee knows nothing of the open day, the broad sunshine and grandeur of nature. God is the author of his religion, the father of all, the creator of all; all things belong to God; hence the Christian is only serving God when he makes the lives and the property and happiness of men contribute to the building up of his religion.

As all the affections of a woman's pure heart blossom in a kiss, so the barbarity and ignorance, the persecution and robbery, the slavery and debauchery of the ages hav cropped out and blossomed in the Christian religion. The history of Moses and Joshua and David and Solomon givs one the cream of robbery, tyranny, brutality, and licentiousness. The heart sickens, and the stomach nauseates, at the contemplation of these holy monsters.

The human intellect has been so dwarfed by religious creed and dogma that we are incapable of calculating its powers.

It is because this sublime power has been hampered by superstition, and the freedom of thought throttled by the ferocious hand of fanaticism, man's moral and intellectual existence has been well-nigh buried in the gulf of religious ignorance, so that the most advanced thinkers are dragging after them the dead-weights which were fastened to them, so to speak, by religious zealots thousands of years ago.

When man attempts to move in any reform he finds that he must climb over, or batter down, the walls of some superstition. If he point to a higher knowledge and better conditions, he is told that an old book will afford him all the knowledge he needs. And thus the living present can only move as it drags a putrid corpse behind it, which ought to hav been buried in the grave of ignorance thousands of years ago.

What should hav been a joyous earth has been rendered a scene of misery by priests and tyrants and special pets of heaven. These privileged monsters hav subjugated the earth, destroyed the peace of society, robbed industry of its reward, and, worse than all, with atrocious hand, hav despoiled the intellect of its triumphs, and left the human mind comparativly a barren waste. Whatever has a tendency to dwarf the intellect I oppose and hate with all the energy and intensity of my soul.

I sometimes bring down the wrath of the Christian by telling him that I am of more consequence than his God; that his God is only an imaginary being, while I am a living reality; that freedom of thought is of vastly more consequence than all the gods and ghosts which were ever hatched out in the distempered brain of a religious lunatic.

Attempt to introduce any improvement in the Asiatic country, and you butt your head against the walls of their religion. And the way Copernicus, and Galileo, and Columbus, and Bruno were treated shows that Christian countries hav nothing to boast of in this regord. The sciences of astronomy, and geology, and chemistry, and the art of printing, and the utilization of the power of steam and electricity, show how all improvements hav been compelled to run the gauntlet of Christian superstition before their benefits could be realized by mankind.

But a brighter day is dawning. Copernicus and Bruno, Columbus and Franklin, Watt and Gutenberg, Voltaire and Gibbon, Paine and the grand constellation of Freethinkers and scientists who hav so boldly assaulted the intrenchments of Christian bigotry, hav not lived in vain. All the Christian denominations may unite to form a barrier to the extension of Freethought, but the guarantee of religious and political emancipation, for untrammeled thought and ultimate scientific achievement, is already deposited in the schools and literature of the age. It is now too late for a flank movement. The door has been opened, and the people hav had a glimpse of the grandeur and beauty of a boundless universe outside of and beyond the walls of bigotry and superstition. Popes may rave, tyrants and priests may threaten, but their hells hav all exploded, and their devils are dead. Science will not much longer be pierced with the rusty spear of persecution, and the gate to human happiness even now stands ajar.

An infinit being made an object of worship and affection, stamped with jealousy, perfidy, and cruelty, as naturally leaves these brutal blemishes upon the mind of the devotee as the wax yields to the impression of the seal. This is verified by all the facts of history. To imitate God is considered man's highest duty. Individuals and nations will be wicked as long as they worship a God of strife, carnage, and bloodshed. When men are made to believe that "the earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof," all manner of crimes will be perpetrated in the name of the Lord.

Ignorance lends aid to every system of error. The church has ever been the helpmeet of persecution. The priesthood has always bandaged the eyes of the human intellect. The first business of the pious impostor has been to persuade men that they are ignorant of something of vast importance to themselvs. This they could do most effectually by pretending to be charged with a commission from some superior being. Impositions of this kind hav been the occurrence of every age, and the victims of such imposition hav shown a willingness to do homage to the impostor. The human intellect is something worthy almost of veneration; and the first work of these heavenly nincompoops (yes, that's as good a name as they deserve) has been to pervert the mind, and lead the devotee to believe that God has endowed them with the double faculty of thinking for themselvs and all the victims of their imposition.

The moment any system of theology says to a man, "Don't think," that moment the inherent independence of the intellect should rise up in rebellion to it. The distorted features in every system of ancient theology would hav been wiped out long ago if the mind had not been led into captivity. But fanaticism, backed by gods to bully, and devils to scare, and hells to torture, has shaken the empire of reason. As man advances and grows conscious of his intellectual strength and vigor, gods and ghosts, devils and witches, saviors and middle-men will recede in the distance, and giv place to that crowning glory of all animated existence, who alone is worthy of our supreme attention, and whose welfare should command our highest endeavor—man. One noble specimen of humanity is a grander subject for contemplation than all the gods that ever reigned in all the imaginary heavens. He is the grandest being we know. But on account of the dark clouds by which he has been enveloped, caused by superstition and fanaticism, we are unable even to dream of the vast resources of his mind and his infinit capabilities. Instead of the mind being free to explore the broad universe, and investigate the hidden mysteries, it has ever been kept on the rack to secure an imaginary heaven, and escape the tortures of an endless hell.

If you would see the lion clothed in his nativ majesty, go where he roams at large in the enjoyment of his climate and all that nature has provided for his development. If you would see the eagle cleave the blue ether with untiring wing and undiminished power, think not to produce him by artificial incubation and confinement. Anyone who has studied the absurdities and incongruities of these supernatural systems of religion, how they hav bound down the mind of man in fear and slavery, will not wonder when I state that we hav no more means of judging of the capabilities of the human intellect, dwarfed and warped as it has been, than we hav of judging of the nativ powers of the lion and the eagle by seeing them caged and domesticated. When mental disease can be produced to the extent of vitiating the plainest rules of arithmetic, of doing away with mathematical proportion and precision; when the poor ignorant dupe is made to rejoice in his abasement; when one generation follows another thus mentally warped, shall we not put our foot upon the viper whose sting poisons the brain? Like other boys, I read Sindbad, and Gulliver, Arabian Nights, Munchausen, etc., but in all of them no greater absurdity can be found than is contained in the "book of books," the holy Bible. The greatest absurdity taught to the young, indorsed by all and questioned by none, will be regarded and acted upon as truth even in riper years.

While I am writing this article, hoping, perhaps, that it may turn some young mind in the right direction, my heart goes out in gratitude to a kind father whose first lessons were, "Think for yourself," "Search for the truth," "Believe only what seems reasonable." The wickedness and dire results of warping the young mind with these holy absurdities can never be calculated.

The father is the son, the son is the father; both of them together is the Holy Ghost, and the Holy Ghost is either one or all three of them. The father can beget the son, or the son can beget the father. Either one, or both together, can beget a Ghost. The Ghost can beget either one or both of them. The whole is no greater than each part, and each part is as great as the whole. Three is no more than one, and one is equal to three. The father is no older than the son, and the son was bald-headed when the father was a little boy, and I am ready to swear by all the hocus-pocus rules that the Ghost wasn't a day older than the son, and yet as old as the father.

According to the Christian arithmetic, if I owe a Christian three dollars, and pay him one, he is bound to take it and cancel the debt. "A part is as great as the whole." Could absurdity go farther? Could the mind of man be worse muddled?

Is it not marvelous how the mind can be perverted? But it has always been possible to take advantage of human ignorance. Superior mental power, combined with pretended power from on high, has enabled the crafty and designing to control the many, and make them subservient to the few.

Moses and Mohammed governed their followers with a ferocious despotism. In the name of God they outraged and ravaged the nations by whom they were surrounded. Whatever their selfishness craved, their God had need of. Whatever acts their cruelty prompted, their God sanctioned. Whatever means were necessary to accomplish their diabolical purposes, their God was sure to approve.

Done Jan. 25th, while the Christian bells were calling the attention of God to the holy masquerade where nobody sees a Christian as he really is.

Naples, N. Y. JOHN PECK.

Monsignor Capel and Historian Buckle.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: One of the most intimate friends of the late Henry Thomas Buckle, author of the "History of Civilization in England," was a Rev. George Capel, who, I infer, is the now notorious Monsignor Capel, a pervert from the English to the Romish church, engaged in the business of drumming for his ecclesiastical concern.

The following extract from the "Life of Buckle," Vol. II., p. 60, will be found interesting:

"On the 18th of April [1861], he [Buckle] dined with Mr. and Mrs. Huth. 'We were a party of ten,' writes the latter, 'among whom were Miss Thackeray, Mr. Capel, and Mr. Roupell. The last-named gentleman, who had never met Mr. Buckle, was much struck, not by his brilliancy, which he had expected, but by the delightful humor which is not often found in conjunction with such severity of thought. Poor Mr. Capel, as the representativ of the clergy among us, had to serve as butt to Mr. Buckle's clever sarcasms against them. Mr. Capel defended them valiantly by enumerating all the good they had done in preserving manuscripts, softening manners, spreading civilization, etc., etc., but at the end of the discussion Mr. Buckle said quite seriously that he considered the evil inflicted by the clergy on mankind outweighed any good they had done.'"

To which remark of Mr. Buckle let all the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER respond, Amen.

ANTICHRIST, A.M.

Is Sunday Work or Amusement a Sin?

Christians tell us it is a sin to work or visit places of amusement on Sunday. I wish to examin the subject and see if they hav any foundation for the assertion.

Sunday is a heathen institution; it was anciently dedicated to the worship of the sun.

The idea of it being a sin to work or visit places of amusement on Sunday was born of priestcraft, to draw people into the church to support that institution, that the clergy might liv in luxury and idleness at the expense of the people. In 1572, Gregory XIII. issued a decree that the Jews should attend church at least once a week.

The Christians of the present day would, no doubt, force everybody to attend church on Sunday if they had the power to do so, but, thanks to Freethought, that power has passed from their hands, never to be regained.

Connecticut passed laws in 1702, making it a crime punishable by fine for any one to travel, or labor, or engage in any sport or recreation on Sunday.

In 1784, she passed laws to fine every person who should attend any concert of music on Sunday.

In 1814, she passed laws making it a crime, punishable by a twenty-dollar fine, for anyone to drive any vehicle on Sunday, United States mail excepted.

From 1642 to 1784, blasphemy was a crime punishable with death.

Laws hav been passed by these good Christians making it a crime for a man to cross a river on Sunday, to walk anywhere except to and from church, or to even kiss his wife or children on Sunday.

A man brought suit against the Fitchburg Railroad Company, a few years ago, for injuries received on Sunday, but the courts decided "that a man traveling on Sunday to see a sick sister is not traveling for necessity or charity, and, if so injured, cannot recover in suit against a railroad corporation."

Anyone not a Christian can see the injustice of this Christian law.

Every state in the union except Louisiana has some sort of a Sunday law. In South Carolina the statute provides that all persons "having no reasonable or lawful excuse shall attend some religious meeting every Sunday." In Denver, Col., a few years ago the Pastors' Association passed resolutions condemning the practice of burying the dead on the Lord's day.

They would no doubt forbid a child being born on that day if they could. The good Christians of New York city hav been trying to stop the sale of bouquets on Sunday by the small boys and girls who offer them for sale on the street, yet most of the churches receive them from the florists on Sunday. All who are not Christians can see the inconsistency of these would-be saints.

Some two years ago the Chicago Sabbath Association tried to stop the noise of the newsboys on Sunday. It's all right to bang a church-bell for an hour over the head of a sick woman or child on Sunday, but it's an awful sin for a poor boy to earn an honest penny on that day.

These goody-goody people hav tried to induce Congress to stop the carriage of the public mails on Sunday. Dr. Jeffrey, of Scotland, a few years ago told his congregation he hoped none of them would be found in those impious vehicles (the street-cars) on Sunday.

O Christianity, your inconsistency is what makes a fool of you!

In New England, fifty years ago, stoves were not allowed in some of the churches.

It seems the more uncomfortable these Christians can make it for a man, the better it suits them. They wish to make Sunday a day of penance and gloom, when it should be a day of joy.

I hav seen it stated that "in the city of Hamburg there were 10,000 licensed women of the town; and yet they were obliged to produce certificates showing that they regularly attended church and partook of the sacrament." So it seems a person can commit any crime they wish if they will only go to church on Sunday.

According to the Bible, God ordered a man to be stoned to death for picking up sticks on the Sabbath. A God that would giv such a command as that, after he had made the weather cold enough so that the man needed a fire to keep himself and family warm, is worse than the devil, for he proposes to keep his children warm.

But then that was on the Sabbath that the man committed the great sin, and not on Sunday—the Bible Sabbath was the seventh day of the week, which is Saturday. The Jews are the only people that keep the Sabbath, the day God rested on and commanded us to keep holy. The observance of Sunday in the place of the Sabbath was forced upon the people by the priests during the Dark Ages. All those who persisted in keeping the Sabbath as a sacred day were punished in various ways. One method of punishment was to tie the offenders to iron pillars and bore out the left eye with a red-hot auger. A priest would accompany the executioner; if the victim still refused to pledge to obey the holy mother church, the right eye was then bored out.

They would do the same thing to-day if they had the power.

The Saxons named the days of the week for us thus: First day named in honor of their chief god, the sun; hence Sun's-day, or Sunday. Second day named in honor of the moon; hence Moon's-day, or Monday. Third day named in honor of the German hero Tuisco; hence Tuisco-day, or Tuesday. Fourth day named in honor of the god of battle, Woden; hence Woden's-day, or Wednesday. Fifth day named in honor of the god of weather, Thor; hence Thor's-day, or Thursday. Sixth day named in honor of the goddess of peace and plenty, Friga; hence Friga-day, or Friday. Seventh day named in honor of the god of freedom, Seator; hence Seator-day, or Saturday.

The word Sunday cannot be found in the Bible; the word is Sabbath, and signifies rest.

"And God spoke all these words, saying, But the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God" (Ex. xx).

But Jesus said, "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath." Christians hav reversed this good saying of Jesus.

Jesus traveled on Sunday the same as on other days, and even plucked ears of corn from other men's fields to eat, and we hav no account that he did any different on Sunday than he did on other days.

In France the elections take place on Sunday. This is the best time for them, as men are at leisure then, and they can attend to it without loss of time.

Paul said, "Let no man judge you in meats and drinks, new moons and Sabbath days. . . One man esteemeth one day above another, another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind." Paul was sensible in this.

Martin Luther said, "As regards the Sabbath or Sunday, there is no necessity for keeping it, but if we do, it ought to be, not on account of Moses's commandment, but because Nature teaches us from time to time to take a day of rest." Nature teaches us that a day of rest, once in a while, is necessary, but it does not teach us that a day of worship is ever necessary.

H. W. Beecher has said he doesn't "believe we are bound to respect the Sabbath from religious grounds." Beecher is sensible in this matter.

Sunday is a useful day, if we can hav it to enjoy as we see fit. We hav wants and needs that require work on Sunday the same as on other days.

There is not over one person in every hundred that attends church on Sunday. The ninety-nine are not long to be governed by the one-hundredth. Public opinion is destined to kill all of these Sunday laws in a few years, and sweep them from the statute books of every state in the union. Christians all over the country are opposing Sunday concerts on the commons and elsewhere; they oppose the opening of halls of art and science, and even the reading ing-rooms and public libraries. They are not satisfied to enjoy Sunday as they see fit, but wish to force everyone else to observe it as they do. There are but very few of the working classes at the present time that are able to dress well enough to attend the fashionable churches of our cities.

What are the poor working men and women to do? And what is to become of the poor children in the narrow streets and alleys, and the poor working girl that has been cooped up in some foul attic all the week, if they are to be denied all these privileges? Can it be a sin to listen to the sweet strains of good music, outside of the church, on Sunday, or look upon works of science and art on that day, when the working classes hav no other time?

The minister can go off on a three months' vacation and frolic during the hot weather, and close the church, but the poor man must stay at home and not be allowed any recreation.

Is the man who drives a street-car on Sunday, and works fifteen hours to earn one dollar and seventy-five cents, a greater sinner than the minister, who preaches two hours, and receives several thousand dollars a year for telling the few listeners all about something he knows nothing about?

Many of these good Christians, who think it such a sin to work on Sunday, hav their servant-girl working all day Sunday to prepare three good, square meals for them, which they must hav the same as on other days. She receives for her services three dollars a week and a few old clothes, and is allowed to receive her company in the kitchen in the evening from the back way. The coachman has been at work hard all the morning about the stable, then drives his lord and master to church, and sits outside to watch the team while his master receives the gospel. He does not need it. He is only a servant, and his soul is not worth saving.

Now, my Christian friends, I wish to say, if you think it such a sin to work on Sunday, you ought not to allow your servants to work on that day; you ought not to patronize the barber or boot-black, the newsboy or milkman; you should not ride in the street-cars; you should not read the Sunday morning paper, or Monday morning either, for a greater part of the work on both were done on Sunday. You are encouraging this sin by so doing.

But what evidence hav we that it is a sin to work or enjoy ourselvs on Sunday? We see the birds working as hard to build their nests and care for their young on Sunday as on other days. We see all birds and animals sporting and working the same on Sunday as on other days; the wind blows, the waves roll, the flowers bloom, and all nature works the same on this day as on other days.

When I can see all nature stop its work on Sunday, then I am willing to do the same, and not until then. But I might as well close this argument, as my Christian friends will close their ears to all arguments, and their eyes to all virtues, and, under the pretense of saving men's souls, they will trample their rights under foot.

"In matters holy and divine
Inquiry's out of reason;
Since faith is all the Lord demands,
It's foolishness to reason."

How the Cause Stands in Milwaukee.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav this day mailed you copies of Der Herold, containing complete report of our Paine celebration on the 29th inst. The gathering on this occasion was the largest ever known in this city of its kind. The program arranged by the committee gave perfect satisfaction, and the interest manifested served to show that the cause of Freethought still livs in this locality.

The efforts of the Personal Liberty League in the matter of a Sunday opening of our Exposition proved a failure, as explained in our circular letter of the 29th inst., a copy of which I send with above papers. The project was defeated by a vote of 6,856 to 15,817. John Plankinton, representing his individual stock of $64,500, cast 6,450 votes; also proxy votes, 7,923, representing $79,230 stock held by others—all against a Sunday opening! Outside of his votes and proxies, the opposition was only 1,447 votes. The whole affair was a farce, showing a victory for monopoly and the power of money over the voice of the people—our society alone representing eighty-five societies, with a total membership of nearly ten thousand individuals in this city and county. In addition, the entire city secular press advocated a Sunday opening.

I notice that the question of church taxation is receiving due notice THE TRUTH SEEKER columns. As an item of interest, the city assessors hav reported the total valuation of this city's church property at $1,545,255—over a million and a half! Connected with many of the city's churches are schools representing a large amount of tied-up capital—non-taxable—which is not included in the above estimates. This being the assessor's estimate, it is understood that the values are what the various properties would sell for if placed in the open market.

Another item of interest: For the first time in the history of our state legislature, the question of opening the present winter's session with the old-time custom of prayer was nearly defeated, the vote standing 16 to 11. This is the first blow toward crushing out that farcical humbug, and shows a Liberal "cheek" among our legislators that is entitled to much praise. I inclose a clipping from Wisconsin of the 22d inst., also Dr. T. W. Williams's reply, all of which is respectfully submitted. P. A. STUART.

A CORRESPONDENT at Leith assures the editor of the London Freethinker of the truth of the following incident: A well-known surgeon was called to the house of a poor and infirm old woman, and after examining her wrote out a prescription, when the woman expressed her thanks, but stated her inability to pay for it. He thereupon handed the patient half a crown, and calling the next day inquired if she had got the medicin. The woman replied in the negative, stating that her priest had taken it for saying mass. For some time our lively practitioner expressed his feelings in several languages, and sat down to await the arrival of the heavenly messenger. Half an hour afterwards the man of God was being vigorously slammed from wall to wall, throttled, kicked, and punched till he disgorged his ill-gotten gains, and finally picked himself up at the bottom of the stairs and limped home with a broken arm. The doctor was summoned to the police court, but the feelings of the Bench seemed to be with the defendant, as he was only fined £1.

Will the friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER in every state of the Union (and especially some friend in every place in which an institution is located) send us the latest report of the officers of the penal and reform institutions of their states? We wish to compare the religious proclivities of the inmates, and to giv the statistics as full as possible. No matter if reports are duplicated; it will serve our purpose much better to hav a dozen reports of one institution than no report. We ask every person able to get one of these reports to send it to this office.

A Fool in the Pulpit.

A Unitarian preacher of this city last Sunday attempted to reason. The purpose of his sermon was to show what the world would be without a God. He is credited by the Monday papers with having said:

"From finite matter mind was developed, but in infinit time, and from an infinit universe an infinit mind must be produced. If there was no God, as the Atheists say, one was bound to come by the law of development, so that the Atheists cannot get rid of a God. The Atheistic theory was simply the faith of decay, the religion of destruction, the morals of annihilation, the universe of despair. The theory which human nature most needed was one which fills the human heart with hope, which stimulates man's energies, and which leads him to look at life not from the success achieved, or the riches acquired, or worldly renown, but from the development of character. The noblest examples of true manhood were produced by the spiritualistic qualities of faith in God, trust in his goodness, and hope of an immortality beyond the grave."

It has been said that he who will not reason is a bigot; he who cannot reason is a fool; and he who dares not reason is a coward; but what can be said of an educated man who utters such maudlin assertions as these?

The Trinity.

The avowal by an Episcopal clergyman of a disbelief in the doctrin of the trinity has set the Christians, lay and clerical, to talking about the dogma. A good many of them find their ideas of it are very hazy. As Capel says, it must be believed; it cannot be reasoned. Yet this dogma is one of the most important points of doctrin in the Christian scheme. The Athanasian creed sets it forth, perhaps, the most authoritativly of any church statement:

"The Catholic faith is this: That we worship one God as Trinity, and Trinity in Unity—neither confounding the persons nor dividing the substance—for there is one person of the Father, another of the Son, and another of the Holy Ghost. But the godhead of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, is all one; the glory equal, the majesty co-eternal."

The early Christian authorities were wont to rely upon 1 John v, 7, for their proof of the distinctivly Christian character of this dogma, but that passage is now known to hav been interpolated centuries after the time of Christ, and Newton's acknowledgment that the doctrin is common to nearly all oriental religions — the Brahman, the Hindoo, the Egyptian—is received with less surprise than such an avowal would hav been a few years since.

The author of "Bible Myths" has traced its origin with patient scholarship, and has, perhaps, enlightened the unbelieving world as much upon the subject as any writer. Pritchard, in his "Egyptian Mythology," asserts that the notion of a triad of supreme powers is common to the most ancient religions. Deity has always been a trinity of some kind. If we turn to India we shall find that one of the most prominent features in the Indian theology is the doctrin of a divine triad. The triad is called Trimurti—from the Sanskrit words tri (three) and murti (form), and consists of Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva. The Buddhists hav also had their trinity from a very early period. Mr. Faber, in his "Origin of Heathen Idolatry," says:

"Among the Hindoos we hav the triad of Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva; so, among the votaries of Buddha we find the self-triplicated Buddha declared to be the same as the Hindoo trimurti. Among the Buddhist sect of the Jainists we hav the triple Jiva, in whom the trimurti is similarly declared to be incarnate."

The inhabitants of China and Japan worship God in the form of a trinity. So did the ancient Egyptians. The idea of calling the second person in the trinity the Logos, or Word, is an Egyptian feature, and engrafted into Christianity many centuries after the time of Christ. The ancient Greeks, too, worshiped God as a trinity. Their religious rites strictly observed the mystical number three. The ancient pagan Romans worshiped a trinity—"first God, then the word, and with them the spirit." The Persian's trinity consisted of Oromasdes, Mithras, and Ahriman. According to Inman's "Ancient Faiths," the Assyrians and Phœnicians degraded themselvs in the same way. Even the Jews, for whom and by whom the claim of a pure monotheism is so strongly made as to shut out even the idea of a subdivided God, "had symbols of the divine Unity in Trinity as well as the pagans." Those European barbarians, the Vandals, had a trinity. The Scandinavians had Odin, Thor, and Frey. The Druid also worshiped "Ain triple God, of name Taulac, Fan, Mollac." The first missionaries who penetrated Siberia's wilds found the inhabitants adoring "an idol fabricated to resemble, as near as possible, a Trinity in Unity." On one of the Tartar medals now in the Museum of St. Petersburg may be seen a representation of a triple god seated on the lotus. In the remote islands of the Pacific Ocean the trinity is "God the Father, god the Son, and God the Spirit." Tezcatlipoca, the God of the Mexicans, "had associated with him two other gods." He himself had "all the attributes and powers which were assigned to Jehovah by the Hebrews." The Rev. Father Acosta, writing of the Peruvians, says:

"It is strange that the devil after his manner hath brought a trinity into idolatry; for the three images of the sun. . . signifieth Father and Lord Sun, the Son Sun, and the Brother Sun."

The doctrin of the trinity also found place in the worship of the Indians of the California Peninsula.

The statue of the principal deity of the New Granada Indians had three heads on one body, and was understood to be "three persons with one heart and one will."

Plato and his disciples taught the doctrin of the trinity centuries before the time of Christ, and "it was Justin Martyr, a Christian convert from the Platonic school, who, about the middle of the second century, first promulgated the opinion that Jesus of Nazareth, the 'Son of God,' was the second principle in the deity, and the creator of all material things."

The incomprehensible metaphysics of the trinity question was not a part of the established Christian faith until the year 327, when the question was settled at the councils of Nice and Constantinople. Up to that time there was no recognized doctrin upon this subject. The trinitarian controversy raged furiously, and the persecution of Arius for denying that a son could be as old as his father is well known. When, however, the matter was referred to Constantine, and the Council of Nice had formulated its dogma, he enforced the absurd ruling by the civil power. But those who formulated the doctrin never understood it. Athanasius confessed that "whenever he forced his understanding to meditate on the divinity of the logos, his toilsome and unavailing efforts recoiled on themselvs; that the more he thought the less he comprehended; and the more he wrote the less capable was he of expressing his thoughts." So we see that upon the Christian church this doctrin was forced by men who did not themselvs understand it, and it is safe to say that no man from that time to this ever has understood it. No matter if in its rejection the deepest thinking of the ages is faulted, as the Episcopal clergyman said, it must be abandoned with the other "mysteries of godliness." Stolen ideas, like burglar's plunder, hav nothing added to their value by their distinction in his profession of the cracksman. The turning state's evidence by one receiver, while leading, perhaps, to the return of the goods, will not raise the estimation with which the much-bandied-about property is regarded.

Talmage Loose Again.

It is not often that Talmage preaches a sermon of any account, and probably his last Sunday effort will not set the East River afire, but the spirit which animated the man is the same spirit that inspires the heresy-hunters in this city, actuated the inquisitors of old, and that has never left the body of the real orthodox church, however carefully the organization conceals the fact. Col. Ingersoll's recent lecture in Brooklyn was the text for these remarks:

"The Infidelity of the present is considered a great joke, and there are people in these days who gather together to hear Christ assailed with quib and joke. A lecturer in a Brooklyn theater, if correctly reported, has said, among many other things: 'When we compare our God with man, he is not much of a God. When Christ was here he was forgiving and half human; but now he is God, he sends them to eternal fire. It is wonderful what a difference office makes with some people.' The Lord Jesus Christ, who came to carry our sorrows, to bear our griefs, maligned in the presence of the citizens of Brooklyn! Is there any such thing as blasphemy? If there be, is there no law against it? These are tremendous questions which I ask of the legal fraternity, the judges of our courts, and through them the legislature of the state of New York. There is such a thing as blasphemy. Let the law against blasphemy be erased from the statute-book, or let it be executed. But, says some one, 'don't you believe in free speech?' Yes, free riding of horses, but not to run over people; free knives, but not knives for assassination, and free speech, but not the speech of falsehood or blasphemy. It would hav been the grandest drama that Brooklyn had ever seen if last Sabbath my friend Patrick Campbell, the chief of the police, who believes in God—in Jesus Christ—had walked on the platform, followed by a platoon of police officers, and had put his hand on the shoulder of the blasphemous lecturer and said to him, 'In the name of the common law, in the name of the state of New York, and in the name of the city of Brooklyn, this infamy must stop—must stop here and must stop now.'"

What a high old time there would be in the city of churches if "my friend Patrick"—an appropriate name for a man engaging in such business—"Campbell, chief of police," should undertake to do what Mr. Talmage wants done! We undertake to say that the "greatest show on earth" would be dull in comparison.

"No Religion."

Inspector Ries, of the Milwaukee House of Correction, has recently made his report. From the statistics given we learn by way of the Milwaukee Sentinel that the total number of prisoners was 1,616. The religious antecedents are as follows:

Catholic,	877
Lutherans,	347
Other Protestant denominations,	191
"No religion,"	201
	1,616

Of course we expect that the Catholics will show the largest in such comparisons, and the other sects in proportion to their nearness to perfect orthodoxy, but we would like to know what "no religion" means. In previous cases of this kind, when sifted down, we hav found that "no religion" means that the individual thus described had identified himself or herself with no sect, but was firmly grounded in the Christian scheme—believed in a general way in God, had more or less distinct notions of how faith in Christ and a shifting to him of their burden of sin would land them in the heaven they did not doubt existed; and held in imagination vivid pictures of the hell they would thus escape. "No sect" would describe these people accurately; and we are inclined to think the same should hav been written in place of "no religion."

There are many Liberals in Milwaukee; will some of them enlighten the world upon this point?

Common Sense from the Speaker.

John G. Carlisle, speaker of the House of Representativs, is reported to hav said that he believed the time would come when the form of an oath would be done away with in the courts.

This expression of opinion was brought out in a general conversation upon the subject of the rejection in the Swaim trial of the testimony of DeAkers, the Agnostic witness. Mr. Carlisle's reasons are that under the present methods of taking testimony the evidence of a most worthless character who took the oath would be taken against that of the most scrupulous and high-minded man who from his very sense of truth could not say that he knew there was a God. Mr. Carlisle said he thought there never was a case tried in any court where there was not perjury of some kind on both sides. In all his legal experience he had seen no evidence that the oath alone restrains a man from making misstatements in his own interest. Mr. Carlisle would put witnesses upon their honor. He would hav each man giv evidence without any preliminary form, and then it would stand according to the character of the witness. There would then be no difficulty, as there is now, in providing penalties for giving false evidence.

It is gratifying to see the presiding officer of our national law-makers holding substantially the opinions that hav been expressed by the president of the National Liberal League. We do not know that Mr. Carlisle is himself an Agnostic, but if not, and these sentiments are correctly credited to him, he is an exceptionally fair-minded man.

May he be speaker when the League introduces its Oath bill in the House of Representativs.

Editorial Notes.

THE Methodist Advocate says that a church that permits Heber Newton to minister at her altars may indeed hav a ritual of cast-iron, but its doctrins are of india-rubber.

AT a Unitarian conference in Jackson, Mich., a resolution "recognizing Christianity and affirming the existence of God" was promptly voted down. Good for the Unitarians!

FOR lecturing and debating on Freethought subjects, the Christians of Melbourne, Australia, are wanting £1,150 of Mr. Joseph Symes. And all this for lecturing on the Sundays of one month.

To the query, "What should be done with a Sunday-school superintendent who attends theaters?" the official organ of the Methodist church responds, Compel him to resign or remove him. Great is the liberality of Wesleyanism, and sweet is the freedom enjoyed by its followers!

THERE not being time during this session of Congress for a thorough exposure of Comstockism, the presentation of the petition for the repeal of his law has been deferred till next session. Persons interested in the matter can obtain blank petitions of E. H. Heywood, Princeton, Mass.

IN his reply to Remsburg's "Bible Morals," at Montezuma, the Rev. Daniel Hull triumphantly exclaimed, "Blot the Bible out of existence, and all the devils in earth and hell couldn't write another!" "I don't believe they could," quietly ejaculated Reynolds, who occupied a seat on the rostrum.

OUR frequent friend, Mr. R. S. Sidelinger, is doing yeoman's service in propagating Freethought. He is a Boston correspondent of four or five papers, and he manages to work into his interesting letters many facts disagreeable to the churches, and to insinuate doubts into the minds of his readers. He obeys the command, Be ye constant in season and out.

A FOUR-THOUSAND-DOLLAR Freethought hall was formally dedicated last November at Newcastle, Australia. The building is substantially built, is sixty-two by thirty feet inside measurement, is fourteen feet high, and is ventilated by some fifty ventilators. The hall seats five hundred persons. A piano, costing about five hundred dollars, is also provided.

THE Liberals of Washington Territory should help Willis McDanald, of Walla Walla, in his efforts to roll up a large petition to the territorial legislature for the taxation of church property. Mr. McDanald has been to considerable expense in this work, and thus far has received only $2 to aid him. This is not right. Every Freethinker in the territory should chip in with money and work.

TAKING the Christians by and large, what a nice lot they are! A friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER was some time ago talking to the zealous Christian son of his employer about Mr. Bennett and his brutal persecution by Comstock, and incidentally made it known that in religion he differed from the general run of people. The "son of his father" made a note of this, and in a short time the independent thinker was discharged. No doubt such conduct pleased God, and made his glory more abound!

MR. MCCLOSKY, called by the Catholics archbishop, has issued his "Lenten" regulations. From "Ash Wednesday" (Feb. 18th) until "Easter day" (April 14th) only one meal per day is allowed the faithful—but there are exceptions. Infirm persons, persons of thin physique, old persons, children, nursing women, sick persons, etc., etc., are not obliged to conform to this rule. It will go hard with Catholics of vigorous appetites if they cannot find some reason for classing themselvs with one or another of these.

WE call special attention to Mr. E. A. Stevens's advertisment of the Paine statuet. It is a fine work of art, and now that Paine is being publicly honored all over the country, it will be very appropriate that Freethinkers should prolong the honor by purchasing one of these statuets and placing it in their parlors. The likeness to Paine is accurate, the position graceful, and the sculpturing splendidly done. The design is the one that has been accepted for the Lincoln Park Monument, in Chicago, to be erected so soon as money enough has been raised to defray expenses.

THE annual meeting of the stockholders of the Paine Memorial Corporation was held in the forenoon of Jan. 29th. The report of the treasurer showed that although the season has been considered a hard one, the net receipts were in advance of those of last year, and that the mortgage on the building has been reduced $3,000 since Jan. 1, 1884. In view of this condition of affairs, it was voted to issue no more stock except to present owners. The old board of directors—consisting of Messrs. Seaver, J. P. Mendum, Verity, Mattson, O'Malley, Bean, Coffin, Buntin, Monroe—were re-elected; Ernest Mendum, secretary and treasurer.

MRS. DUDLEY, now in jail for attempted murder of O'Donovan Rossa, the dynamiter, receives a great many messages from sympathizers and enemies. The following charitable sentiments, we should judge, are from one of the latter, as the writer seems to be somewhat familiar with the language of bulls of excommunication:

"May the torments and curse of all the dammed in hell attend and afflict you on this earth so that the whole world will hav the pleasure of witnessing it, and may every hand and voice lifted up in your defense be withered and destroyed with your accursed country till the end of time."

THE parliament of New Zealand has taken action on the Oath and Sunday question. A bill to render affirmations, instead of oaths, legal in all instances where there is any objection to take an oath, has become law. With respect to Sunday laws, the obnoxious enactments of the two Charleses hav been repealed, and the restrictions upon Sunday freedom hav been so far removed as to simply prohibit ordinary business or work from being carried on in view from any public street. People in that colony are now to be permitted either to play or to work on Sunday, just as they please, provided nobody sees what they are doing!

WE find this notice of our beautiful new book, "The Story Hour," in the columns of our esteemed contemporary the Ironclad Age:

"Miss Susan H. Wixon has just got out a book bearing the above name, which consists of a series of stories without religious admixture, designed mainly for children. It contains a number of wood engravings. The price is $1.25. Send orders to her at Fall River, Mass."

It will be observed that Dr. Monroe has not allowed his well-known poetic fancy to betray him into any extravagance of praise in speaking of the work under notice. Comparativly speaking, it would be interesting to know what the doctor will find to say of THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, which contains his own portrait.

WHEN the Catholic dynamiter Phelan was so murderously carved by the Catholic dynamiter Short, in the newspaper office of the Catholic dynamiter Rossa, the report was circulated that Phelan was a "Bob. Ingersoll man." Whereupon the Catholic Citizen, with striking previousness, proceeded to moralize thus:

"I havn't got any religion. I am a follower of Bob Ingersoll," said Phelan, the victim of the recent bloody duello, at O'Donovan Rossa's office. Truly, the disciple does honor to his apostle.

It has since transpired that Phelan said nothing of the sort, and that upon being taken to the hospital, he called for a priest and received the "sacrament of extreme unction." It is now incumbent upon the Catholic Citizen to restate the case and point the moral in its proper form.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Madras Phi s hic Inquirer reports the conversion to Buddhism of a clergyman of the church of England, the Rev. Charles W. Leadbeater, of Hampshire, England. He was initiated into the "refuges of Buddhism" at Colombo, Ceylon, December 17th last. "It was a sight," says the correspondent, "to behold a Christian minister sitting at the feet of the yellow-robed priests of the followers of Buddha, and hear him solemnly repeat after them: I take my refuge in Buddha! I take my refuge in the law! I take my refuge in the order! On being requested by the high priest to state his reasons why he desired to become a follower of Lord Buddha, Mr. Leadbeater stated that it was his desire to arrive at the truth, and that he had found the truth expressed in a purer form in Buddhism than in any other system with which he was acquainted. He further stated that, while the Christian doctrins were all based upon hearsay evidence and upon doubtful authority, and required him to believe many unreasonable things, the teaching of Gautama Buddha which stands forth most prominently is that we should believe nothing which our reason cannot accept as true, because faith, to be lasting, must be based upon sound reason and common sense."

PERHAPS one of the most bigoted towns in Canada is Gananoque. But heroic Watts and genial Putnam hav broken the ice there, and the latter obtained this respectful notice from the Reporter of the town:

"Mr. S. P. Putnam, of New York, delivered a lecture on 'The Religion of the Future,' at the Town Hall, last Tuesday evening. His arguments were much the same as those presented a few weeks ago by Mr. Watts, though expressed in more poetical language. Mr. Putnam was once a Congregational preacher, but not being able to accept the doctrins he, to use his own expression, tried a milder form of religion and became a Unitarian; but this also had too much theology for him, so he is now a Secularist. To him nature is God. He has no evidence of any other, and believes in nothing that can not be proved without the aid of faith. This world is all a man is sure of, therefore man's religion should be to make himself and his surroundings here as near perfection as possible, and secure for himself a paradise on earth. Man's reason and experience must be his guides in life. Whatever appears to him to be best calculated to secure health, knowledge, and happiness should be adopted. All that will bring men into closer sympathy and co-operation, break down prejudices, mitigate sorrow, prevent evil, alleviate suffering, and generally operate to raise the race mentally, socially, physically, and financially should be promoted and encouraged. And those things that hav a contrary effect should be opposed and discountenanced. He believed the present religion was a mixture of enlightened humanity and theological delusion; and any good that had been accomplished was due to the element of humanity. As this more and more predominated with advancing knowledge, more good would be done, and at last the belief now entertained as based on the Bible would disappear, and the religion of the future would be one of entire dependence on men's powers and the understood laws of nature."

Mr. Henry Smith is responsible for the appearance in Gananoque of the League's secretary, and in a card in the Reporter he asks the friends of free discussion to contribute to a fund to get other lecturers. If this shall continue, it may finally become possible for a tradesman in Gananoque to talk Liberalism and still get a living.

THERE was once a time when the pastor of a church in a village of New England or Long Island was a little God Almighty in his way, and ruled his parishioners with a rod of iron. That was when the people were more Christian than now. But an anachronistic clergyman has cropped up since roller-skating became an epidemic. The Rev. Dr. Parker, pastor of the Methodist church at Jamaica, L. I., is very much averse to this form of amusement. A few Sundays ago he forbade the lady members of his flock from attending the skating-rink. His injunction was disregarded. Then he came out in the village paper with a card asserting that the influence of the skating-rink was adverse to the truth of religion, instancing that since the opening of the rink the revival he was conducting had fallen flat. The card did no good. Then Dr. Parker took a Herald reporter into his confidence, and announced his determination to close up the rink. "I am opposed," he said, "to roller-skating, and shall do all in my power to hav it stopped in this village, at least. Just look at it. I hav been trying to get up a revival in my church for some time, but all my young people go to the skating-rink. It's an outrage, and must be stopped." The girls, however, put on a bold front. They insist that they will skate. There are plenty of churches, they say, but only one skating-rink. Dr. Parker has had to discontinue his revival meetings, for without the girls no meeting can be a success.

AT his annual meeting, a month or so ago, it will be recollected that Comstock roundly abused District-Attorney Ridgeway, of Brooklyn, because Mr. Ridgeway was not willing to be his creature in the punishment of persons whom Comstock alleged to be gamblers. In the Brooklyn Eagle the district-attorney replied, asking for a bill of particulars, and saying, in the words of the Eagle, that if he will mobilize his mouth to the extent of so particularizing his allegations that issue can be joined on them in a court of law, he will confer a favor on the man he traduces and considerably simplify his policy of vilification. This request the editor of the Eagle holds to be a reasonable one, but, "being reasonable, Anthony Comstock may be expected to regard it with constitutional aversion. He conveniently forgets that Mr. Ridgeway has in his favor a fact his abuser does not possess—the evidence of the regard and confidence of the voters of Kings county, as attested by the conclusiv and vindicating majority of their suffrages for him. Now, if Anthony Comstock wants to test his popularity and to discover how much reliance is placed on him, let him run for district-attorney when the time comes to choose a public prosecutor. The result would be effectiv and impressiv—though disillusionizing. Anthony Comstock seems to be a moral ferret with an unfortunate mental malformation which leads him to think that an opinion different from his own is proof positiv of wickedness in one who has it. He is apparently convinced not only that he says or thinks things because they are right, but that things are right because he thinks or says them. Such a disease is beyond cure, but the virulent forms of verbal rupture which it assumes are not made less disagreeable by the mere fact that they are immedicable."

THE pious people of Lachine, Can., are feeling badly. They hav been duped by wicked Jews, and made to bow down to false idols. Five years ago the remains of St Claudius (whoever he was) were brought from Rome to Lachine, and installed with great ceremony, since which time they hav been reverently adored by good Catholics. It now transpires that these bones are not genuin. They are real bones, it is true, and contain as much lime and other osseous matter as any bones, but for all that they are not the calcareous remnants of St. Claudius. The way it happened is this wise, as explained by Mr. Piche, the cure of Lachine parish church: In 1871, when the Piedmontese conquered Rome with Victor Emmanuel at their head, several Roman Catholic churches were broken into, the sanctuaries thrown down, and many corpses of martyrs pitched out into the streets. These were taken possession of by Jewish dealers in second hand goods, who immediately conveyed them to their shops, where they were secreted. The church authorities, however, were not long in discovering the hiding-places of the corpses, and at once set about reclaiming the remains at any cost. The Jews made the best of their excellent chances, and demanded exorbitant sums in payment for the bodies, which were readily forthcoming. Elated by their success, and fearful lest the supply should be exhausted before their grasping propensities had been satisfied, they hit upon a bold scheme for meeting their ends. Knowing that the only way the authorities had of recognizing the bodies of saints was by means of the autograph of the pope himself, they continued without much trouble to substitute for the original corpses bodies stolen from the cemeteries, and appropriately dressed, to which they attached the forged signature of the pope. The plan worked successfully for several years, but the fraud was discovered about two years ago. Great consternation ensued among the cardinals and other ecclesiastics when it was found that they had been duped, and that the Catholics all over the world had for years been holding solemn communion with relics which they had supposed to be those of departed saints, but which might hav been, for all they knew, those of Rome's most dishonored dead. An investigation was at once ordered to be instituted, and all the churches which had been made resting-places for bodies since 1871 were asked to send the signatures of the pope accompanying their treasures to Rome for examination. Those which had come to Lachine with the relics of St. Claudius and St. Juliana, the latter of which was also brought to Lachine and consigned to the sacred precincts of the convent were returned to the holy see along with the rest, and not long ago the intelligence was received from the pope that the supposed remains of St. Claudius and St. Juliana had no authenticity whatever; and Father Piche was instructed to do away with them at once. The consternation of the faithful, on finding out this pious fraud, was great. But they are to be made happy by a new holy relic, for the pope has promised to giv a genuin martyr's bones in place of these ordinary fleshless remains. But one phase of this affair was overlooked by the cure in explaining it. Supposing some one has been cured of disease by touching these bones (the Catholics assure us this is constantly occuring) will he suffer a relapse when he learns of the error, or can he, by touching the genuin, maintain the health procured by his faith in the fraudulent bones? We feel anxious about this.

Conscience.

"It is time that men should tolerate nothing ancient which reason does not respect, and shrink from no novelty to which reason may conduct."—Sir James Mackintosh.

Now, Mr. Editor, in accordance with the beautiful sentiment above quoted, I wish to inquire of you what are the present most enlightened views on the human conscience. Is it the silent inward monitor implanted by God in every human breast to guide and regulate our daily actions so as to deserve the approbation of those around us and escape their frown and condemnation? All possess this faculty in varying degrees. But is it inherent in the human mind, or is it the result of education? I hav lately been led to ponder on this subject from reading Nelson Sizer's lately published "Journal," in which he endeavors to maintain the old orthodox belief that conscience is instinctiv, a position to which I cannot agree. If it were an innate faculty of the human mind, it would be universal and uniform in all men everywhere; instead of which there can hardly be a subject on which men differ so widely as in matters of conscience. The juries in our courts, having all the facts and bearings of the evidence in the case presented to them alike, do not always adjudge the culprit innocent or guilty in the same degree, and often conscientiously disagree. The public and private conscience is modified by every change of circumstance that bears, pro or con, upon the public conscience. The rebel who holds his life at forfeit to-day, to-morrow, if successful, becomes a hero, and his praises are on every tongue. So unstable is this "inward monitor" in its decisions of right and wrong.

The political fanatic commits murder with bravado and defies public conscience. The Irish Catholic devotee murders and exults in his crime if the victim be a heretic or a landlord, and only feels remorse when detection and punishment threaten him.

Where, then, is this innate, infallible conscience? Among the nativs of the South Sea Islands are those who, after long contact with Europeans, cannot be taught any sense of modesty, or to respect the rights of property. They will in a nude condition perform, in public, acts unmentionable to ears polite, without any sign of wrong or conception of shame. Again, the hungry savage meets a man and by superior strength slays, cooks, and eats him, with as little compunction as a wild tiger would do in similar circumstances. So little is man in his rude natural state influenced by this instinct, right judgment.

Nor is conscience the special gift of God to man only, for brutes possess it in an inferior degree.

This quality is manifested in all our domestic animals by self-accused guiltiness after they hav violated the rules they hav been trained to observe.

Who has not seen a dog, after stealing a piece of meat, or killing a chicken, betray himself by leering with his eyes, and skulking and whining in seeming anticipation of punishment; or a cat, after killing a favorit bird, showing guilt before suspected? On the other hand, when she has killed a rat, of which she knows the mistress will approve, she takes it to her feet, rubs herself and purs, asking, as plainly as a cat can do, for the kind caress and applause. I need not enumerate facts of this kind to prove that all trained animals hav the faculty of judgment between right and wrong, as they are trained, as well as men; showing that conscience is not an innate and independent faculty, but is that operation of the mind of man or brute which judges of the effect of our conduct upon others and receives their approval or condemnation, and is the result of education, not intuition.

If we turn from our own reflections to authority to justify our conclusions, and ask what the soundest of modern mental philosophers, Locke says on this—the theory of intuitiv morality was vigorously assailed by him. He urged "that, in fact, there are no principles universally received among men; that moral rules require a reason to be given for them, which ought not to be necessary, if they are innate; that virtue is generally approved of, not because innate, but because profitable; that innumerable enormities hav been practiced in various countries without even causing remorse; that the moral rules of some nations hav been flatly contradicted by others; that no one has been able to tell what the innate rules are, and that we do not find children possessed of any moral rules."

Another writer says: "The great mass of human beings hav nothing more than the slavish conscience, or the habits imparted by the exercise of parental and public authority. The child is first taught obedience by penalties, and is made to associate pain with forbidden actions. This is the germ of conscience. The conscience grounded on fear becomes the conscience grounded on spontaneous approval. Conscience thus follows, and does not precede, the experience of human authority."

There is yet another phase of this subject, conscience, which might be presented to advantage by some more able pen than mine, i.e., What are the effect and practice of this god-given faculty (as Mr. Sizer has it), in every-day life? What are its manifestations in business, where the rule prevails universally to giv as little as possible, and get as much as possible?

This is the inflexible standard of conscience in our dealings with one another. This being the rule, even those who would be an exception, and think it "more honored in the breach than the observance," are compelled to follow the practice in self-defense.

The elastic tether of a man's conscience in trade, urged by avarice, is limited in its tension only by his opportunities to gain advantage of his fellow-man.

It is often asked, "Where is the conscience of a lawyer?" and yet it would take a microscope of no greater power to discover it than that of men following any other profession or calling.

I fear I hav already exceeded the modest limits of a correspondent, without exhausting the interest in the subject, which will be continued by you or some one better able to do justice to it than myself.

In conclusion, let me say that, in my poor, weakening judgment, if an all-wise omnipotent creator had endowed his creatures with a ready-made conscience when they came into the world, he would surely hav secured it against such abuse and debasement as we find everywhere in common life.

Prometheus.

Taylor says the best information concerning the character, attributes, and actions of the god-man Prometheus, the crucified savior of men, is to be derived from the sublime tragedy of "Prometheus Bound," by Eschylus, which was acted in the theater of Athens five hundred years before Christ. The "Prometheus" of Eschylus is by many considered to be the most ancient dramatic poem now in existence. The plot was derived from materials even at that time of an indefinitly remote antiquity. Nothing was ever so exquisitly calculated to work upon the feelings of the spectators. No author ever displayed greater power of poetry, or more strength of judgment in supporting throughout the piece the august character of the divine sufferer. The spectators themselvs were unconsciously made a party to the interest of the scene. The hero was their friend, their benefactor, their creator, their savior. His wrongs were incurred in their quarrel, his sorrows were endured for their salvation. He was wounded for their transgressions, and bruised for their iniquities; the chastisment of their peace was upon him, and by his stripes they were healed. He was oppressed and afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth.

The majesty of the silence of Prometheus, whilst the ministers of an offended god were nailing him by the hands and feet to Mount Caucasus, could be only equaled by the modesty with which he relates, while hanging on the cross, his services to the human race which had brought on him that horrible crucifixion. "For mercy to mankind I bleed; extermination was the fate of all the human race; I dared, and boldly pleading, saved them from destruction, saved them from sinking to the realms of night." In the catastrophe of the plot, his especially professed friend, Petræus, the fisherman, being unable to prevail upon him to make his peace with Jupiter (by throwing the cause of redemption out of his hands), forsook him and fled. Matthew xvi, 22, is a copy of this passage of Eschylus. Matthew says: "Then Peter began to rebuke him, saying, Be it far from thee, Lord, this shall not be unto thee," referring to the crucifixion. After Peter had deserted him, none remained to be witnesses of his dying agonies, but the chorus of ever amiable and ever faithful women, "who also bewailed and lamented him" (Luke xxiii, 27).

When the death struggle came to Prometheus on the cross—overcome at length by the intensity of his pains—he addresses Jupiter in language hardly different in terms to the language of Christ in the gospels—"Eloi! Eloi! lama sabachthani? My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me?" And immediately the whole framework of nature became convulsed. The earth shook, the rocks were opened, and in a storm that seemed to threaten the dissolution of the entire universe, the curtain fell on the sublimest scene ever presented to the contemplation of the human eye—a dying God. It is finished! it is finished! hear a dying savior cry! The Christian muse has inspired our modern poets on this theme, but they all bear the character of plagiarism, parody, or paraphrase of the original Greek tragedy.

A worshiper of Prometheus would seek in vain through all our collections of hymns and sacred poetry for a single idea which his own forms of piety had not suggested, or a single phrase whose reference would not seem to hav as direct an application to the god-man Prometheus, crucified savior of men, as to Jesus of Nazareth, the Christ of the Christians. The Christian poet, Cowper, sings:

There is a fountain filled with blood
Drawn from Emanuel's veins,
And sinners plunged beneath that flood
Lose all their guilty stains.
The dying thief rejoiced to see
That fountain in his day,
Oh! may I there, though vile as he,
Wash all my sins away.

This Christian hymn is an exact copy of a pagan hymn to Prometheus, written more than five hundred years before Jesus of Nazareth, the Christ of the Christians, was born. The pagan original runs thus:

Lo, streaming from the fatal tree
His all-atoning blood,
Is this the infinit? 'Tis he!
Prometheus, and a god!
Well might the sun in darkness hide,
And veil his glories in,
When God, the great Prometheus, died
For man, the creature's, sin.

The Christian poet, Dr. Watts, sings of death and the River Jordan separating us from heaven, from paradise and its gardens, in the very same strains used by the pagans in singing of death and the River Styx, which separated them from the Elysian Fields. Thus Watts's hymn runs,

There is a land of pure delight
Where saints immortal reign,
Infinit day excludes the night,
And pleasures banish pain.

There everlasting spring abides,
And never withering flowers;
Death like a narrow sea divides
This heavenly land from ours.

Sweet fields beyond the swelling flood
Stand dressed in living green.
So to the Jews old Canaan stood,
While Jordan rolled between.

This Christian hymn is an exact copy of the ancient pagan invocation to paradise.

By balmy winds that ever blow;
By purling streams that ever flow
Through the Elysian bowers;
By the happy souls that dwell
In yellow meads of asphodel,
And amaranthine bowers.

The Comstock Laws.

The act of Congress of March 3, 1873, had in view a good end—protection from circulation of obscene matter, sent to school children contrary to the wishes of their parents and teachers, or to others contrary to their own wishes; but was so framed as to interfere with the freedom of the press, so that persons honestly desiring to investigate the causes and make known the remedy for known abuses, could not safely communicate with each other. There are, in this country, many periodicals devoted to the subject of woman's rights in various phases; and they are all in danger of being construed as violating the Comstock law if the editors, or any of their contributors, should make suggestions in opposition to the preconceived opinions of an ignorant jury who cannot conceive of anything better than what they hav always been accustomed to. If their publications are sent to persons who do not desire them, as postal cards hav sometimes been resorted to as a means of intentional annoyance, it is right that such persons should be protected; but the only way to suppress erroneous views is to let them meet the truth in free combat. Such discussion can be carried on without annoyance to any one, if the law is restricted as it should be. I propose, as a substitute for the Comstock law, the following, which seems to me to cover every good end proper for the government to enforce, and to avoid the objectionable features of the law as it stands:

PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF 1885.

Be it enacted, That any person who shall knowingly deposit, or cause to be deposited for mailing or delivery, any matter, written or printed, deemed by the recipient or the legal guardian thereof, to be obscene, indecent, or scurrilous, and not thus mailed at the request of the said recipient, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, etc.

Justitia.

Dr. Andrews to Mr. Cleveland.

To Grover Cleveland, President Elect, Albany, N. Y.

Sir: We look upon you as a man of destiny, raised up to again unite our whole country, and to restore our nation to the original simplicity according to the intention of the fathers of our glorious republic, and trusting you will gladly giv a thought to the following words of the revered Thomas Jefferson, I take the liberty to submit them to your perusal.

With profound sentiments of respect,

Ortonville, Mich. T. S. Andrews, M.D.

JEFFERSON ON GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENT OF DAYS OF PRAYER.

When he was president, Thomas Jefferson, in reply to a request that he appoint a day of fasting and prayer, said:

I consider the government of the United States as interdicted by the Constitution from meddling with religious institutions, their doctrins, disciplins, or exercises. . . But it is only proposed that I should recommend, not prescribe, a day of fasting and prayer. That is, that I should indirectly assume to the United States an authority over religious exercises, which the Constitution has directly precluded them from. It must be meant, too, that this recommendation is to carry some authority, and to be sanctioned by some penalty on those who disregard it—not of fine and imprisonment, but with some degree of proscription, perhaps, in public opinion. And does the change in the nature of the penalty make the recommendation less a law of conduct for those to whom it is directed? I do not believe it is for the interest of religion to invite the chief magistrate to direct its exercise, its disciplin, or its doctrins; nor of the religious societies, that the general government should be invested with the power of effecting any uniformity of time or matter among them. Fasting and prayer are religious exercises; the enjoining them an act of discipline. Every religious society has a right to determin for itself the times for these exercises and the subjects proper for them according to their own particular tenets, and this right can never be safer than in their own hands, where the Constitution has deposited it. . . Everyone must act according to the dictates of his own reason, and mine tells me that civil powers alone hav been given to the president of the United States and no authority to direct the religious exercises of his constituents.

Letters from Friends.

MURRAY, IOWA, Jan. 12, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I received your circular a few days since, notifying me of my indebtedness to you, and I hav been discussing the question since then whom I shall pay. You see we—that is, myself and family—are a little community of Freethinkers in a large community of Christians, and of course we labor under the usual disadvantages incident to the lives of people who think for themselvs. If the Christians are to be believed, divine providence (whatever that means) has been keeping the people here on short allowance for three years past, and, notwithstanding long prayers, short prayers, male and female prayers, weeks of prayer, and regular Thursday evening prayer-meetings, he, she, or it (I don't know the sex of God) refuses to cause greenbacks to grow on the bushes. I am, in consequence, in debt some, and when two or more creditors are holding out their hands to receive the five-dollar bill, I am somewhat at a loss to decide to whom I shall pay it; but I hav decided in favor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and herewith, in accordance with said decision, find for my credit $5. I am doing what I can in the cause of true liberty, on the principle that "every little helps."

We liv right in between two churches, and in the wintertime we are regaled by the howlings of Christians mentally and magnetically drunk, and I don't believe in meddling with the affairs of other people much, but sometimes my patience givs out and I cannot help giving these poor simple creatures a piece of my mind; though I think the ice is melting. There has not been a convert to the "cause of Christ" for several years, and there hav been many desertions from the "army of Jesus," so that at the present time, if we count out the boys who go to church to see the girls, and the girls who go to see the boys, and the children who go for fun, and the men and women who go just to hav some place to go, the balance of the congregation could almost be counted on the ends of your fingers. Yes, young men and young women who go to school and learn from our school-books that the geography, the geology, the astronomy, the geometry, the history, and the cosmogony of the Bible are lies, old gray-headed lies, dug from the brain of falsehood before truth could record itself on paper, I say these young people are not the kind of material out of which Christians are made. Intelligence is not conduciv to the growth of Christianity, and therefore the rising generation, having superior advantages over the generations of the past, are inclined to doubt the teachings of the churchmen. The hope of Liberalism is, then, in the young people. Some of the old ones come out of the darkness of old superstition. But, as a rule, Liberal ideas find more congenial soil in the brain of the young than with the old people. I am glad to notice the spirit of fraternity that is growing among Liberals; we must not be a house divided against itself, we must hav "charity for all, and malice toward none." Liberalism will succeed because it is right. The superstition of the church will fail because it is wrong.

The church puts me in mind of a great tree covered with the rough bark of centuries of decay; its long limbs reaching out into the sunshine, excluding the light of nature from all beneath its withered leaves. It is colossal in size, and with each succeeding year it endeavors to bloom, but it does not bear fruit. If any fruit forms on its branches it soon withers under the light of truth and falls to the ground. If you will search for the cause you will find the little fibrous roots, the little tendrils which feed the body and impart strength to the whole tree, are gone; the source from which it once gained its strength is gone, so that while it has the size of a giant, it is a dead giant, and fast going to decay. Time, truth, and intelligence are the three Graces that hav sapped its foundations, and we Liberals must be prepared to substitute new pieces as fast as the old ones decay, until a tree of true liberty shall stand in the place of each and every one of these old trees of slavery. Yours truly, J. E. WICK.

CLEVELAND, O., Jan. 15, 1885

MR. EDITOR: Some time ago I stated through THE TRUTH SEEKER that I would explain the tricks of the Georgia Wonder to inquiring friends. Since then I hav received so many inquiries that, with your permission, I will try and giv that explanation through THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I understand she does some tricks that I hav not seen her do; so I will only explain those I hav seen. I saw her lift a chair from the floor by apparently only touching the points of her fingers to the top of the back of the chair. That trick was done by taking an extremely fine steel wire, annealed until all the elasticity was taken from it; one end fastened around her wrist of the right hand, and the other end passing down the side of the hand until it reaches the little finger. It is then wrapped around the finger close up to the hand. To the lower end is fastened a No. 4 shot, hanging down from 4 to 6 inches, as the case may require. By giving the hand a sweep, stopping it suddenly when it comes to the back of the chair, the momentum of the shot carries the wire under the back of the chair and up between the thumb and hand. Then, by closing her thumb tightly to her hand, thus preventing the shot from slipping through, she has, as you see, the chair fast in the loop of the wire.

I next saw her lift a chair with two men sitting on it back to back. These men were her assistants, and by pressing their shoulders together the line of gravitation is brought between them; thus they form a self-supporting arch, while they appear to be pressing down on the chair—instead of which they are lifting it up.

I saw her take a billiard cue, next, and place a citizen of the town at one end of it and a confederate at the other end. Then, by laying her hand on the top of the cue, she could sway those two men where she pleased. But the confederate did the pushing and pulling of the cue.

Again, she took a well-known citizen and placed an umbrella in his hand, he to hold it upright with one hand placed level with his head and the other ten inches lower down. Here she pushed the umbrella up and back. With such an advantage she can handle the strongest man in New York. In fact, if a man can stand up at all, he does well, being placed at such a mechanical disadvantage.

Passing to the next act, I saw her prevent five men from forcing a chair to the floor, by placing three of our citizens at a disadvantage, and two confederates at an advantage, the contest lying between the three citizens and the two confederates.

In conclusion I will say that I will make a forfeit of $100 if I cannot do any trick she has done immediately after her, or explain how it is done. If I win the forfeit, I am to take out any expenses of the trip, the balance to go to THE TRUTH SEEKER Campaign Fund. If I lose, the winner can do what he pleases with the money. JOHN DIMOND.

SHERIDAN, WYO., Jan. 8, 285.

MR. EDITOR: I see in one of THE TRUTH SEEKERS a letter from my old friend, Watson Heston, of Carthage, Mo., and that he is in needy circumstances. Being modest and unassuming, none but his few bosom friends know his real worth and ability, and I write this to let Liberals know of his great talent as an artist and photographer. If rich Liberals, Leagues, or other organizations wish to hav the growth, the present attitude, and the future of Freethought painted upon canvas to teach the understanding through the eye, they cannot do better than apply to him. Leave the designs to him; he has the ability to originate. In portrait and landscape painting he has no superior, and as a cartoonist he is equal to Puck. I hav a fine picture of Bakounine drawn by him in India ink, taken from a woodcut in Liberty, that money could not buy; that grandest and noblest martyr of liberty of all the heroes of the past adorns my wall and looks upon me with his rugged but kindly face, only to inspire me with a fervid love of liberty.

Friend Heston is now painting a picture to show the contrast between the theory of evolution and Christianity. Will not some one whe has the means compensate him, draw him out as a worker in that line of education in the Freethought field? In his community are many Liberals, but they claim he is too radical—as if anyone can be too radical who only follows where the truth leads!

There was no vote taken here upon the taxation of church property, as stated in THE TRUTH SEEKER. If it did not keep me rustling all the time to make a living, wife and I would commence an agitation of the question and try to get our legislature to act upon it; but for the present circumstances compel us to wait.

We cannot express our admiration for THE TRUTH SEEKER and its splendid editor. L. C. TIDBALL.

WOOLSON, N. J., Jan. 11, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Once, when planting bulbs, I was told to "plant 'em thick; they keep one another company and do better." Now, I think this is how Freethinkers ought to be. When I came here the newsdealers didn't know your paper. Now I learn "another gentleman has ordered it." I am a workingman, and if your other reader's social position is similar, I crave his acquaintance. I am sure it will be worth having. Freethinkers are always intelligent fellows. I love to meet a real Freethinker—not those fellows, indifferent dogs, who don't go to any place of worship, agree with you, but mostly send for the parson before the physician, on any domestic trouble.

Directly the new American Secular Union is formed, I desire to become a member. I don't fancy your connection with Liberalism; maybe that is the only kind of argument I could offer against it, but that is how I feel.

I never knew any good come to any society of Freethinkers by bothering with Spiritualists; they can't be "scientific" people. Then, you call yourselvs "Freethinkers."

Mr. Watts said to a reporter of the St. Louis Republican, shortly after he came to this country, that Mr. Bradlaugh went to the other extreme; he actually denied God. Now, as there is often quibbling over a word, I would like to ask Mr. Watts to be kind enough to say whether he meant Mr. Bradlaugh as denying the existence of God. T. D. HATFIELD.

JONESVILLE, VT., Jan. 12, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been dilatory in remitting, and sincerely regret that I can only remit one dollar now. I supposed I should hav been able to send the whole the 1st of January, but could not. I hav been unable to do much of anything for the past year and a half, but am getting better now, and think I shall send the balance in a couple of months or so. And I also want to contribute something toward the Campaign Fund, and mean to do so. I both feel and know that when anyone is engaged in such a noble work as you are, it is too bad to be in any wise hampered for means, and still more so for your just dues. But I intend as soon as possible to get ahead and keep so—at least, so far as THE TRUTH SEEKER is concerned, for it is a paper that above all others should be sustained.

My business is in the lecture-field, on the subject of mental science, and when I get out again I hope to send you some new subscribers.

I am here just now in the mountain region of northern Vermont, where the people are about two hundred years behind the times. They are not advanced enough for Freethought yet, having but just heard of Christ, so that it may be necessary for them to pass through the babyhood of Christianity before they will be able to comprehend the weightier truths of Liberalism. From my youth up, I hav never taken any stock in this joss-house business. I hav for many years lectured on mental science, and hav received more opposition from the clergy than from all others sources combined. Always, when pretending to favor science, they are at the same time secretly throwing cold water and mud upon it to the best of their ability.

When a young man, I intended when I got a competency to devote the balance of my life to exposing the hypocrisy of the Christian church. But before I was ready, Col. Ingersoll took the wind all out of my sails; and I am ever so glad he did, for he has done it so much better than it would hav been possible for me to do. J. D. BROWN.

BURTON, TEX., Jan. 10, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Your favor received. It is O. K. I hav been a friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and all connected with it, from the beginning of our acquaintance, and expect to remain so and be its supporter so long as I remain in this superstitious land. I wish it could be read in every family, and as soon as I am able to spare the time and means, it is my intention to do all possible to extend its circulation.

I am an out-and-out Materialist of the Thomas Winter school, and expect to liv and die unchanged. I never did, from a child, believe in the Bible doctrin, because I could see no sense or reason in the tales. I always had an idea that if there were a God that created us, as the Bible states, he surely was a simple one for not making himself understood in a more sensible way than by his so-called word. THE TRUTH SEEKER suits me exactly.

Hoping you the continued success deserving, I remain

Fraternally yours, H. B. JONES.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y., Jan. 20, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find one dollar to continue my subscription to your valuable paper. So far as I hav read your paper, I admire its position in regard to humanity, and I wish to so acknowledge it by my adherence. I should wish that Freethought could be universal, instead of the manifest indifference to all truth, intelligence, and improvement. A good speaker on Secularism ought to publicly open the eyes of our citizens, and see how many Liberals we hav.

I talk with a great many, and Christians will admit that the Bible is imperfect in parts, yet they call the book inspired, and believe the most imperfect parts. When a Christian has commenced to believe things beyond reason, there is no limit to his belief.

We must work to hav belief follow from reasoning and facts. Christianity is securing a foothold upon man's mind by the claiming to itself every virtue conceivable, and attempting to blot outsiders with the brand of all evils. They giv a pretty large dish of delicacies with their dose of poison, which they think will blind reason. But it is of no use; the superstitious principles of Christianity are surely dying, after the untiring efforts of the noble Liberal minds of the past and present. Let us work for the good of ourselvs, and especially for future generations. Yours for the right, FRANK MARTIN.

SACRAMENTO, CAL., Jan. 12, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Having by the kindness of a friend been permitted to read Mr. Remsburg's "Bible Morals," I can truly say if there is anything in this world calculated to open the eyes of the silly dupes, running after church and Bible, this is the book. One of these productions should follow every Bible into every family and into every church. For surely there is nothing that I hav seen so well calculated to show the falsehood of the Christian religion, and the immorality of the Bible. He who wants more evidence of fraud in the foundation of the Christian church than this is either a knave or a fool.

I suppose the reason the language of the Bible is not quoted in some instances is that the book would be too bad to pass through the mails. F. WOODWARD.

SACRAMENTO, Jan. 11, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just read "Bible Morals," by J. E. Remsburg. It's a short synopsis and ready reckoner on the immoral and inhuman acts and teachings of the Christians' Bible God. It's a splendid text-book for students of theology. Every traveling colporteur should present it with the Bible, as a key. Every Christian Sunday-school should be liberally supplied. Every Christian family should hav it on their center table; young and old should read it. It's a beautiful nosegay plucked from the branches of that "Holy Bible book divine; precious treasure, thou art mine." You may send me one dollar's worth of the book; I will circulate it among the saints and shepherds of the flock. R. B.

CENTRAL CITY, NEB, Jan. 12, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $7.25. Place the same to my account for subscription, and send me one copy of "The Story Hour." The Bible had to leave our table since your worthy sheet, THE TRUTH SEEKER, made its appearance. The "Children's Corner" is a great improvement. It is read by my children with great interest, and they impatiently await its arrival every Sunday eve. Go ahead with your noble work, and you will be appreciated by this nation in a not very distant day. Yours respectfully, A. S. BLEYER.

NEWPORT, ME., Jan. 10, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: With the views of your correspondent, Allen Pringle, in reference to reducing the size of THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator, I entirely disagree. Increase rather than diminish their divinely-inspired pages. But as to the Index, I hav long thought it desirable to reduce it to 0.

Friendly yours, SEWARD MITCHELL.

MERRILL, MICH., Jan. 4, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1885. I see that my last year's subscription expires on the 7th inst. I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for a number of years, and I do not feel inclined to do with out it.

Fraternally thine, NELSON HUNT.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Three in a Bed.

Where western breezes wail and howl
A rattlesnake, and snowy owl.
And prairie dog, with treble growl,
Dwell three in a bed.

The strangest family ever seen
Under the grasses brown or green,
And legions of puppies in between,
All to be fed.

Down on that Plutonian shore
Many Olivers begging for more,
Whose cradles cover the earthy floor,
With three in a bed.

The winding channels are dark and deep,
Where watchful mothers such vigils keep;
The babies are never but half asleep,
Though three in a bed.

In surplice white, the prairie owl,
His head arrayed in feathery cowl,
Guarding the door where burglars prowl,
With stealthy tread.

To the skylight, in his tawny clothes,
A canine crawls, with horny toes;
A summersault, and back he goes
As an arrow sped.

The owl, the dog, and rattlesnake,
Triumvirs strong, in council make
A triple law that none may break
Though he be dead.

The snake, the bird, and dusky dog
In subterranean damp and fog,
To the upper world remain incog,
These three in a bed.

Clearwater, Neb. MARY BAIRD-FINCH.

Roger and Tip.

Roger and Tip are two cats, both large, intelligent, and handsome. There are fifty species of cats in the world, and the domestic cat is of several varieties, and quite common. The early Egyptians regarded the cat as a sacred animal, and many ignorant people attribute certain demoniac qualities to cats. In the days of witchcraft superstition, there were not wanting individuals who actually thought that women and men who were reputed witches could transform themselvs at will into cats—usually black ones!

Joe, a colored man who once lived in our family, always declared that black cats were allied to Satan. "You needn't tell me, Miss Susan," he used to say, "dat black cats isn't debbils! Why, jess you look at dem great yaller eyes, staring right at yer! Done you see what dem yere eyes sayin' all de time?"

"They appear innocent enough, Joe," I would say.

"'Pear in'cent! Dere's where de pull de wool ober yere eyes, Miss Susan! You dunno, chile, what de sayin', does ye? Well, dere sayin', 'I knows where de brimstone fire's a ragin'.' Jess yer pass yer han' across dere back in de night, an' yer'll see de sparks o' fire hop right outen 'em! Oh, yer needn't tell me! I knows, chile! Dere's only waitin' to get a chance to draw yer breff all 'way. All de time dere singin' to yer so good, while de tea-k'le am a bi'lin', dere no frens to ye, chile, an' doan yer trust 'em!"

But many white people share the same fancies about cats, and I hav read of alleged instances of cats sucking the breath of young children till they died. Such tales, however, are not well authenticated, and we hav no reason to believe them.

Last year there was a great cat show in Boston, and a large variety of cats were on exhibition for several days in Horticultural Hall. Premiums of silver sups, plates, etc., were awarded on account of beauty, weight, intelligence, double or mitten paws, or any peculiarity out of the regular order of cats.

There is a vast difference in cats. Some are more intelligent that others, and are capable of being taught. Locality is strongly marked, and they hav a superior sense that guides them many miles to their homes. Once we owned a cat that was very naughty and troublesome, and she was sent away in a bag one night, a long distance, and left in a stable. The next morning at daylight, she was sitting on the door-step waiting for her breakfast! I hav heard of a cat who was sent to Newport from Fall River, twelve miles, and in a week was home again, having walked the entire distance.

But I started to tell you about two cats that I know. Roger was our little Susie's cat, and is jet-black—not a white spot on him.

He came to us as a tramp, when about half-grown, and little Susie at once adopted him. She had great times playing "tag" with him, and when he became tired of the game he would run up the clothes-pole, and, balancing on the top, would seem to say, "You can't catch me up here, little lady!"

He acquired a habit of lifting Susie's dolly from its little cradle and curling up in it himself, and then he would coax Susie to come and rock him to sleep. He was accustomed to follow Susie wherever she went, and one day he followed her all the way to her grandmother's, and after that he would come with her regularly, rain or shine.

He was dull and sad during her illness, and seemed to wonder why she could not run about and play as usual, and after the dark shadow of death had fallen upon the house, and her dear little form was silent and motionless, Roger wandered, sorrowful and lonely, about the rooms, looking up in our faces, mutely questioning the meaning of it all.

He came here and looked in every room, and then cried aloud, in heart-breaking tones, as he looked up at me, with the seeming inquiry in his eyes, "Where has my playmate gone?"

He still keeps up his habit of calling every day, sometimes alone, and sometimes with Susie's mamma, walking behind her like a little dog. People stop to look at the strange sight, and all the neighbors say, "It is little Susie's cat!" and not one would harm him, or injure him in any way, for he is, on her account, a sacred animal evermore.

One day, just before her illness, the butcher asked Susie, "Who would care for your Roger cat if you should go away this summer?"

"Why, you would, Mr. Butcher, wouldn't you?" she replied.

"Certainly I would," said he. And now Roger is treated to the choicest steak every day, and will be so treated while the butcher livs.

Tip is my own cat. He was born at Onset, and sent to me by cousin Henrietta when a wee kitten. He is a beautiful Maltese, and was subject to fits until after he was a year old, and then he gradually outgrew them. He is very intelligent, and has quite a history. He has been kidnapped twice, and each time returned safely home.

He learned to play the piano when a kitten, by running across the keyboard.

He frequently runs over the keys, now that he is older, for his own amusement. Sometimes he will sit upon the stool and pat the keys with his fore-paws. It is very cunning. Of course he does not play tunes, but he makes sounds, and at one time he was quite proud of this accomplishment.

He learned, also, to wash his face. You know cats are, generally speaking, afraid of water, but Tip used to sit in the bath-room and watch the process of washing faces with much earnestness. He would look wise and solemn, as if thinking in this fashion "What a queer way we cats hav of spitting in our hands, and then rubbing our faces with them! For my part, I'll not spit in my hands any more." And what was my surprise one morning to see him slip his paw under the faucet, and getting a drop of water on it, commence to rub his face. After that he would do it regularly, and, occasionally, he will take hold of the chain attached to the rubber stopper, lift it gently, and then lean over the bowl to see the water run down the pipe. He eats cake, crackers, cookies, peanuts, and, once in awhile, likes a little candy.

Of course he has some bad qualities as well as good ones. For instance, he is very sly, and will sometimes take that which does not belong to him. In fact, I believe he would prefer to steal rather than to hav an article given him. And then, he puts on such a demure and innocent look when discovered in any transgression—it really is quite laughable.

At night, should he happen to be out of doors, he has a habit of going up on the tin roof, and looking in the window of my room. If I fail to notice his presence, he will rattle the blinds with his paw and rap on the window with his nose. Of course I hav to let him in.

While I am writing, Tip and Roger are wrestling on the rug in front of me. It is quite amusing to watch them in their play.

These two cats demonstrate that the intelligence of the cat family may be developed to quite an extent by care, kindness, and patience. The more we talk to animals, the more tractable and teachable they become. If we are kind to them, they will be kind to us; and nothing is surer to make them cross, snappish, and peevish, than for us to be cross, snappish, and peevish toward them. They learn our every mood, and what our language means, just as truly as the cat learns the meaning of the word "scat."

The Pride of a Child.

In one of the St. Louis public schools many of the children who came from a distance were accustomed to bring a lunch, and thus save a long walk home for dinner. They generally ate it together, and had a merry time. Among those who stopped, one of the teachers noticed a little girl who never brought any lunch, but who looked wistfully at her playmates as they were eating the noon meal. But one day the girl brought her bundle also, wrapped in a paper. At noon she did not go with the others, but remained at her desk as if preferring to eat alone. The teacher, thinking her unsocial, advised her to go to the lunchroom with her playmates, and walked toward the desk to take the bundle. But the little girl, bursting into sobs, said, "Don't touch it, teacher, and, oh, teacher, don't tell, please. It's only blocks." The poor girl had no dinner to bring, but wished to keep up "appearances," so as not to seem unlike her schoolmates. And she was one of the best scholars in the school. She was very dear to the teacher's heart after that incident.—St. Louis Times.

Our Puzzle Box.

DECAPITATIONS.

I present you the three-headed canine of hell,
Yet with critical eye you examin him well,
And you'll find that the ancient mythologists blundered,
For his head-piece is found to denote just one hundred.
But cut off his head, and the two means transpose,
Then delete the next letter that comes after those,
And the name of the place that he watches it shows;
Again, if the first of this place you erase,
The name of a puzzle appears in its place;
And now, if this puzzle you two times behead,
For a coach, you've a common contraction instead;
Once more, if the leader of this we discard,
Ourselvs we must take, both reader and bard,
But pointed aright, an abbreviation
That stands for the whole of our glorious nation;
Now, if you politely withdraw, I'll proceed
A letter from Miss Susan Wixon to read.
In all these beheadings, my dear poser friend,
I've begun at the only available end;
For this dog from cur-tailment is ever secure,
From the tip of his tail to the center he's "sure."
Please remember, dear Preston, thou kind-hearted man,
This canine was dead ere my puzzle began.

COMPLIMENTARY.

Though there be apples, and apples untold,
The best are Miss Wixon's "Apples of Gold."
An appel-lation, to be brief,
Whose truth is shown by every leaf;
And the printer knew, when it caught his eye,
They were much too fine for printer's pi;
So he smacked his lips, and shook his head,
And "set them up" for the children instead.

The Sense of Honor in Boys.

There is a great confusion in boy's notions of honor. You should not go to your teacher with tales of your schoolmates, but when questioned by those in authority over you, parents, guardians, or teachers, it is your duty to tell who did the mischief, or broke a rule, no matter what result to yourself, or how unpopular you become. Boys hav a false horror which hides mean and skulking actions in each other, which ought to be ridiculed out of them. The most cowardly injuries and injustice among boys go unchecked, and the weaker are abused and bullied in a way every decent boy should resent, because his false notions, of companionship leads them to lie, prevaricate, or keep silence to screen the guilty. Teachers and friends ought to put down this ignorant, petty "sense of honor," for something more intelligent and upright. When you know of a wrong and keep silence about it when asked, you become a partner in the wrong, and responsible for its original meanness. It is a pity that boys and grown-up people did not carry the same strictness of principle they show in screening bullies and frauds into into points of genuin honor and courage.—Wide Awake.

Breaking It Gently.

HOW FAITHFUL MICHAEL TOLD THE BAD NEWS TO HIS YOUNG MASTER.

A young scion of our financial aristocracy, who had been on an extended yachting tour in the South seas for several months, and out of reach of all telegraphic and epistolary communication, returned home the other day. He was met by an old and faithful employee of the house.

"Well, Mike, how goes it?" said the young man.

"Bad enough, Master John, for your poor jackdaw is dead."

"Is he, indeed. Poor Jack! He has gone the way of all flesh. How did he die?"

"Well, they don't rightly know, sir; but they think he must hav overeat himself."

"The greedy fellow. What did they giv him so much for?"

"Well, sir, it seems he must hav got to the place where the dead horses was lying——"

"Dead horses! What dead horses?"

"The carriage horses. It was a very bad day and a heavy road, and they were kept standing."

"When? What day? What road?"

"The road to the cemetery, sir, and the day of the funeral."

"What funeral?"

"Why, the mistress's, sir."

"Not my mother's!"

"The same, sir, rest her soul. She took the master's death so much to heart that she did not liv three day's after him."

"The master's! Heavens, Mike, do you tell me I hav lost both my parents?"

"The poor ould master took to his bed when he received the bad news, and niver left it, sir, till they put him in his coffin."

"What bad news? What was the intelligence that afflicted the old gentleman so deeply?"

"The run on the bank, sir, which has stopped payment. The credit of the house is gone, and you are not worth a dollar."—The Judge.

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR

Parallels in Other Religions

Being a Comparison of the Old and New estament Myths and Miracles with those of heathen nations of Antiquity, Considering also their Origin and Meaning. With numerous illustrations.

The object of the work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning.

"It has long been acknowledged by the most eminent biblical students that the Hebrew scripture contain a large mythical element; but, so far as we know, the present is the first complete and scholarly atttempt to trace these myths to their source, and ascertain their original signification."—Boston Courier.

"Never before has there been given a volume to the reading world that shows the research for the origin of these myths as does this one just pub ished by J. W. Bouton, of New York."—Boston Times.

"It is unquestionably true that the results of a rationalistic study of the Christian scriptures are nowhere else so accessible as they are now made in the work before us.—N. Y. Sun.

Poetry.

Reaching out to the Sea of Eternity.

God, God, God!
God of the man-made creeds,
Imbued with the human passions,
Apprised of the human needs;
Be not of our own contriving,
Nor God of the angry winds,
Nor yet of a chosen people,
Nor God of the cringing minds.

God, God, God!
God belittled of man,
A grim trimurti blending
That older pagan plan,
Fierce in the raging battles,
Soul of the battle hymn,
Where each one warring for power
Has cried to the powers dim.

God, God, God!
God of the spirit-lands,
God that no man may hasten
With weak uplifted hands.
He's 'bove our ken or caring;
Our lights hav been so small,
We crave but a hell for the neighbor
We pity from over the wall.

God, God, God!
God of the stellar seas,
God of the mighty spaces—
No wailing prayers like these,
Nor mocking cries, may reach thee,
To change a primal law,
And shape mankind's endeavor
To every flimsy flaw.

Vain, vain, vain!
Vain are the words of ours,
Dumb are the latent forces,
Dumb the creativ powers.
Grand are the silent marches
Born of the central suns,
The iridescent oceans
Where th' electric fire runs.

Clearwater, Neb. MARY BAIRD-FINCH.

Opinions of Our Recent Publications.

Mr. Albert Chavannes, editor of the Sociologist, writes of "The Story Hour:"

"I hav just received the Children's Book, and I want to tell you how pleased I am with it. The execution is equal to the best work of that kind, and is an honor to your printing establishment; and the engravings, as well as the stories, will make the delight of all who will see them. I hope the venture will prove a paying one, and that you will keep on improving and increasing the most important and successful Freethinking printing house in America. I shall take pleasure in noticing the book in the March issue of the Sociologist, so as to do what lies in my power to bring it to the notice of possible buyers."

Of the same book the Boston Investigator says:

"This new book for children, written by Miss Susan H. Wixon, and published at the New York TRUTH SEEKER office, is one of those volumes that all Liberals should patronize, and mainly because the books generally put into the hands of children are more or less unfit on account of stories of a superstitious character. Miss Wixon, who is an excellent writer, and very sensible because Liberal, avoids the common mistake of teaching religion to children, and hence her stories are instructiv, reasonable, useful, and practical, and this is the only proper kind of reading for boys and girls.

"'The Story Hour' contains nearly 300 pages, 91 pictures, and 34 very interesting and admirably told stories. It is neatly printed, handsomely bound, and its great merits should secure for it a large sale as an encouragement to the accomplished writer to continue her important work for the Liberal education of children. Price, $1.25; two copies, $2.00."

The Winsted (Conn.) Press has also seen a copy and advises those of its "Liberal-minded readers who wish to purchase a handsome book for their children, filled with good reading and equally good pictures, to send to THE TRUTH SEEKER office in New York and get a copy of 'The Story Hour.'"

Lucifer says "The Story Hour" is "the largest and best gotten up—in an artistic point of view—children's book that has been issued from the Liberal press, so far as we know."

A little girl in Fall River, Miss Wixon's home, took her "Story Hour" to school, and the teacher read from it to the children, saying it was the best book for children she had ever examined.

"The Story Hour" commands the respect of the Index, which givs it this paragraph:

"This is a collection of between thirty and forty short, pleasant stories of child-life, each 'pointing a moral' free from theological bias. All the stories are original, and written by Miss Wixon, who seems to be a true lover of the little ones. These stories are accompanied by nearly one hundred beautiful illustrations, many of them full-page pictures. The book is nicely printed in large, clear type, and is handsomely bound. It is dedicated to the memory of the author's little niece, whose portrait adorns the first page."

Miss Wixon's new novel, "All in a Lifetime," the San Francisco Universe pronounces "a remarkable literary production, and one which is likely to create a sensation in orthodox circles. The characters are graphically portrayed, the scenes startling in their vividness, and the plot as realistic as it is romantic. There is not an intelligent Agnostic lady in the land who should not read 'All in a Lifetime,' and every intelligent Christian lady will find it deeply interesting and suggestiv reading. It is a work of 297 pages, and is printed in elegant style. Price, $1.50. For sale by the New York TRUTH SEEKER."

Kedarnath Basu writes from Berhampur, Bengal, India, that he has received Miss Wixon's novel, "All in a Lifetime," and that he regards it as splendid in every respect. Such novels, he says, are needed to help along the progress of the race, and should hav a large circulation all over the world. It will soon be translated into Bengali. On account of a change in postal arrangements, Mr. Basu desires his American friends to direct letters and papers to him at Khagra, Murshidabad, Bengal, India, instead of Berhampur, Bengal, India, as heretofore.

The London National Reformer (Mr. Bradlaugh's paper) makes a paragraph on our latest biblical silhouet:

"Mr. John E. Remsburg has issued a very vigorously written pamphlet on 'Bible Morals.' Mr. Remsburg is well known among the Freethinkers of the United States as a most able lecturer and writer, and his presont publication is directed to show that in respect of some twenty-five specified vices and crimes the Bible is not a safe or useful guide. The text references are carefully given."

The Nonconformist thinks about the same:

"'Bible Morals' is the title of a very useful work of 57 pages, by John E. Remsburg. It is a compilation of proofs that the orthodox Bible directly sanctions crime; that whereas those measuring their lives by it, instead of being safer from temptation to vice than those who do not, are the most likely to become criminals. We cannot commend this work too highly. It ought to be in the hands of all, both old and young, and they would soon see that they had been sadly mistaken in the book that they had been taught to reverence. To be had of the Truth Seeker Company, 33 Clinton Place, N. Y."

Dr. Whitford's "Christianity a Reward for Crime" also meets with Lucifer's approbation. It is, it says, "one of the best missionary documents we hav seen for general circulation," and Liberals should "send for a dozen or a hundred copies and distribute to all who are willing to read both sides."

CONSULTING ROOMS,

471 WEST MADISON ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

Something for Invalids to read and study over.—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

Ah! but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would not submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we hav treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all form of chronic invalidism.

ALL in a LIFETIME,

A ROMANCE.

BY MISS SUSAN H. WIXON.

"The great charm of this novel is its absolute fidelity to nature. Its personages are those one meets with in common life, and are portrayed with a vividness and perspicuity I was scarcely prepared to expect to find, in such a marked degree, even from so gifted a pen as that of Miss Wixon, whose brilliant and lucid style is familiar to most readers in the Freethought ranks. . . . But what pleased me most in this charming story was the unflinching honesty with which its author holds up to the derision of the world the rottenness of average ministerial character, particularly that of revivalist type. I hav not space here to treat, in detail, of the characters of this truly absorbing novel. Suffice it to say that it is safe to predict that anyone who reads its first chapters will be loth to lay it down till the denouement is reached. Miss Wixon has long been doing a noble work in educating our children into the ranks of true Liberalism, thereby robbing the church of hundreds of those who, in after years, might hav become its willing dupes and servil tools, and she certainly deserves the generous and substantial recognition of all Freethinkers. Let everyone send for a copy of 'All in a Lifetime.' It will yield a liberal reward for the outlay.

Gems of Thought.

FIRST of all knowledge to be acquired is of nature's laws; these are the foundation of all knowledge, the principles which govern all existence, all movements, all conditions. Nature is the highest power that exists; it is the sum total of all existences, the highest, the lowest. the all. It cannot be too well understood, it cannot be too closely studied; and knowledge of its laws cannot be too thoroughly learned.—D. M. Bennett.

FOR nearly two thousand years Judas Iscariot has been execrated by mankind; and yet, if the doctrin of the atonement is true, upon his treachery hung the plan of salvation. Suppose Judas had known of this plan—known that he was selected by Christ for that very purpose, that Christ was depending on him. And suppose that he also knew that only by betraying Christ could he save either himself or others; what ought Judas to hav done? Are you willing to rely upon an argument that justifies the treachery of that wretch?—R. G. Ingersoll in the Christian Religion.

THE unity of the universe is a scientific fact. To assert that it is the operation of a single mind is a conjecture based upon analogy, and analogy may be a deceptiv guide. It is the most reasonable guess that can be made, but it is still no more than a guess; and it is one by which nothing, after all, is really gained. It telis us that the earth rests upon the tortoise; it does not tell us on what the tortoise rests. God issued the laws which manufactured the universe, and which rule it in its growth. But who made God? Theologians declare that he made himself [I am not aware of any theologian that has committed himself, in so many words, to this proposition, but their constant talk of the self-existence of God comes to much the same thing.—Hylax], and Materialists declare that matter made itself [?], and both are barren phrases, idle words. The whole subject is beyond the powers of the human intellect, in its present state. All that we can ascertain is this—that we are governed by physical laws, which it is our duty, as scholars of nature, to investigate; and by moral laws, which it is our duty, as citizens of nature, to obey.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

I SAY, I hav power to do as I please. But suppose there is another power back of my consciousness that determins that I shall do so and so, and then what? Free will, then, in any proper use of language, does not say merely that I am free to do as I please, that I am free to originate choices. If the freedom of the will means anything, it means that the will is an independent, spontaneous, self-acting power. And that I cannot hold.—M. J. Savage.

WHETHER there be one God, or many, what may be his natural and what his moral attributes, in what relation his creatures stand to him, whether he has ever disclosed himself to us by any other revelation than that which is written in all the parts of the glorious and well-ordered world which he has made, whether his revelation be contained in any permanent record, how that record should be interpreted, and whether it hath pleased him to appoint any unerring interpreter on earth; these are questions respecting which there exists the widest diversity of opinion, and respecting which a large part of our race has, ever since the dawn of regular history, been deplorably in error.—Macaulay.

THERE is no distinct proof that Moses disbelieved in the existence of other gods; the God whom he serves is still "the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob;" he is not asserted to be the only God; the existence and power of rival deities is not denied, but is even admitted by implication. All that Moses claims for Jehovah is, not that he is the sole God, but that he is superior to all others. "Who is like unto thee, Jehovah, among the gods?" And he represents him to Pharaoh, by Jehovah's own command, not as the supeeme lord of heaven and earth. Even in the delivery of the commandments, the great foundation of the law, it is not said, "There is no God but Jehovah," but only, "I am the Lord thy God, which bringeth thee out of the house of bondage; thou shalt hav no other gods beside me" (or before me). The whole of the 24th chapter of Joshua confirms this view: he there urges the Israelites to choose Jehovah, not as the only God, whom to desert would be to become Atheists, but a God whose bounties to them had been so great that it would be black ingratitude not to prefer him to all others. The whole history of the lapses of the Jewish nation into idolatry also discourages the idea of their having been really monotheists. The worship of the golden calf and the Canaanitish gods was quite natural on the supposition of Jehovah being merely a paramount and preferred God; monstrous, if they had believed him to be the only one. Moreover, their idolatry is always spoken of as Infidelity, not as Atheism.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

TIMES of heroism are generally times of terror; but the day never shines in which this element may not work. The circumstances of men, we say, are historically somewhat better in this country at this hour than perhaps ever before. More freedom exists for culture. It will not now run against an ax at the first step out of the beaten track of opinion. But whoever is heroic will always find crises to try his edge. Human virtue demands her champions and martyrs, and the trial of persecution always proceeds. It is but the other day that the brave Lovejoy gave his breast to the bullets of a mob for the rights of free speech and opinion, and died when it was better not to liv.—Emerson.

LITTLE do men perceive what solitude is, and how far it extendeth; for a crowd is not company, and faces are but a gallery of pictures, and talk but a tinkling cymbal, when there is no love. The Latin adage meeteth with it a little, "Magna civitas, magna solitudo" [a great city, a great desert], because in a great town friends are scattered, so that there is not that fellowship, for the most part, which is in less neighborhoods; but we go further and affirm most truly, that it is a mere and miserable solitude to want true friends, without which the world is but a wilderness; and even in this sense also of solitude, whosoever in the frame of his nature and affection is unfit for friendship, he taketh it of the beast, and not from humanity.—Bacon's Eyssas.

By Thomas Paine.

Speaking of this work in connection with the proposed independence of America from Great Britain, Washington wrote: "A few more such flaming arguments . . . will not leave numbers at a loss to decide on the propriety of a separation."

STATUETTE OF THOMAS PAINE.

This Statuette of the author-hero is a fac simile of the model of Prof. Richards for the monument proposed to be erected in Lincoln Park. It is admitted o be a fine work of art, and is the only correct outline of Thomas Paine's head and face in existence being executed from a mask taken at the time of his death, and sent, with other effects, to a friend in France, from whence Prof. Richards procured it for his design.

Size 20x16 inches, weight 35 lbs.; finished in the same style as Rogers's groups.

Price reduced from $14 00 to $10.00. Sole agent, E. A. STEVENS, 480 W. Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

Odds and Ends.

AT what time was Adam married? On his wedding Eve.

THE sultan of Morocco has one thousand wives. Solomon only had seven hundred. But Solomon was a wise man; he knew when he had enough.

"YOU may speak," said a fond mother, "about people having strength of mind, but when it comes to strength of don't mind, my son William surpasses everybody I ever knew."

SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHER: Now, the book says here, "He felt abased." Tell me now, Norah Donovan, what is it to feel abased? Norah: A baste? Sure it's to be a crayture—donkey, mum.

ALL men who are forty years of age are excellent men. For the benefit of people not accustomed to this style of wit we will say that all men who are XL years of age are XLent men. There yer are. Cut it out.

A YOUNG lady who was noted for the reckless manner in which she prevaricated was asked why she persisted in telling falsehoods. "Well," said she, "you see, my modesty prevents me from having anything to do with the naked truth."

"NOT a Christian, sir; did you say he was not a Christian?" "So I've always believed, Mr. Blogg," "Then there's where you've alway got left." "Does he attend divine service regularly?" "Perhaps not. But this I do know. He regulates his watch by St. Paul's church clock every morning. He told me so himself. Not a Christian, indeed!"

THE minister of a Scotch Presbyterian church had preached an affecting sermon on the casting of the devils into the herd of swine. Affluent Parishioner: "A weel, meenister, and hoo many sperrits d'ye ken were cast out?" Minister: "Aboot twa thoosand." Affluent Parishioner: "Twa thoosand! God sa'e us! What a bellyful must the puir mon ha' had forbye they left him!"

THEY sent him round the circle fair,
To bow before the prettiest there;
I'm bound to say the choice he made
A creditable taste displayed;
Although—I can't say what it meant—
The little maid looked ill content.

His task was then anew begun—
To kneel before the wittiest one.
Once more the little maid sought he,
And went him down upon his knee.
She bent her eyes upon the floor—
I think she thought the game a bore.

He circled then—his sweet behest
To kiss the one he loved the best;
For all she frowned, for all she chid,
He kissed that little maid, he did,
And then—though why I can't decide—
The little maid looked satisfied!

A CERTAIN young man, not particularly noted for piety, visited a revival meeting up-town the other night for the sole purpose of escorting a blushing and beautiful damsel home 'neath the inspiring radiance of the starry skies. He was sitting on a back seat when the revivalist came down to talk personally with those whom he might select. Approaching the Adonis he inquired in a sepulchral tone: "Young man, hav you found the Lord?" "I—I didn't know he was lost," was the hesitating response. His girl felt badly when the revivalist used him as a terrible example of the degeneracy of American youth.

THE moon now shines bright,
And its clear mellow light,
Like a flood, falls on country and town,
And the sparkling snow gleams,
'Till like silver it seems,
And the stars twinkle merrily down.

Two young lovers glide
In a sleigh side by side,
And the man has his sheltering arm
'Round the maiden's trim waist,
And her lips he does taste,
And he vows he will shield her from harm.

He thinks no one near,
So, into her ear,
He whispers words—you know what kind—
But he quickly grows dumb,
As he hears a "yum! yum!"
From a boy on a sled tied behind!

AT Petaluma, a small "milk-can station" on the Napa road, a fervent appeal was made last Sunday by the pastor of the proposed church there for funds to build said edifice. Not a cow puncher moved. The entire congregation of teat squeezers seemed wrapped in slumber. As the minister gazed mournfully around, a hen suddenly flew out of the old plug hat used as a contribution box, making a terrible cackling. The pastor approached the hat, and beheld a new-laid egg. Holding up the hen fruit, he exclaimed sarcastically: "She has contributed her all. Will you allow yourselvs te be outdone by a hen?" The effect was electrical. In less than twenty minutes there was over forty-five cents in the pool.

PAT REILLY was taking a ride,
On an elegant summer's morning,
And Kathleen sat close by his side,
Bright smiles her face adorning.

And she looked so tidy and neat,
Her figure so plump and trim,
No girl half so pretty and sweet
Had ever appeared to him.

Said Pat: "Your eyes are so blue,
And your lips so temptingly red,
They're the purtiest ever I knew,
And belong to the colleen I'd wed.

"Ah! darlin', if it wasn't this baste
That's pullin' my poor arms apart,
They would tinderly shteal round your waist
And yourself be pressed to my heart.

"For my love is that powerful indade
Without you I cannot survive."
Then Kathleen blushed and said:
"Mr. Reilly, perhaps I could drive."

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office as New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 12. No. 8. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY. | New York, Saturday, February 21, 1885. | 33 CLINTON PLACE. | $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

It is reported that 75,000 people are out of employment in New York city.

A BILL prohibiting baseball playing on Sunday, and making it punishable by a heavy fine, was passed a few days ago by the Arkansas Senate.

SOME one says that "one day with the Lord is as a thousand." Those of us who hav attended church when we were boys quite agree with the statement.

A PERFECTLY developed shark's tooth was recently drawn from the depth of over 1,000 feet in an artesian well at Columbus, Ga. Where the drill is now at work is believed to hav once been the bed of an ocean.

A YOUNG lady tripped down stairs and paused at the parlor door. "Oh, is that you, papa?" she said. "I thought I heard the minister's voice raised in prayer." "No," replied the old man. "I am trying to fix this confounded stovepipe."

SOME Christian ladies of London are trying to convert the ballet-girls by getting up a "mission" for them. They invite the girls to afternoon teas in cheerless halls, call them "poor creatures" in a patronizing way, and exhort them to learn the church catechism by heart. After thus impressing upon them their degraded condition, the ladies go home well satisfied with their work. No conversions hav yet been reported.

"IT's terrible, it is," said Hannah Smiley, as she threw down the paper, "how those poor people in great cities liv. Everything seems to combine against them. No light in their tenements, no society except the worst, and everything that is unclean all about them. I don't see how they liv." "They don't liv," suggested Ichabod, "they simply fail to die." And the old couple seemed to be more thankful than ever that they lived in the country where pure air, good neighbors, and cleanliness were the foundation elements of comfort.

THE Free Church of Scotland has, from the very first, been puritanic in its tendencies. In the large centers of population these tendencies hav been held very much in check, but in the more rural districts, and especially in the northern counties, the church has looked with a severe eye on what to many are innocent amusements. Dancing, it would seem, has become more common of late years in the north, and the presbytery of Aberdeen, by 23 votes to 12, approved the reports of its "Committee on Religion and Morals," condemning "dancing and similar evils." Perhaps it is the suppression of innocent pleasures in the Free Church of Scotland that has produced the many that are not innocent, for which the Scotch Christians are notorious. In spite of its Presbyterianism, or, perhaps, by reason of it, the state of morals in Scotland is shockingly low.

EX-SENATOR DORSEY is an epigrammatic talker. Hs is in Washington now, and his office is constantly besieged with callers. During the course of a long conversation on politics, Mr. Dorsey, in answer to a question, spoke of what the questioner called the "religious racket" of the Republican management of 1884. He said: "I presume you refer to the Congregational clergymen who welcomed Mr. Blaine in New York. Religion should never be yanked into politics. The only good that it has ever done that I know of is to be barbaric to itself. The roasting-iron of religion has destroyed all the geniuses ever produced in the world. Bigotry and death walk hand in hand. A vicious man always carries the Bible in his vest pocket. The Republican party laid a sullen ear to the open window of a Catholic confessional. Honest people tell the truth at the confessional." To another of his visitors: "You are a Republican, are you not, and you ask me about Mr. Blaine and his friend Burchard—doubtless from friendly motivs. I hav never had any use for a man when he would lie upon credit when he could get the cash for telling the truth. Deception always deceives he man who originates it."

THE Merchant Traveler gets off the following: "There is displayed in the last moments of a Christian a faith so perfect, a trust so boundless, and a hope so beautiful, that no man, whatever his belief, can remain unmoved as he sees the dying one loosen his grasp on all things earthly, and, with confident strength, take hold upon that which, though unseen, is not unknown, having been made manifest unto those who believe in Christ. There is no dark valley of death to him, and no shadows, for death is the portal of the shadowless land. What doubts may hav arisen are dispelled, and as a little child he puts his trusting hand into the father's, and with the old smile to those who loved him on earth, and the newer one to those who await him beyond, goes upon his untried journey, firm in his hope, and confident in the power which leads only in one direction." It is sad to be called to take the edge off anything so beautiful as this, but the facts are against it. Even the founder of Christianhimself went down into the shadow with a wail of despair, which, for utter hopelessness, has never been equaled.

ANOTHER religion-crazed man developed at Verona, Pa., week before last. Within a few weeks Wm. Wade engaged a man to work around his house and grounds. Mrs. Wade, hearing one of her dogs howling in distress, stepped out to learn the cause, and observed the hired man beating the valuable animal. No sooner did he see the lady than he rushed toward her, yelling like a demon, "I hav a mission from God to kill you!" He hurled a stone as he ran, and it struck her arm. This was followed by a ponderous blow of the fist, which felled the lady to the ground, and in this position he continued the assault most desperately. The hired girl stood inside the door undecided whether to run for help or to attack the madman. The latter, seeing a pile of stones and bricks a few yards away, released Mrs. Wade and started toward it, evidently intending to beat her with the stones. The girl then leaped from the doorway and dragged her mistress into the house. Infuriated at this, the maniac stoned the house and shrieked in his rage. The girl stole out from another door and ran for assistance. Three men answered the summons, and, after considerable effort, secured the man, who had nearly exhausted himself. Mrs. Wade, though badly bruised and confined to her room, is not seriously injured.

A REMARKABLE and disastrous conversion of an Infidel to Christianity is reported from Wall's Bottom, near Clarington, Monroe Co., Ohio. A revival has been in progress there for about two months, and nearly everybody has been converted. A German so-called Infidel, named Chris Dongel, was the last to yield. Thursday night of last week, it is said, the power took hold of him, and he went forward for prayers. This was the signal for great rejoicing. One brother climbed to the top of the pulpit, and there executed a breakdown. Some of the women went into a trance, and others lay down on the floor and rolled over. The minister prayed for Dongel until about midnight, when the new convert jumped to his feet and yelled "Hosannah!" He next signalized his change of heart by knocking the minister down, inflicting a severe wound on the dominie's scalp. The congregation shouted in triumph. At 4 o'clock in the morning the meeting broke up. "That day," the account goes on to relate, "Dongel lost his mind, and imagined that he was sent as a special agent to care for the preacher. With this idea in view he went to the house of Jacob Meiser, and decoyed Meiser into the cellar, where he locked him up. Going into the house, Dongel, under a threat of death, compelled Mrs. Meiser to show where the money was kept. Dongel took it, together with all he could carry in the way of clothing, to the preacher. Meiser, being released, followed him; but he was attacked by Dongel, and nearly killed. That night Dongel drove the preacher out of the pulpit, and took his place there, announcing that he was Christ come to judge the world, and he would now separate the sheep from the goats. A terrible scene ensued, but Dongel was finally secured, and is now in confinement." So, one by one, they are being gathered in. Some of them go to jail, some to the lunatic asylum. The great work of crushing Infidelity goes on, and as a natural accompaniment we hav insanity and crime. The Christian religion ought to go.

WHEN the Western press gets after the Western pulpit the language used is apt to be peculiarly occidental. The Mason City Republican of Jan. 29th contains this: "We are authentically informed that the gentleman who for the past several months has, by his occupancy, caused to be vacant the Baptist pulpit (the Rev. A. J. Colwell), without provocation or remotest warrant, and in our absence, dragged the personal name of the editor of the Republican before the audience of a large and mixed congregation, and unequivocally stated that we had been 'lying about him.' Now the gentleman may not be aware that the day has long since gone by when a clerical carper may stand in his high position and with impunity assault the fair fame of a citizen. It is not enough to occupy a noble place—the place must be nobly filled; it is not enough to stand on Christian ground—one must be a Christian. And when a clergyman condescends to desecrate his holy desk by bandying about the barroom epithet of 'liar,' the dignity of his place is lost to him as a shelter, and he must answer for his offense as a common man to man before the public. The files of this paper are open for the careful inspection of any person who will call at this office. Every line that has ever been penned by the writer will show for itself, and we emphatically deny the gentleman's charge, and further declare that he must either prove his assertion or rest under the implication of having 'lied' himself."

HENRY SEYBERT, when he died not long ago, left $60,000 for the endowment of a chair of mental and moral philosophy in the University of Pennsylvania, with the stipulation that Spiritualism should be investigated in all its branches. This was to be called the Adam Seybert chair, after the father of the deceased, who was a chemist and mineralogist. A committee has therefore been appointed, and the Philadelphia Press reports progress as follows: "Dr. Henry Slade, spirit medium, slate-writer, and table-tipper, recently found himself in a large, well-lighted room, surrounded by the learned men of the University of Pennsylvania, who were appointed under the will of the late Henry Seybert a commission to investigate modern Spiritualism. In the presence of this distinguished jury Dr. Slade performed his slate-writing test. In doing this he takes two clean and apparently new slates, places them together with a scrap of slate pencil between, and holds them under the table. After an invocation of some sort, a scratching is heard, and when the slates are opened they are found covered with writing. After the performance, at which the learned members of the commission were much astonished, Slade was asked if he could, or would, explain the phenomena which had just been witnessed. 'No,' he said, 'I am merely the instrument, and know no more about it than you do. I should be glad to explain if I could, but I cannot.' One of the members then arose, and, thanking Dr. Slade for making the trip at the special request of the commission, proceeded to count out to him $300 in crisp new bills. The medium returned to New Yerk. He had given six private seances, each of twenty minutes' duration, to the commission, for which he received the sum mentioned. During his stay here he remained in a private house, and every effort was made to keep his whereabouts a secret. The commission has been steadily engaged in pursuing the investigations, and much valuable material has been collected. Nearly all the local mediums hav been examined, and even California has been reached in the effort to elucidate the truth. Kellar, the magician, will be the next person examined by the commission, and possibly Europe will be ransacked to furnish its mediums. 'If necessary,' said a member of the commission, 'we will go to Kamskatka. Our labors will probably occupy us three years longer, and at the conclusion we shall publish a large volume contanining a full report of all that we hav accomplished.'"

News of the Week.

THERE was a noticeable relaxation of police stringency regarding the Excise law in this city last Sunday.

IT is intended to make the brilliancy of Cleveland's inauguration surpass that of any previous occasion of a similar sort.

DR. LEOPOLD DAMROSCH, the distinguished musical director, died at his home in this city last Sunday. He was 52 years old.

THE faculty of Harvard hav decided that attendance upon religious services shall be no longer compulsory on the students of that college.

TWENTY-FIVE lunatics were burnt to death in the destruction by fire of the insane department of the Philadelphia almshouse on the 12th inst.

THE number of valentines delivered by the mail-carriers in New York last Saturday was about one-quarter that of previous St. Valentine's days.

A GREAT snowslide swept through the mining-camp of Alta, in Utah, on the 14th, destroying three-fourths of the town and killing sixteen persons.

THE Catholic church of Notre Dame, at Fall River, Mass., is understood to be closed until further notice. Meanwhile the Salvation Army will inaugurate a revival in that long-suffering community.

THE establishment of the Co-operativ Hat Co. at Norwalk, Conn., was burnt out last week. The company grew out of the recent strike of the hatters of that place, who believe that the fire was set by their enemies. They hav secured another building.

SENTENCE was pronounced last week upon the Rev. T. O'Connell of London, Ont., who was found guilty by the Board of Triers of scandalous and disorderly conduct in frequently drinking to excess, and becoming intoxicated. He loses his situation as assistant minister in a cathedral.

CAPT. PHELAN, the man whom Short stabbed in O'Donovan Rossa's office, has returned to Kansas City. He had given his testimony as to the assault, but could not afford to wait for New York justice to take its course. As it is the people against Short, the case can of course be proceeded with without Capt. Phelan's presence.

DUNCAN C. ROSS, the athlete, recently announced as a convert to Christianity, went on a spree at Louisville, Ky., one day last week. He got drunk, broke up the furniture in a hotel office, and fired a revolver at the clerk. The latter drew a pistol, whereupon Ross begged for mercy, and was kicked out of doors. Mr. Ross's case appears to be one of those where religion has struck in.

"HONG GEE," the Chinese New Year, was celebrated Feb 14th. The Chinese calendar dates always from the beginning of the reigning dynasty. The present ruler of China went into office Feb. 14, 1875, consequently last Saturday was the beginning of the year 10 in Chinese chronology. It is a sort of New Year's Day, Washington's birthday, and Fourth of July combined, and the residents of Mott street made the locality lurid with their joyful demonstrations.

GEN. CHARLES GORDON, it is now generally believed, has been shot to death at Khartoum by the followers of the False Prophet. Gordon had a long military career. He participated in the war of the Crimea, led the "Ever Victorious Army" against the rebels in China, and went to Egypt to suppress the slave trade. Various estimates are made of his character, but his conduct everywhere indicates that he was a religious fanatic, irascible, domineering, and inordinately ambitious. He was superstitious to the extent of believing that he carried a charmed life, and that he had a mission to spread the gospel. He is undoubtedly a victim to the neglect of the English government, which failed to relieve him at Khartoum in time to prevent his assassination. The church will probably canonize him.

Selected.

Liberalism—Its Mission.*

One of the hindrances to Liberal progress is that Liberals hav such a horror of being thieves that they are not good borrowers or even imitators. They hav not learned to adopt and adapt. The motto "Fas est ab hoste doceri"—"It is the proper thing to be taught by the enemy"—did much to build up the Roman republic and empire. Roman senators boasted how that they had borrowed the arrow from one tribe they had incorporated, the shield from another, and some other weapon, custom, or even god, from another. Thus, aided by all, they in time subdued all. So, too, the Christian church empire, which was, and is, only the Roman empire sublimated and spiritualized, borrowed its doctrins and ceremonies so completely, from the Cross to the Trinity, that nothing in them is really new to the historic eye. The old symbols still speak, the old lights still burn. The old statue of Jupiter is still kissed—but now as the statue of St. Peter before his cathedral. Now that the religion, or integration, of Christianity is broadening out into the higher integration of the whole race and of the whole world, this new integration of Man must learn to use and incorporate, to adopt and adapt, as far as it can, the materials which the past civilizations and religions hav worked out, to the hands of its builders. Everything we can use must be regarded as our property.

The tendency of Liberals to cut themselvs off from the past is a metaphysical and a mistaken policy in many respects. As well might you try to make a tree grow without roots as to expect architects of the future to build the Temple of Humanity out of materials of their own artificial creation, instead of those which time, nature, and evolution hav provided. Yet Liberalism is in one sense a righteous rebellion of the present against the past—that is, against its authority and its limitations, which would, if observed, restrict growth and progress. Standing firmly and historically upon the past, and always thankful to it as to a parent for its love, its lessons, and its materials, Liberals, to be level with their era, should always aim higher, and liv in a world truer, higher, and broader than any past could hav known.

In order to do this, nothing is more needful than to hav a keen historical sense of the great events and phases of Liberal thought, and even of the great men who hav made Liberalism a fact in the world's history; for their children we really are.

In an address introducing Mr. Charles Watts as the representativ of English Secularism to the Liberals of New York (see TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for E.M. 285) I had occasion to show that the Liberals had a true "apostolic succession" as venerable, "celestial," and even "divine" in its origin, as any theological apostolic succession could possibly be. I will not repeat that address, for I take it for granted that you hav all read or will read it.

The purpose of this hour is to show that this succession in the history and evolution of Liberalism itself distinctly indicates its future, and announces the newer mission it must enter upon, if it is true to its promis and its high calling in the evolution of mankind.

You will remember that Liberalism commenced in 1600 by the promulgation of the heliocentric astronomy by Copernicus, Bruno, Galileo, and Kepler; that, as a consequence, Freethinkers soon began to spring up in Europe, and especially in England; that as a sect the Freethinkers, or Liberals, that is, those who were freed (Liberati) from the authority of revealed religion, may date from the publication by Lord Herbert of Cherbury of his work on THE TRUTH (De Veritate). This publication, you will recall, was made in consequence of a direct audible answer to the prayer of its Deist author to Almighty God for permission to print it. This occurred while he was embassador of England at Paris, in 1726. This book had been submitted to several distinguished scholars of that time, and especially to Hugo Grotius, perhaps the greatest of them, who had given it their approval. However, to remove all doubt, the author, kneeling before an open window, by fervent prayer sought a direct voice of approval from Heaven, and received it. He was even able to distinguish the very part of the sky from whence the sound came. This you will be pleased, and perhaps surprised, to read in Lord Herbert's own words (in the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL referred to). It is sufficient to us that this must hav been the voice of his own conscience rendered objectivly audible to him as the voice of his God, and a truer voice of God there could not be.

But aside from this, the origin of Liberalism is in the highest degree celestial, for it was brought into existence by the confirmation of the new heavens by the telescope of Galileo. It was not necessary after that to set it before the enlightened people of the world as THE TRUTH under an audible indication of approval from the sky. The old religions, gods, saviors, and heroes are constantly boasted of as of celestial origin, but Giordano Bruno revealed the highest possible origin and sanction of Liberalism when he opened up to the people of Europe the new astronomy and the new heavens as a vista of "infinit space and infinit worlds."

Thus founded, Liberalism has been a distinct sect of thought for nearly three hundred years past. It has made those three hundred years the most important years in human history. Liberalism has been the yeast in modern history.

Its first period (from 1600 to 1789), was one of critical Deism seeking chiefly for truth and LIBERTY. This influence under Voltaire and his compeers led to the great American and French Revolutions, which were political earthquakes in the hope of Liberty.

Then, as a second period, from 1790 to 1848, with and following these Liberty movements, came an immense progress of the natural sciences, in which Astronomy and Physics opened the way to Chemistry, Biology, and finally to Sociology. This was the second great period, the period of the special sciences.

And now, thirdly, with the latter half of this century, we clearly perceive that Liberalism is being compelled, and will more and more be compelled, to take charge of the secular, political, social, and religious affairs of this world, and to manage them as a whole, internationally, and as a piece of terrestrial statesmanship, in the interest of the whole family of Man, present and future. Liberalism by its own history and evolution will be compelled to do this and to become constructiv more and more in the interest of Humanity.

As we hav shown, its successiv periods are represented by the three words, Liberty, Science, and Humanity. Indisputably these, in necessary succession, hav been the three great steps of the evolution of Liberalism since 1600. These three words contain the results and the gospel which the history of Freethought has wrought out. These words take the place of the old trio, Faith, Hope, and Charity under the old Faith, and fulfil them. For we hav Liberty because the Truth has set us free by giving us faith in the laws of the world; but these laws are the lines and ways of the least resistance, that is, of the purest Liberty. Then we hav Hope, for Science has revealed to us the ascent and progress of man and his infinit capabilities when he knows enough to supplement and fulfil the laws of nature by his will. Then, too, we hav Charity in the highest sense, for Sociology has proved that we are brethren all, now and forevermore under the true Holy Ghost of mutual human interdependence and love.

In a word, the newer mission of Liberalism, as Secularism and Positivism—for by these names it is called in its later constructiv efforts—is to realize these words, Liberty, Science, and Humanity; that, is to Liberate, Educate, Consecrate. These three words history proves to be the measure of our progress. Let us weigh them well.

To liberate is to realize Liberty: the most difficult of things to do—an impossible thing, without destruction, to those who are not prepared for it by some insight into Science and some disciplin of Humanity.

Yet our Liberal forefathers of the first period—that is, up to the close of the French Revolution—thought that nothing was easier than to liberate. To them the way to get Liberty was simply to take it—it would keep and realize itself!

But the lesson of the History of Liberalism is unmistakable: Only those can attain to and preserve Liberty who are able to be a saving law unto themselvs, and none will heed this law but those who hav a scientific appreciation of law under the altruistic impulse and consecration of Humanity, that is, society, as it touches us, in the family, as neighbors, as citizens of our country or of the world.

The great political Liberty movements and revolutions in England, America, and France, and in the rest of Europe, met with a check and a reaction in or about 1800, because the people, even the Liberal people, were insufficiently educated in Science, and insufficiently consecrated in Humanity.

The traitor Burke led the reaction in England, and was met by the "Rights of Man" of our glorious Paine. In America the Federalists regained the lead in society and in the State under Hamilton. In France the reaction of the 18th of Fructidor led to Napoleon's 18th of Brumaire, and soon came the concordat with the pope, closing the Revolution in Europe. Those who wish to see how thoroughly this was done should read the article on Napoleon I., in the new Encyclopedia Britannica. Throughout the civilized world the sword, the crosier, and the policeman's club became again the actual governor.

Thomas Paine, the Knight-Errant of Liberty in two hemispheres, was obliged to retire from the conflict and spend his last days at our New Rochelle, in a bitter fight with his Tory-Federalist neighbors for the right to vote in the United States which he had first declared ought to be free and independent.

But this reaction had the effect to throw the thinking, activ powers of man back upon Nature, Science, and History with greater zeal than ever, and thus the second, that is, the scientific, period of Liberalism received its great impulse and development.

The effect was to vastly deepen and enlarge the views of the critical, deistical, revolutionary Liberals of the last century. The conception of the world as infinit then popularized and enlarged the conception of God into that of Pantheism or Agnosticism.

The relations of man were then known to be extended so as to be synonymous with the whole human race, and Sociology, with its idea of progress of mankind, crowned the sciences.

Such were the grand results of the cultivation of the Special Sciences which gave the triumphs of Sir Humphrey Davy in chemistry, of Bichat, Jussieu, and St. Hiliare in biology, and of Humboldt in general science, and finally of Comte in sociology. As yet the special sciences were cultivated for their utilities, and not generally, until Comte, as a Philosophy. The main theory of the world that lay back of the great specialists and scientists of the first part of the present century was of the old Theology shaded down by fanciful metaphysics.

The myth of "Nature," as though nature were a goddess of the old Mythology, played the principal role to veil the crude Theology of Scientists; and even yet Nature does good service upon the stage to-day for special Scientists, for without her aid they would hardly be able to hold their partial and disconnected investigations together. While all this Scientific progress was arousing and occupying the attention of the educated world, the King, the Pope, and the Aristocracy held the practical control of human affairs with a firm grip. But among all classes, and especially the Literary and working classes, humanitarian sentiments and theories followed the lines of Scientific thought. This Humanism had been opened up by Rousseau, and thence came the sentimental speculation of Owen, Fourier, of St. Simon and Proudhon, Lamartine and Rollin, and the Revolution of 1848. That movement, resting upon immense acquisitions of Science and of human sentiments, sought again to found the Federal Democratic Republic on the ruins of the thrones in Europe.

In a few years the war-clouds lifted, and again a reaction followed, similar, in most respects, to that after the great Revolution of 1789, and for similar reasons: the people were not sufficiently educated in Science nor inspired by the enthusiasm or Humanity to hold together. Their liberty was only the liberty to fall asunder. The direction of affairs again relapsed to the Emperor, King, and Pope.

And now the third period of incubation, preparation, and transition, of which all thinking people are a part, adds intense interest as a close of the long novel or drama. Hence we liv in a time when existence itself is sublime. The heirship of the ages has brought to us priceless and inexhaustible treasures and opportunities. Among them is this law of human, historical, and social progress under evolution, which law, if understood, in time will make progress by revolutions hereafter unnecessary and impossible. "Evolution instead of Revolution" has become the Liberal watchword of to-day; and this same law, as the history of Liberalism teaches us, can be achieved only by realizing individually and collectivly the three words: Liberty, as the field and condition; Science, as the order and base; and Humanity, as the motiv and end of life on earth.

History teaches that every individual Liberal must pass through these three stages, or degrees, as we may call them, in Liberalism. Without all of them he cannot be of any reliance as a factor in human progress. He must be Liberated, Educated, and Consecrated, or he will be but a partially equipped soldier in the army of progress. Until the advanced peoples of the world hav a sufficient number of such individuals to influence and control public sentiment and public affairs, all hope of rapid reform or changes for the better will be in vain.

The main object of the Liberal and Secular movement should be to initiate by reasonable propaganda as many as possible into these three degrees of Liberalism.

The history of Liberalism admonishes us that not one of these three degrees can be omitted in Liberal culture. Liberalism has failed, as we hav seen from its history, for the want of each of these degrees in succession. That has been the continuous lesson of her revolutions, checks, and reactions. Now observe that the same lessons apply to the lives of each of us all as individuals: First, The indispensable condition of all Liberalism, Education, of all Morality and Progress, is Liberty. The motto and badge of your society, Universal Mental Liberty, indicates that you hav seriously taken this first degree. To hav taken it is the first, the grand step. You hav in so doing laid aside the authority of traditions. All aspirations are set free. You start forth, like Curran's freedman, redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled by the genius of universal emancipation. Second, But this genius of universal emancipation is what? Nothing else but Law, which in all Nature is found to be the usual, because the easy and happy, line of least resistance. The reign of Liberty thus leads to the reign of Law, as the foundation and base. But the knowledge of the Laws af the world is Science. The special sciences are, therefore, special departments of the reign of Law, and these, co-ordinated into a whole, make science a Positiv Synthetic Philosophy, which is the creed of the future. This Philosophy is the second degree of Liberalism, and corresponds to the second great historic period, Liberal progress. As we hav shown, it was Liberty which led to the enormous development of Science during the past one hundred years. And yet Liberty and Science failed historically, and left Theology and Metaphysics as masters of human affairs. Will a similar failure be generally the case with individuals who may take these first two degrees of Liberalism without HUMANITY as the third? History and our observation of the facts answer, Yes! For Liberty, indispensable as the first step and condition, is hopeless as a means or an end in itself. Those who only take this first degree in Liberalism may astonish us as comets or meteors by the audacity of their expressions and career. They may lead revolutions, but their corruscations soon disappear. The apostles of Liberty, pure and simple, hav generally left us brilliant and revolutionary, but sadly suggestiv, careers, over which we linger with tears as at the close of a tragedy. Third, Now, again, can those who hav taken the second degree and devoted their lives to the Special Sciences only, be able to direct public affairs, or their own lives, upon any Scientific basis? They hav generally been, and even now generally are, but Theologians and Metaphysicians studying and amusing themselvs with the curiosities or utilities of Science as grown-up children might do, always reserving their Santa Claus. For at bottom they are not emancipated from some God or myth of Intelligence or Nature, through whom, in the end, they are pretty sure to make their peace with the old Theology. They are very ready to show, as many now are trying to do, that evolution is but a mode of God's creation. They are careful to the end to curry favor with the orthodox respectabilities, even by the sacrifice of their Liberal friends and pupils, and their reward may be—an orthodox heaven. You will notice that these Special Scientists seldom achieve or express any comprehension of Science as a whole, that is, as a creed or a philosophy of life. They are often the sly, if not the avowed, detractors, if not enemies, of those who do. Yet these Special Sciences are the great planets out of which Science as a philosophy weaves the system which underlies and sustains all there is to us of a knowable world.

But where is the SUN around which all of the comets of Liberty and all of the planets of Science revolve and depend, and to which in the end they are to minister? That common center is the conception of MAN in continuity—that is, in time, by the generations and ages; and then in solidarity—that is, in space, by the nations and peoples living on the earth, at any one time. This view of Humanity at large is so vast that we rise to it only by degrees. We are influenced more readily by the subdivisions of this grand MAN, which lie nearer to us, as, for instance, our country, our state or city, our neighborhood and our family. Now, to take the third, last, and full degree of Liberalism, is to rise to and to realize this conception more and more.

We meet with Liberals of every degree of progress through these three degrees. Some are iconoclasts and advocates of liberty only, keeping their heavy emphasis on that. Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child, is their motto and life-object. Then we find others putting forth a mild claim that Education should be based upon Science, which is simply so much information for public utility. Then we find others who insist that the family is the center and also the unit and total of all human aggregation and government, and that all control and education should begin and end there. They seem to forget that modern society is founded on the individual, and that now a higher integration, that of the state, is here.

These three first stages of Liberalism often go together, and are found in one and the same person. Now these stages are all excellent as the first steps in each of the three degrees, but no Liberal should stop with them. The Liberty must go on till it is realized in Law. The Science must go on till it becomes a Philosophy and creed of Life. The Humanity must be developed until, starting from the family, it reaches out to the succession of generations and the Brotherhood of Nations, at the same time that it realizes and inspires the individual.

To get well grounded in this third or Humanity degree, is a matter of growth of heart and head to be carefully cultivated. To get that degree is to get admitted to the grand Brotherhood of all ages and peoples—to find the motiv and mainspring of life—to become the heir of the great and good of all time—to drink of the spring of human love, which givs the crowning satisfaction of life, greater than happiness, called by the old religions in one word, BLESSEDNESS.

People who are taking the first steps in the three degrees of Liberalism are apt to be caught by the vulgar notion that happiness is our being's end and aim. When they get well along in the three degrees they find that the chief end of life is not enjoyment by the satisfaction of our egoistic appetites and impulses, but the satisfaction of our altruistic positions, sentiments, motivs, and longings, by work, devotion and sacrifice, summed up in the word DUTY. Comte but echoed the experience of the greater souls of our race when he proclaimed that the satisfaction and blessedness of devotion were the greatest that human nature could know. The object of life is not that the individual should hav a "good time" by individual enjoyment. Happiness, or the "multiplication of agreeable consciousnesses," as Dr. Johnson admirably defines it, makes all the world a tender, merely, to the individual, in order to minister to his enjoyment. Blessedness is the giving away, one's self away, so as to deserve and feel the gift of an infinit love in return. This feeling of being infinitly beloved exceeds any sensual or personal joy of egoism, however exquisit or prolonged. Our greatest happiness is in pleasing another or others. Would that some of our Liberal story-tellers, for instance Miss Susan Wixon, would tell of the link of a chain, the wheel of an engin, the bee of a hive, the beaver of a colony, the man of a tribe, that had been so short-sighted as to suppose that its own existence and happiness was the end of its being, and that all things or creatures connected with it were made but to subserve its pleasure; then suppose this link, wheel, bee, beaver, or man, should suddenly awake out of its individual sleep, and find that but for the chain, the engine, the hive, the colony, and the tribe, its existence would not hav been possible; that its happiness, and even life, was entirely dependent upon its performance of its social duty; and that it had its share in the use and glory of the whole of which it was inevitably a part and heir. Would it not then stop prating about its happiness, and seek only to get its work done? Would it not find its own happiness in the hum, with which the whole, of which it was a part, said, "Well done, good and faithful servant?"

The illustrations from engins or from bees are trivial in comparison with the interdependence which exists in the grand human family, by far the grandest organization ever known, and, as far as we know, the greatest organic Being in existence. In the progress of evolution throughout the ages, it has acquired a capital, material, financial, intellectual, moral, and esthetic, which constitutes the wealth and glory of Man. The share which we know enough to inherit and appreciate in that collectiv life, is that which lifts us from being merely animals into the possibility of being men and women worthy of the position in which evolution has placed us.

Such is the new altruistic life to which the Liberal arises when he shakes off the individual or egoistic measure of things, and rises to the third degree, the conception of each for all, and of all for each, with its ideas of duty, devotion, work, and blessedness in the performance of them. Then only is true happiness possible.

The point of all philosophies is to get the greatest happiness, or satisfaction, out of life. That is a truism in which Epicurians, Stoics, Ascetics, and Religionists of all kinds agree. Can it be achieved by looking to the egoistic desires and pleasures alone, with the individual as the center of the world? No, this was and is the error of the Epicurians, and of worldly people generally. Can it be achieved by looking at the altruistic sentiments alone? No, this was the error of the Stoics, and Ascetics, and Reformers generally. These extremes are scientifically balanced and combined in the Liberal positiv humanitarian view, which teaches us to achieve the greatest individual health, strength, cheerfulness, and completeness, so as the better to perform any duty we can in the great organic life of Humanity, from whom we are, and in whom we move, and liv, and hav our being.

There is a tenderness and blessedness in crowning individual growth by social sympathy and worth which far exceeds any selfish individual pleasures. In the end you will find that it is not possible to "hav a good time" in this world, except in finding some useful work to do, and doing it as a religious duty. All other life is a nuisance to the individual and to others.

Why is the person who is running round to "save his soul" so contemptible in these days? Because he is putting the emphasis of life upon his happiness hereafter. Is the person who runs about seeking his greatest happiness by selfish enjoyment now any the less contemptible?

In this age of the world none can be truly saved who do not forget all about their own souls and their own happiness while they get their life duty done. The happiness will then come as the hum of the smoothly working machine, or of the happy hive of bees, in which each member has no happiness but only the blessedness of serving its queen, who is the center, sun, and life of the hive. As soon as she is gone, then each bee goes for himself or herself, and there is a free fight, until robbers or winter unprovided for closes the sad scene with death.

Now, without this central conception of Humanity, the modern world is becoming, under its socialistic, nihilistic, pessimistic chaos, much like a queenless hive, and many Liberals are helping on the process of disintegration of the old, without putting forth the social and moral integration of the new view of the world and of Man. They hav not taken the third degree in Liberalism, and until they do, they can do little more than destroy.

The chaos of a queenless hive is what modern civilization is rapidly becoming under the impulse of those who hav only partly taken the first two degrees in Liberalism.

The old Systems of Religion held the people together by fear, authority, and bribery; but they were held together, and their unity was and will be the strength that will possess and control the earth, unless Liberals, too, can find their central Sun and ideal Christ of Humanity, which will attract with love and duty more powerfully than the gods and demons of old by fear and bribery.

What Catholicism and Calvinism hav done under the old impulse of Theology, the enthusiasm of duty and Humanity must do with the newer Sects of Liberalism, or the old faith will prevail and inherit this earth and its control. In that case the Pope will, in time, be supreme, the center of all nations, as he was of the "States of the Church." Let no one suppose that the mere do-nothing and care-nothing of individual happiness-seekers will ever inherit the earth. They are the merest mush. Popery has been checked only temporarily by Protestantism, and can in the end only be checked and conquered by organized, liberated, educated Liberals, consecrated by the idea of duty under the higher integration and enthusiasm of Humanity. Such is the lesson of history. Let none be deceived. Zeal and disciplin only will conquer. Let us rejoice, therefore, that the Positivism of France and the Secularism of England hav begun the work of Liberating, Educating, and, let us hope, too, of consecrating, in our favored land of hope and Liberty. Let us not shrink if they boldly take hold of the old religious symbols and names, and apply them to their newer uses and mission. For instance, our friend Mr. Putnam has, from this platform today, given us an admirable discourse on the New American Church and its gospel of Humanity. Let us deepen the Secularism of England by the inspiration of Comte, and replace his papal scheme by the ideal of the grand Federate Republic of Mankind. Let us liv in this grander future till its sunlight shall shine down upon the humblest duty we can perform, and make it, and all our life, and all its relations infinitly sacred. Under that consecration may we feel the ocean of love that has brought our race upward hitherto, meet in our own hearts with the ocean of love which shall bear it on to untold future glories!

Thus to liv in the past and in the future, is to insure the greatest present happiness as it melts into blessedness. So to liv is the higher life ever renewing its satisfaction in living.

For having reaped and garnered, bring the plow,
And plant the great Hereafter in the Now.

Autograph Album Verses.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The following verses were written for my autograph album by Colonel Ingersoll; L. Stargardter, a Jew; and the last by A. J. Hauck. Mr. Stargardter is a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and Mr. Hauck was a firm friend of the same. All these verses are original. WM. J. BURNS.

Whoever sins to gain his ends
Forgets this truth profound:
On every cent the devil lends
The interest is compound.

R. G. INGERSOLL.

Though our words may differ—opinions conflict
Let us ever be cordial, friendly, and true,
So that he be honest what matters it
If a man is a Freethinker, Christian, or Jew?

L. STARGARDTER.

The parson may preach, and layman may teach
The love of a God to mankind,
'Tis grasping for pelf, and each for himself,
That's uppermost in every mind.
When the "gods" are all dead, and the witches hav fled
Along with the parson and priest,
'Tis then, my dear boy, we all can enjoy
The glorious millennium feast. A. J. HAUCK.

The Year of Science.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In answer to "Democrat," who wishes to see the reasons for the adoption of the new calendar, I desire to state that the following resolution is an amended copy of the original one, with which I introduced this much-needed reform in Freethinkers' mode of dating. It was done just three years ago to-day, at our Paine Hall celebration of Thomas Paine's birthday, and the article reads as follows:

Resolved; That in everlasting commemoration of that rise of science and Freethought, the two best friends humanity has ever had, which began during the sixteenth century of the superstitious "year of our Lord," and in perpetual honor, also, of the heroism of that glorious teacher of reason and noble martyr for science and man, Giordano Bruno, of Italy, so inhumanly burnt at the stake by the Christians, at Rome, on the 16th day of February, 1600, for proclaiming scientific facts—Therefore, in future, all records and other official documents of the Investigator Freethought Society, of Boston, Mass., shall bear date from a calendar, beginning on the 1st day of January, A.D. 1600; thereby placing our Society, and all persons adopting it, entirely out of the bedeviling fog of the age of Bible faith with its "Year of Grace 1882," and into the humane light of the "Age of Reason" and YEAR OF SCIENCE 282.

The Liberal Club.

Last Friday evening, the occasion of the 366th regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club, was what might be called an off night for that organization. Snow was falling, or trying to fall, but the wind seemed to thwart its endeavors, and whisked it back up into the air again. There was a meeting of woman suffragists at Steinway Hall, in which all Liberals took a proper interest, and many of them went there. Consequently the number of persons who found their way to the Liberal Club hall was smaller by half than usual. The lecture of the evening was by Dr. Olive Herrick on the "Obstacles to a Higher Civilization." This consisted of a paper read rapidly, and without especial emphasis, the fundamental thesis of which was missed by this writer. So far as understood, the obstacles to a higher civilization arose from the fact that an obdurate public failed to contemplate the human organization as a galvanic battery, and persisted in educating the young in separate school rooms, according to sex, and supplemented this unnatural division with a board fence which divided the grounds wherein they took their youthful recreation.

At the close of the lecture the chairman invited the members of the club to discuss it. There was no response. Then the chair urged, exhorted, and pleaded for some one to come forward; he even became, at times, sarcastic, but to no effect. Dr. Lambert was mentioned by name. He shook his head. A motion was carried by default admitting all comers to the debate. There were no comers. Even the Rev. Professor Vaughan desired time to collect his thoughts. Finally Dr. Weeks took the platform, announcing that he had nothing in particular to say. He made, nevertheless, a fairly connected and interesting speech.

The Rev. Professor Vaughan, who had come there, he said, at considerable personal inconvenience as a sort of moral and oratorical backer of the lecturer, took the floor, casually observing that he hadn't felt in so good trim before since the night he laid out Mr. Watts. This induced the first smile of the evening. The audience shifted into easier positions and broke a silence that up to that time had been dismally oppressiv. The only distinguished person with whom the speaker had argued since his last appearance at the club seemed to hav been Monsignor Capel, who was pronounced not a fool by any means. Capel's estimate of Vaughan was not given. Then the Free-love question was opened up and reigned supreme thenceforward. Vaughan's ideas are such as find expression in print chiefly through the Word. There was no thing offensiv, however, in his way of putting them.

Dr. Eccles, though he came in late and did not hear the lecture, inquired what the gist of it had been, and then proceeded to criticise it. He objected to the promiscuous and habitual mingling of the sexes from youth upward, because familiarity bred contempt and the marriage union lost its novelty and charm.

Mrs. Leonard, following, went into particulars pretty extensivly, her earnestness causing her to lose sight in a great degree of those little proprieties of expression whose observance is usually considered desirable in public speaking.

Mr. Huhn acknowledged that the lecture was too highly philosophical for him to handle. He couldn't touch it. But as Dr. Eccles had criticised the lecture without hearing it, and as it sometimes occurred that the less a speaker knew about a subject the better prepared he was to discuss it, Mr. Huhn believed he was in order. He then gave some statistics showing the prevalence of immorality in this city, and advocated, among other things, the abolition of the marriage ceremony, as performed by priests. Mr. Huhn's speech was sensible to a marked extent, but failed to overcome the general repugnance to the turn which the discussion had taken.

A number of people had by this time gone home. Mrs. Hall contributed something to the matter under debate; Madam Delescluze had listened with signs of rising indignation and went forward to speak, but did not get an opportunity to do so; Mr. Collier made some personal observations about Dr. Eccles, and Vaughan did the closing act. A prominent member remarked, and a number of others assented to the proposition, that a few meetings like this would kill the club outright.

Next week it is hoped this admirable organization will extricate itself from the slough and stand on safe ground again. Dr. Mayo, the organizer and president of the Newark Liberal League, will lecture, and there is every reason to believe that the meeting will be one of extreme interest.

MR. REYNOLDS.

In the past we hav so lacked vigor, persistent energy, and courage that we hav developed a fearful excess of mollusks (backboneless, jelly-like creatures—snails).

Men and women convinced of and avowing the grand truths and pure and ennobling principles of Secularism hav sunk into passiv indifference. A funeral pall seems to hav fallen on them, and, alas! they are willing to remain thus smothered, since while so covered, nothing can be expected of them.

Too long hav Liberals permitted the domineering power of the church to hold them in abject fear; too long submitted to denunciation, abuse, calumny, and ostracism.

If all who are really in harmony with the principles, aims, and objects of Secularism would enroll themselvs members of the League, we should far outnumber any orthodox denomination.

We need to carry on the work of propagandism with persistency and courage. The work must not be commenced in the winter and permitted to die out in summer, but continued the year round. For summer work the tent is the only dependence. No other means devised can so popularize Secularism, so effectivly make the people know our aims and objects, and the principles which actuate us. No other means will so quickly develop backbone in the mollusks. When they see every afternoon and evening immense crowds flocking to the tent, they will so rapidly gain vertebræ that they will declare they were always heart and soul in the good work.

The tent will insure judicious circulation of immense quantities of the best Liberal literature, increase desire for scientific education, and develop sociability.

Who will aid in the good work? Are there not five men or women who will contribute $100 each for so noble a purpose, and thus immortalize their names as the first promoters of the grandest method ever devised for the advancement of reason, right, and truth; for insuring equal rights and liberty for all, regardless of religious faith, or the lack of it, by securing the secularization of our government?

If the wealthy lack vertebræ, or for any cause miss this opportunity, are there not ten good and true Liberals who are able and willing, even at some little self-sacrifice, to giv $50 each? Are there not hundreds able, ready, and willing to giv from $25 to $5? Five hundred dollars is all we need. But it is needed at once. That sum will purchase the tent and all else needed. Beyond that amount the tent will prove self-sustaining. Remember, once the tent is paid for, it will last for years without any further cost. Send contributions instantly. Don't wait for a more convenient opportunity. Send now, either draft, post-office order, or registered letter to Courtlandt Palmer, 850 Broadway, New York.

Secularism is doing as well as doubting. Let us do justice to our friends and neighbors. In mercy help them out of the cruel bondage of superstition and priestcraft, and promote their welfare and happiness by diffusing the light of truth.

Now is the accepted time. Mr. Palmer will accept contributions now, and if the tent is ordered at once, there will be no delay in May. Now is the day of salvation. Save the mail, send at once, and we can save twenty per cent on the cost of the tent, and save us from anxiety and having to make any further appeals.

Obituary.

The Weekly Guide, of Port Hope, Ont., brings the news of the death of our old friend, William Sisson. He died on Tuesday, February 3d, of apoplexy, in the eighty-fourth year of his age. Mr. Sisson was one of the stanchest Freethinkers in Canada, always ready to aid good enterprises, and outspoken in his support of Freethought. As will be seen from the subjoined extract from the Guide, he was a New Yorker by birth:

"Another old settler has passed over to the majority. Mr. William Sisson was born on the 3d November, 1801, at Rinebeck, Duchess county, New York, and came to Canada in 1825, sixty years ago, locating in Port Hope, and for a number of years did business in the manufacture of leather in the vicinity of this place, and by his enterprise and skill amassed considerable wealth. He held the position of captain of a company of cavalry in the local militia for some years and did service in the march to Toronto in December, 1837. He held positions in the councils of the town as well, but having retired from activ business pursuits some years ago, he preferred to enjoy an easy leisure in the affairs of life. He was a Liberal in politics and an independent in matters of conscience and religious belief, in which he was very pronounced in his views. Mr. Sisson was one of the old landmarks, so to speak, of Port Hope, and will be missed as such. One after another they are passing away; of the old settlers there are but few now left who were associated with the early history, rise, and progress of Port Hope. He passed away without any apparent suffering, having arisen and performed his ablutions as usual last Tuesday, and at once fell over and in a few moments breathed his last. Cause of death the attendant physician says was apoplexy."

Canadian Notes.

C. B. Reynolds lectured last Sunday evening in Albert Hall on "Salvation." He described the Christian doctrin on this point, and said that Secularists cannot accept any such arrant nonsense, but urge upon all men to work out their own salvation, here and now, by leading good and useful lives, and using their utmost endeavor for the benefit of their fellow-man physically, morally, and intellectually. Secularism teaches that there is no other salvation but this. At the close of the meeting the following resolutions were carried by acclamation:

Resolved, That the editorial article that appeared in the Mail, Monday, Feb. 2d last, entitled "Infidelity Rampant," merits the severe condemnation of this society. Secularists rejoice to hav the demands of Secularism given publicity, and had the editor of the Mail confined himself to criticism of those demands he would hav been entitled to our thanks. Justice is the first great principle of Secularism—justice tempered with mercy; hence when charges of bribery and corruption were made against the editor of the Mail, the members of this society refrained from expressions of condemnation, hoping there might be extenuating circumstances, and even when on the evidence of so large a number of witnesses, the judges declared him guilty on every charge, we were filled with sorrow at his wrong-doing and hoped for his reformation.

Resolved, That it should be a part of the business of all editors of every great paper like the Mail to become thoroughly familiar with the standard scientific works of the age, hence they must hav a knowledge of the writings of Spencer, Darwin, Tyndall, Huxley, Draper, et al. The aspirations and teachings of these men are pure and lofty, and unless the editor of the Mail can prove that they are in the leastwise tainted with immorality, his reckless—if not worse—charge that Secularists are seeking to destroy morality cannot be believed.

Recently Charles Watts lectured in Albert Hall, in the afternoon and evening, on the subjects, "Was the Resurrection of Christ a Fact?" and "Sacred Things—Wherein do they Differ from Secular?" A sacred thing is a mother's love—the household affections in their entirety; the love of brothers and sisters, parents and children, father and mother, son and daughter; more sacred still, the love of our own kind in every clime, class, and circumstance; devotion to the well-being of humanity throughout the wide world. The great masterpieces of literature are enshrined in the heart of hearts of their admirers—the poems in stone by architectural genius awaken fervent devotion; sacred is the feeling aroused by the canvas of the painter, glowing with life, youth, and beauty, and what a swelling tide of deepest, holiest emotion swells up within us at the sound of some old familiar strain of music:

"The smiles and tears of childhood's years,
The words of love then spoken,
The eye that shone, now dimmed and gone,
The cheerful hearts, now broken."

Secular sacred things are realities; theological sacred things are ignes-fatui—a will-o'-the-wisp of the imagination.

The following is from the Canadian Independent for January, 1885. Speaking of Alton, it says:

"We know of no other place in Canada where there is greater need of earnest labor. Infidelity is rampant. The only Infidel hall I hav seen or heard of in Canada is here. In the most open and persistent manner Christianity is opposed. Balls and public amusements are carried on upon the Lord's day. Blaspheming Infidels from Toronto visit here, and under the patronage of a few families of means and influence find a congenial atmosphere in which to undermine the faith of the young, and to sow the poison of unbelief. Something should be done, and done at once."

The "something" wanted is that the clergy come forth from skulking in their hiding-places, and defend their superstitious mumbo-jumbo called Christianity in the light of open facts and realities. But they know too well that to meet Charles Watts or any other Secularist on the platform in debate is to meet certain defeat. It would simply demonstrate their so-called word of God and its accompanying religion to be merely vain imaginings, a mass of rubbish, rotten garbage, and tomfooleries.

The Toronto Secular Society made great preparations for celebrating the birthday of Thomas Paine. They got up a concert, supper, and ball for that occasion. Perhaps no leader of Freethought is so dear to the hearts of Secularists as Thomas Paine; and justly so, for he was a hero and a martyr to the cause of suffering humanity, oppressed by the horrid nightmare of priestcraft, and the abominable superstitions of Christianity. Well did the harpies of this barbarous faith know that Thomas Paine was their deadly foe, and with calumnies, scandals, and lies, in the form of pious frauds, they vilified his name. Vain malice! The more lies the poisonous breath of Christianity vented on the name of Paine, the dearer he became to lovers of truth, justice, and manliness.

"And as a child, when scaring sounds molest,
Clings closer and closer to the mother's breast,
So the loud torrents and the whirlwinds roar,
But bind him to his nativ mountains more."

THE labor reformers, through John Swinton's Paper, ought to "let up" on Courtlandt Palmer, the League treasurer. He does more good with what money he can command for the purpose than two-thirds of the howlers with their mites. But he does it unostentatiously, and according to the dictates of his own strong common sense. The scriptures won't move him, and he doesn't consider it at all necessary to marry a negro to prove his abolitionism.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Our New President.

The intimation in last week's TRUTH SEEKER that Col. Ingersoll had decided to accept the office of president of the National Liberal League was, no doubt, gladly welcomed by all those who earnestly wish for the success of Secularism in the United States and Canada. The colonel has not arrived at this decision hastily; but after long and matured thought he has become the head of what is rapidly approaching to be one of the largest and most important Freethought movements ever known in the world. Our new president will shortly publish a statement of his views as to the best policy to be pursued in our work of propagandism. He is prevented from doing so just at present in consequence of having to lecture every night throughout the States.

Three weeks ago it was my pleasure to meet the colonel by appointment at Buffalo, where we had a long conversation as to the position of Secularism in the States and Canada. We then considered the future prospects of our movement, and the program of its proceedings. The president was exceedingly pleased that it was contemplated to change the name of our organization to that of "The American Secular Union," and that the Canadian societies had been amalgamated with those of the States. These are improvements that will giv the public a much clearer idea of our aims, and at the same time further consolidate our forces.

Col. Ingersoll most heartily indorses the decision arrived at by the late Congress at Cassadaga, and also the intention of the whole board of directors to confine our program to an exposition and defense of the "Nine Demands," and the endeavors to remove from the public mind whatever is calculated to prevemt or retard their realization. There are, of course, many subjects of a political and social character dear to us all which do not come within the scope of these "Nine Demands." All such subjects must be left for members to form their own individual opinions upon and to advocate in their own way apart from the official indorsement of the League or Union. This association is formed for the purpose of securing the secular rights of mankind and strengthening the force of mental freedom. To this end we aim to equalize national taxation; to insist that those who think they require religious instruction shall be alone responsible for the expense of its teaching; to abolish all government patronage of any and all religious forms; to do away with the farce of fast and thanksgiving days; to substitute affirmation in our legal proceedings for the present absurb custom of swearing; to repeal all laws that interfere with the free, moral, and intellectual use of Sunday; to show that high-toned morality is not confined to the Christian or any other religious faith, but that it is allied with our general humanity; and, finally, to protest against any advantages being given to a professor of religion that is denied to an honest skeptic.

This, briefly, is the essence of the "Demands;" and beyond these, as members of the Association, we do not purpose to go. It has been alleged that such a limitation precludes our attacking theology and orthodox error, but it does nothing of the kind. On the contrary, to thoroughly carry out our program, destructiv work in the theological domain is really a necessity. Before the "Nine Demands" can be firmly established, and their philosophy accepted, old theological notions hav to be destroyed and traditional prejudices hav to be removed. The church has ever been, and is, the great obstacle to our Secular achievements. What has fostered the monstrous injustice of exemption from taxation? The church. What has forced upon the people a religious, rather than a Secular, education? The church. What has maintained fast days and legal swearing? The church. What has inculcated erroneous ideas as to the alleged sacredness of Sunday? What has depreciated the efficacy of Secular morality? and what has paraded the necessity for orthodox belief? Theological teachings. These are our persistent enemies, confronting us at every point. It is therefore our duty as much as possible to weaken their forces. Our legitimate work is both destructiv and constructiv. So long as men and women are held in cruel bondage by the superstition of the churches; so long as they are offered as victims on the altar of fear; so long as liberty is sacrificed at the shrine of orthodoxy, so long will the work of destruction be necessary. If theologians will seek to keep up a senseless and mind-destroying imposition, shall we not be rendering society a positiv service in exposing such a fraud and deception? We endeavor to inculcate correct views of truth, justice, freedom, and Secular ethics; but we also aim to destroy blind belief in falsehood, injustice, slavery, and an artificial morality, born of a crude and rude theology.

In this view of our official policy, Col. Ingersoll fully concurs. In his noble work, he blends the two methods without sacrificing the real genius of either. His motto is, "One world at a time;" and whatever interferes with making the best of the world, which in part we know, he seeks to remove from life's path. Personally, I am proud to hav the privilege of working side by side with such a leader. After twenty-five years' experience in the Secular ranks, I frankly avow that, in my opinion, there is no man so well suited in every respect for the presidency as Col. Ingersoll. In him man has a true friend, the church a deadly foe. Under the force of his brilliant eloquence, his keen wit, and his withering rhetoric, priestcraft and theological shams experience no mercy. His greatness and excellence are not, however, confined to one phase of character, but they permeate the whole range of his life. Let the truth be frankly written: in him is concentrated that which makes man noble and renders character sublime. He has the wisdom of the philosopher, allied with the simplicity of the child and the intellect of the giant, molded with the sweet tenderness of woman. No one is less aware of the extent of his energy and power than the colonel himself. But those who know him were confident that on the day he became president of our association success was at our command—that is, if we all do our duty in aiding those who are laying the ax of Reason at the withered tree of orthodoxy, that has so long obstructed the growth of moral and intellectual freedom.

News and Notes from the Field.

Pittsburgh is an attractiv city indeed, smoky and dirty, I grant, but handsome still. She is the dusky bride of Industry, but she has eyes of fire, and her floating, flowing locks are gorgeous indeed, when now and then the sunlight falls upon their massiv folds. There is no more fascinating sight in the world than to go flying along her mighty rivers, and see her numberless wreaths and mountainous shapes of smoke mingling in infinit variety, some dark as hell, and some shining like the very gates of heaven. For miles the iron mills stretch away, a city by themselvs, where it seems as if giants were working night and day, not to destroy man, but to make him happier. These grim and swarthy laborers are better angels of humanity than all the golden choir that ever sang on mythical harps.

This is a good place for a Liberal League, and there is one here full of life and energy, and doing a great work. The churches dread its power. It has meetings every Sunday with speakers of ability. It has a live monthly paper of its own, which has a large local circulation. It has a Paine celebration every year. Its last was a most brilliant affair, the star of which was our gifted lady vice-president, Mrs. Mattie Krekel, of Kansas City.

Well, there is no wonder that here is a banner League, when there is such good material in it as the energetic Staley, the clear-headed and philosophic Hoover, the sagacious DeJones, the Juergenses, Frank Bacon, and others who are full of the spirit of progress, and are bound to see things go ahead in spite of every difficulty. They assure success by their tremendous enthusiasm. They do their work also with excellent ability, and their methods are the result of sound judgment. So, of course, we had a splendid time among this goodly company of Freethinkers, where there were so many elements to giv hope and courage. On Sunday morning, Feb. 8th, I gave my lecture on "The New Heaven and Earth," which was well received by a large audience. In the afternoon the hall was packed to overflowing. There was not even standing-room, and hundreds had to go away. Mr. Watts gave his lecture on "Agnosticism and Theism—Which Is the More Reasonable?" It was received with repeated applause, and its close reasoning was followed with lively interest, and every point was keenly appreciated, while mingled wit and humor wreathed with flowers the severity of the speaker's logic, but made it none the less penetrating. At the close, discussion was invited. None seemed disposed to come forward, except one or two, who made no material criticism upon the substance of the lecture. At last a bright young lady arose, and now came the tug of war, for she was in dead earnest, and meant to convert Mr. Watts then and there, for she was thoroughly devoted to the "Bible God," and thought him a being of infinit loveliness, not at all to blame for any of the wrongs and sufferings that exist. Of course her speech was only an overflowing of intense feeling. Mr. Watts, from the record itself, kindly pointed out the imperfections of the Bible God, and what, if the Bible be true, he had really done of evil and cruelty. He told her that the God she loved was purely a being of her own imagination, and he did not blame her for worshiping that ideal, only she should understand that it was an ideal, and not a real existence.

"I feel it to be true," said the lady.

"I do not deny that," said Watts. "I admit your feeling, but what is its source? Your own nature. You love a beautiful God, and therefore you make a beautiful God. It satisfies your heart, but that does not prove its truth. Use your judgment and reason, and see if the so-called Bible God harmonizes with the God you love."

The lady, of course, would hav the last word, but the gallantry of Mr. Watts was equal to his logic, and, when he had demolished the fabric of her imagination, he added:

"The beauty of the God you worship is the reflection of the beauty of your own nature. You alone embody this imaginary being to my mind, therefore as I cannot admire him as a reality, I must be content to admire you."

Of course no woman could withstand such a compliment as this, and, amid the tumultuous applause of the audience, she blushingly allowed Mr. Watts to wear the laurels of intellectual victory. The debate was listened to with intense interest. It was a contest of the head with the heart; a contest which can be carried on to-day with gentleness and smiles, but in the past has been waged with cruel suffering.

In the evening new ground was broken at Allegheny City. Mendel Hall was crowded, and Mr. Watts gave his lecture on "Christianity and Civilization."

On Monday evening still another lecture was given at Turner's Hall, on the south side. It was a stormy evening, but the lower hall was so crowded that we had to adjourn to the upper hall, and several hundred people listened to Mr. Watts on "Secularism."

Every meeting was a success, and, though our Pittsburgh friends hav just expended three hundred dollars for the Paine celebration, and hav had the State League Convention upon their shoulders, yet they turned into the Campaign Fund one hundred and twenty-six dollars, which was a generous contribution, and shows what deep interest exists in the national work.

The leading Pittsburgh papers gave full reports and favorable notices of the meetings. Mr. Watts was interviewed, and gave some exceedingly interesting views in regard to English politics, which will no doubt be republished from the Pittsburgh Leader in THE TRUTH SEEKER, as they are of universal interest.

From Pittsburgh we went to Alliance. Here the blizzard struck us, and we felt like staying at home with the thermometer several degrees below sero. However we plunged along half a mile to the Independent church, where we expected to find a baker's dozen, but we were agreeably surprised to be greeted by an audience of nearly a hundred. Mr. Watts gave his lecture on "Freethought: Its Nature, Its Struggles, and Its Triumphs." No discussion followed. On the second evening a larger number were present, though the blizzard had not yet exhausted its energies. I lectured on "Coming Religious Demands," and Mr. Watts on "Agnosticism." We find a good deal of interest at Alliance, and a League will undoubtedly be started. With such men as the Smith brothers, Thornbergh, Brosius, and others, the Freethought movement in Alliance will be made eminently successful.

Thursday, Feb. 12th, we came on to Massillon, Ohio. This is a good place. Mr. Pocock, Mr. Hunt, Mr. Pierce, Mr. Robert, Bell, and others make a fine force for Liberalism, and practical results will be achieved.

Mr. Watts lectured on Thursday evening in the Opera House. The following from the Canton Repository shows with what success he spoke upon "Civilization: What has Retarded It, and What has Promoted It:"

"MASSILLON, Feb. 13th.—Mr. Charles Watts delivered his very interesting lecture on "Civilization: What has Retarded It and what Promotes It," to quite a large audience, and a very intelligent one, who listened with marked attention to his earnest and logical reasoning. Mr. Watts is a fluent speaker and handled his subject so gracefully as to elicit rounds of applause. He defined civilization to be a societarian condition, where order, justice, education, and general comfort exist; and the principal influences which hav retarded it are, first, ignorance, which prevents people from knowing what to do, blinds them to the consequences of action and oftentimes causes good intentions to result in evil. Second, religious fanaticism, which puts emotion above reason, destroys cooperation through its sectarian spirit, stagnates and crushes science, and disregards the welfare of this world. Thirdly, the notion that Christianity has been a factor in human progress. The powers that promote civilization are, first, the diffusion of secular knowledge; second, the rise and spread of skepticism; third, care of physical conditions; fourth, application of science; fifth, forced improvement of the church; and lastly, practical faith in human effort. An invitation was given to any one differing from him in the conclusions advanced, to reply. Though a pleasant speaker his forte seems to be in debate, and he expressed his willingness to meet any gentlemen in discussing any of the questions upon which the Secularist and Christian disagree. This evening's subject will be: "Theological Errors, Hell, and the Devil."

To-morrow evening (Saturday, Feb. 14th) we are at Medina; on Sunday, 15th, at Cleveland; the week after, at Upper Sandusky; and at Indianapolis Feb. 22d; at Detroit Feb. 25th and 26th; Mr. Watts then goes to Canada. I shall be at Cincinnati March 1st, and Lexington, Ky., March 2d. It is quite impracticable, for lack of time, to visit all the places we desire, and to which we hav been invited. We shall take in as many places as possible, but we cannot, in such a vast country, meet all demands in one year. We purpose to be thorough-going in our work and build for the future.

Yes, the future is ours, and success; for, after mature consideration, Robert G. Ingersoll accepts the presidency of what will hereafter be the American Secular Union. This vindicates the wisdom of the course pursued by the late Annual Congress at Cassadaga, and now we are on the path to triumph. Our work is not partial, but universal. The Nine Demands are a bond of union as broad and deep as justice itself. We stand for justice, and, through justice, for the unity of man. With Ingersoll for our leader we hav the glory of genius to make bright our struggle, and from this day we shall go forward with unflagging hope and enthusiasm.

Fraternally yours, SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Bacon and Shakespere.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 13th of December last, and also that of the 27th, a writer, under the caption of "Bacon and Shakspere," traces a parallel in dates, and then a contrast, between those two contemporary characters. What his aim was does not plainly appear in said communications, but it seemed to me to giv some circumstantial proof of the Baconian origin of the plays generally ascribed to Shakspere.

Toward solving the problem of the authorship of those wonderful productions of the human intellect, a most valuable contribution has been made, apparently unintentionally, by Mr. O'Connor, of Washington city, in a letter dated Feburary, 1883, and contained in Dr. Buck's "Life of Walt Whitman." On page 90 of this book he quotes Lord Bacon as saying that "the compilation of the natural history of the human passions is the first duty of philosophy; and that it is the particular presence of poetry. Therein we may find painted forth with great life, how passions are kindled and incited; how pacified and restrained; and how again contained from act and further degree; how they disclose themselvs; how they work; how they vary; how they gather and fortify; how they are enwrapped one within another; and how they do fight and encounter one with another; and other the like particulars." Professor Fischer, in quoting this passage, remarks: "That is to say, Bacon desires nothing less than a natural history of the passions; the very thing that Shakspere has produced. Is not the inexhaustible theme of Shakspere's poetry the history and course of human passions? In the treatment of this special theme, is not Shakspere the greatest of all poets—nay, is he not unique among them all?"

There are a great many absurd propositions in the world which thousands believe to be true; as, for instance, that a priest's prayer said in Latin can transmute a wafer, made of flour, into the body, blood, and divinity of Jesus Christ, so that every Catholic who partakes of it can hav the comfortable assurance that he has in his belly the Almighty God manifest in the flesh. But this is not one whit more incredible to me than that a man of Shakspere's acknowledged antecedents should be able to giv birth to the plays which, for two centuries, hav been fathered upon him. Therefore, I reject this idea as quickly as I do the doctrin of transubstantiation. I hav not the shadow of a doubt that Bacon wrote those plays for the express purpose of carrying out his idea quoted above, that the prime end of philosophy, as of poetry, was to giv a compilation of the human passions.

Fond as Bacon was of Thespian performances, like so many of his illustrious contemporaries; and taking part, as he notoriously did, in extemporizing masques, on sudden occasions, for the entertainment of his sovereign, we can hardly suppose that the sole object of so great a man, in writing these plays, was that of a common playwright—to entertain an audience in the theater during a winter evening, and to help the manager make money for all concerned. To show the beginning, the progress, and natural working of the human passions, and thus increase the general knowledge of human nature; and to teach statesmen and legislators a lesson of wisdom in the matter of making laws for the government of these passions, was the high aim of the author of these plays. If the poet did not aim to do this it was a waste of time for him to make, or others to read, his productions. If philosophy did not accomplish this object, it was a philosophy falsely so-called. And when this work is done in the plays on so magnificent a plan, and so effectually, it is no wonder that Mr. Buckle, in his "History of Civilization in England," believing that Shakspere was the author, pronounced him to be "the greatest of all the sons of men." Let us glance at the circumstances.

William Cecil (Lord Burleigh) was a great man, and the soul of Elizabeth's administration. Robert Cecil was his son, and heir-apparent to his honors and his place. Robert Cecil was full cousin to Bacon, their mothers being sisters. There was not much difference between their ages. But between the two men, in point of intellectual ability—although Cecil was a great man too—there was an infinit distance. Brought up under his father, and early employed by the government, Cecil became very shrewd, or, as we say in this country, very sharp, and, in the accomplishment of his purposes, unscrupulous. Lord Burleigh, seeing in his nephew a beautiful person, vast powers of mind, and unexampled attainments in all kinds of knowledge, and, withal, of wonderful popularity, was afraid he would eclipse his son Robert, and was jealous of him. And Robert himself, being a deformed man, and seeing the great superiority of his cousin to himself, was both jealous and envious, and having the long end of the lever in his hands, owing to his place in the government, used it to keep Bacon down, and succeeded in doing so for years, shutting him out from all political preferment, and immuring him, as a briefless lawyer, in his Gray's Inn cell. That this policy of suppression by the Cecils is not imaginary, is proved by the fact that when Robert Cecil died in 1612, Bacon's advancement immediately began, and he soon found the place which, on account of his high qualifications, he should hav occupied many years before.

Bacon's knowledge as a philosopher, a statesman, and a lawyer, as well as a poet, was so great that it made him modest. Besides, he was constitutionally diffident. He could not push his own way through difficulties like many others who had not one-tenth of his ability, but waited for his friends who knew his merits to call him out. Conscious of his powers, and keenly sensitiv to the injustice done him by his uncle and cousin, he confined himself, when not in Parliament, to his quarters in Gray's Inn, year after year, during which time, as I suppose, he was engaged in philosophical studies, relieving their severity by writing those plays which were intended to be a history and compilation of the human passions. He did not publicly acknowledge the authorship of the plays, because, as they were performed in the theater, his enemies would make the fact another obstacle to his political advancement, since writing plays for the popular amusement was considered out of character in a man who was either a lawyer or a statesman. Some, and one of the very finest of the plays, was never performed at all, and never saw the light till William Shakspere had been in his grave seven years, and Heming & Condell put it into the folio edition of 1623. Bacon knew that his contemporaries could not appreciate either his philosophical or poetical works, and so, when he died, he left his "name and memory to foreign nations and the next ages."

We can easily imagin how such a man as Bacon, consigned for years to his "cell," as he called it, in Gray's Inn, by his envious and unnatural relativs, would chafe and fret against his destiny like a caged lion. But self-respect and policy both forbade that he should ever express to others the indignation, scorn, and hate which must hav rankled in his heart toward his oppressors who had him in their power. A small circle of his friends understood somewhat of the nature of the feelings existing between him and the Cecils; for when the "Essays" came out there was many a shrewd guess and tipping of winks among the knowing ones that, in two of them, the author was really describing his envious, humpbacked cousin. And I suspect that, having suffered so intensely, yet secretly, himself, from the accursed envy of this man, he not only gibbeted him in the "Essays" as a philosopher, but that as a poet, in his compilation of the human passions, his cousin's envious conduct was in his mind when he wrote the play called "Richard III." I hav no doubt that Byron's club foot had much to do in shaping his character for misanthropy and waywardness. He felt that he had been discriminated against by dissembling Nature, and, being exceedingly sensitiv, he was constantly irritated by the thought, and became reckless, vowing vengeance on society, which seemed to join with nature in her judgment. Read the ninth and fourty-fourth Essays, the one on "Envy," and the other on "Deformity." Then become acquainted with the character of Cecil, and the cruel use he made of his position in the government, for years, to keep Bacon from advancement. Then read Gloster's soliloquy, which opens the play of "Richard III.," and judge whether, if Bacon be the author, he did not giv the natural history of the passion of "envy" as it has been acted out toward him by his mean and deformed cousin. The intense colors used in painting the character of Richard can only be explained on the theory that whoever wrote the play had his heart surcharged with indignation at the deep personal wrongs which he himself had suffered from an envious man who had him in his power; and that he licensed his pen to do its best in portraying the odious character of the wretch who could be guilty of such injustice.

Those whose throats are miraculous enough to take down both Jonah and the whale, and Balaam's Hebrew-speaking ass into the bargain, may continue to believe that a man whose only handwriting since his death is his signature to his will; and whose daughter, Judith, was brought up in such ignorance of letters that she had to sign her name to a document by her mark, because she did not know how to write—such credulous people may smile incredulously at the idea of Bacon being the author of the plays, but whoever candidly weighs the facts in the case, and the arguments based on them, in the spirit of an investigator, instead of an attorney-at-law whose client has given him a large fee, will come to the conclusion that the Baconian theory of the play is sound.

A Tribute to Thomas Paine.

The New York Observer several years ago attacked the character of Thomas Paine, and Colonel Ingersoll defended him. That defense caused literary men to study Paine's writings. Professor Moses Coit Tyler, formerly of Michigan University, has not only attempted to do justice to Paine in his "History of American Literature," but has recently read before a historical society an essay on Paine's writings.

The Unitarians hav found him no more a heretic than Theodore Parker.

The Congregationalists, who are growing in liberality, are fast coming to recognize the honesty, the ability, the manliness of this hero of our Revolution. Rev. Wayland D. Ball, of McPherson, Kansas, has delivered a sermon on "Thomas Paine as a Statesman." Taking for his text Romans xiii, 7, and an article from the Inter-Ocean, of Chicago, of Sept. 6, 1884, indorsing the proposition to erect a statue of Paine in Lincoln Park, he paid a glowing tribute to Paine. He said: "While reading this article there came over me the conviction, as it had before come while reading the political works of this man in question, that there was a debt of gratitude which we, his posterity, owed to his memory and to his deeds that we hav been far too slow in paying, and that perhaps this effort might be one of the initial steps toward discharging an obligation, that long since ought to hav been discharged, toward one who has been so intimately connected with our history and our fate as a political organization.

. . . "Thomas Paine is a character whom the church certainly has seen fit not to canonize among her saints or remember in her prayers; a character whom society is diffident about commenting upon or speaking its opinion about; indeed, a character concerning whose characteristics, about whose place in history, the public in general is ignorant. 'Thomas Paine? Why, of course I know who Thomas Paine was. He was that blasphemous Infidel who said and wrote so many things against Christianity.' That is the answer you will get from seventy-five per cent of all Christians. Such an answer as this simply discovers to us our real ignorance of his character and of his deeds, and also the great injustice done to his memory and to his accomplishments when such is the nature of our estimate. . . . But let him rest assured who has read nothing but Paine's 'Age of Reason,' and has left unread his famous pamphlets on 'Common Sense,' 'The Rights of Man,' and his several numbers of 'The Crisis,' that he has lived in nothing but the moonshine of that man's history, and has had not a glimpse of the full, clear day that reigned in the soul of Thomas Paine when he produced those immortal papers, so pregnant with the spirit that gave birth to our Constitution and to our liberties and to our institutions of government.

"We hav heard of his discourses on religion. They displeased us. We refuse to hear him talk on politics. He was not a good churchman. We cannot believe him to be anything of a statesman. . . . Because he would not preach, we will stop our ears and shut our eyes, and say, 'Impossible that he should legislate.' Because he would not pray our prayers, we will declare him to hav been no patriot; because he would not kiss the robe of the priest, we swear he could never hav helped to move the mighty fabric of our republic. Facts, my hearers, are the only things that come up before us to embarrass our declarations and our oaths upon these points of affirmation and belief. And we, as men and Christians, and as preachers, might as well learn, first as last, that 'truth, crushed to earth, will rise again.' . . . We hav declared him to be so heterodox in matters of Christian belief, that we are afraid to accept him as orthodox in matters of politics and political economy. We hav confessed the truths of our Christianity to be so weak, and weakly supported, that the mistakes of one man are sufficient to do detriment, and perhaps ruin, to our faith. So thoroughly hav we seemed to believe this, that we hav endeavored to efface from the memory of men, and from the pages of our history, the name of one so vitally concerned in our dearest-bought and most dearly-beloved liberties, and done this simply because, in peculiar circumstances and in peculiar moments—their honesty we do not call in question—he wrote things antagonistic to the faith of Christians. We hav in this made an unpardonable confession of weakness."

The sermon then reviews his political works, and pays him a just meed of praise. It closes with these words:

"Here we, for our dear country's sake, for the church's sake, ask ourselvs, with hesitation and in a whisper voice, 'Hav we not placed this last-named stain of ingratitude on our national escutcheon, since it can in truth and with reason be said of us, for more than one hundred years we hav most cordially execrated and detested Thomas Paine?'

"More than a century of ingratitude indulged toward him remains by us to be apologized for. Tardily may come the reckoning; but we, as Christian America, must and will, some day, render unto Thomas Paine the honor that his deeds hav earned for him.

"Our piety, my Christian friends, must not make out of us bigots; our zeal must not make out of us fanatics; our faith must not convert us into religious despots."

Not Encouraging.

"Ambrose," a well-known and able writer for the New York Evangelist, in last week's issue of that paper holds forth in this lugubrious strain:

"Is crime on the increase? Some days ago the Chicago Tribune moralized after this fashion: 'As we look back a few years the prospect does not look encouraging; for, steadily year by year crime increases, the tone of public morals lowers, suicides are more frequent, human life is considered of less value, disasters through human carelessness multiply, the legal hangman is kept more busy, and the hangman who does not wait for verdicts is twice as busy as his associate who executes the decrees of courts.' This is a somber picture; and yet, dark as it is, I fear it is true. But if so, what is the cause?"

With the causes for this sad state of affairs, some of which "Ambrose" goes on to specify, we are not now concerned; but wish simply to emphasize the fact that this alleged steady increase of crime and immorality, from year to year, keeps right along with the increase of churches and the general diffusion of gospel privileges. Revivals of religion flourish side by side with revivals of peculation, defalcations, and elopements—revivals which count amongst their converts not only members of the laity, but ministers, church elders, and Sunday-school superintendents as well.

A merely superficial view would naturally lead one to expect that a half-score of churches distributed amongst a population of ten or twelve thousand inhabitants, with the tremendous moral influence that they are popularly supposed to represent, would create a morally healthful state of society. But the expectation is not fulfilled. The town in which the writer livs is a town of that number of inhabitants, containing twelve churches, supplemented by two mission chapels amongst the poorer and more degraded classes; and yet sheriffs, jailors, courts, and policemen are not idle, but succeed, with the aid of sixty to eighty groggeries, in rolling up a fearful annual bill for the burdened tax-payers to liquidate. Now, at first blush, this would seem to be an unnatural exhibit for all this outlay of pious labors. On the contrary, it is just about what might be expected. It is not difficult for persons of ordinary discernment to see that the churches never can, and never will, succeed in improving society much until a radical reformation is wrought in the churches themselvs. Their methods must be changed. In order to make their labors available, instead of bending all their energies, as is now the case, to the saving of souls from an imaginary doom in another world, they must turn their attention and efforts to the practical and useful task of helping men, women, and children to be good and happy in this life, right here and now. Will the churches ever reform their methods in this respect? I doubt it. Said an evangelist to a crowded audience a few nights since, in the writer's hearing, "Morality, although a part of religion, is not the part which saves a man." There you hav, in a sentence, an illustration of the point we hav been making. Morality, either in the individual or community, is not deemed by the church a consideration of prime importance. I once heard a clergyman in the pulpit express himself thus: "God loathes the moral man!" His theme was "the danger of trusting in morality for salvation."

There is, indeed, little hope of the churches doing much for the real improvement of society for many years to come. It will take them a long time to unlearn their present methods, and learn better ones, if, indeed, they ever do. This desirable change of program will certainly not take place until knowledge, generally diffused, shall hav forced the churches to an abandonment of belief in the divine inspiration of that book from which they claim to get precise directions for all their religious aims and efforts.

Ithaca, N. Y. S. BREWER.

Colonel Ingersoll in Brooklyn.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: On Sunday evening, Feb. 1, 1885, Colonel Ingersoll lectured at the Brooklyn Theater to a crowded house. The colonel was in the best of spirits, and never delivered a more effectiv discourse. The audience applauded him throughout, and the door-keeper remarked that not a single person left the theater during the discourse. This shows they were interested and pleased. The reporters called attention to the respectability and high social standing of those present.

Of course the great success of this lecture made a noise in Brooklyn society, and it was decided that some means must be used to counteract the influence of Freethought. The Rev. Mr. Mitchell volunteered to defend the cause of orthodoxy, and a lecture was advertised at fifty cents admission. The result was surprising. The Brooklyn Eagle says that when the forty gas jets were turned on at eight o'clock last Wednesday evening at the lecture-rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association, there were present one lecturer, two reporters, and an audience consisting of one lady.

After this grand success in annihilating Colonel Ingersoll, it was hoped that our Christian friends would rest satisfied with the laurels they had won, and resume their serene attitude of conscious superiority in Christian grace, which is so becoming and so amusing. But now cometh forward that redoubtable champion of orthodoxy, the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., who reneweth the battle with the unconverted, and who boldly speaketh as one having authority.

The following is from his last sermon as reported in the New York World:

"Christianity," said Mr. Talmage, "is the rising sun of our time. Yet there are men trying, by the smoke of their blasphemy, to turn this sun into darkness. But what the destruction of the sun would mean to our planet, the destruction of Christianity would be to the world of morals. Infidelity in our time is considered a great joke. If a lecturer in the Brooklyn Theater last Sunday is correctly reported, he said, 'When we compare our God with men he is not much of a God.' He said that when Christ was here he was kind and forgiving, but now that he is a God he would send men into everlasting punishment, and that was doubtless the effect of an office! Christ, who came to bear our sorrows and our sins, maligned and made the subject of mirth! Is there such a thing as blasphemy? If so, can the law be executed? These are tremendous questions for our lawyers and judges. There is such a law, and it can be executed."

Mr. Talmage then quoted from Rev. Dr. Speer, Chief-Justice Kent, Judge Cooley, and other authorities as to the nature of blasphemy, and how it could be punished under the common law. "Now I say let the law against blasphemy be erased or let it be executed. But I am asked, 'Don't you believe in free speech?' Yes, I believe in all kinds of freedom. I believe in driving horses, but not in driving over others. I believe in the free use of knives, but not in assassination. I believe in free speech, but not in the freedom of blasphemy. Freedom to do right, but no freedom to do wrong! It would hav been one of the grandest dramas ever enacted in the Brooklyn Theater if last Sunday evening my friend, Patrick Campbell, chief of police, a Christian man, had marched on the stage with a platoon of police, and, laying his hand on the lecturer's shoulder, had said:

"'In the name of the common law; in the name of the state of New York and the city of Brooklyn, stop! Stop here and stop now.' (Applause, which Mr. Talmage rebuked.) There will some time arise in this country a municipal authority which will arrest blasphemers. The carrion stench of Infidelity will be fumigated."

If all the people in Brooklyn who differ from the Rev. Dr. Talmage are to be put in jail, the prisons must at once be enlarged. Taxes, which are always oppressiv, will then become ruinous. Would it not be better, on the score of economy, to establish a Brooklyn auto-da-fé, with Brother Talmage as chief inquisitor, and then burn all the intelligent people who dare think for themselvs? If they will not think as this good Christian directs, why not prevent them from thinking at all? If the pious Calvin did right in burning Servetus, the Unitarian, for his want of faith, in Geneva, would the equally pious Talmage do wrong in burning Ingersoll, the Agnostic, for his disbelief, in Brooklyn? PETER ECKLER.

Scraps.

A story comes from Ephratah, N. Y., stating that the Rev. Daniel Witmer lately had a strange experience. One night, when returning from a religious meeting held in a schoolhouse, a man with a lantern approached him, and the stranger proved to be headless. The preacher soon discovered that his companion had his head in one hand. There was at least one "scairt" preacher in the country that night. This is an awful warning to avoid going to religious meetings in schoolhouses at night. A man who has the cheerful habit of tramping around with his head in one hand and a lantern in the other may be a useful person on certain occasions, but he is a positiv hindrance at a revival. Others are watching for this fellow, but whether from curiosity, or with a design to lay violent hands on him, is not stated. Probably the whisky is extremely bad down that way.

Earthquakes hav been having a grand carnival in Spain. At Granada "the Te Deum was sung and prayers offered for the cessation of the earthquake." Of course the earthquake ceased. No well-behaved earthquake would continue its performance after being requested to sit down. The Christians are fond of praying when they are in great danger, but the ancient Greeks were far more sensible. They wrote a prayer like the following, and placed it beside the image of the god: "Zeus, our Lord, giv unto us whatever is good, whether we ask it of thee or not; whatever is evil keep far from us, even if we ask it of thee." This covered every possible case and saved much time and noise.

A Catholic priest committed suicide in a saloon because he was poor and sick, and he said: "May God help me." Why didn't God help him before he killed himself? What reason had he to suppose that God would be any more merciful in the future than in the past?

It is expected that the Inauguration ball in Washington "will surpass anything of the kind ever attempted in this country." The building will be elaborately decorated, etc. Bands are striving for the honor of furnishing the music, and the committee has "decided to hav three bands." While the brilliant couples are gracefully bowing and waltzing and promenading, the grand swell of music will drown the piteous wail of horror and despair that sweeps across from the ill-starred Hocking Valley. From that valley of death and desolation, where mines are burning, fired by incendiaries, where starvation, rags, wretchedness, and dynamite hold sway, where envy, hate, malice, revenge, distrust, all the passions of hell, are roused, is it possible that no ghastly specters will thrust themselvs between the giddy dancers in Washington?

Does civilization equalize the condition of mankind, or the reverse? N. G. W.

Exempting Sectarian Property.

From the Washington Chronicle.

A bill has been introduced in Congress to exempt from bearing its proportion of the burdens of taxation the property of the Young Men's Christian Association in the District of Columbia. If church property is made exempt, perhaps the rule (though ever so bad and unjust a one) should include the Young Men's Christian Association property. But the rule itself is odious. Just as much as the Young Men's Christian Association love "religious liberty," just so far and as eagerly should the members of that organization demand that they shall not shift from their shoulders any of the public burdens to the shoulders of the miscellaneous heathen of the land. Every dollar of taxes not paid on church property or the property of the Young Men's Christian Association must be assessed against and collected from the general property of the people, Infidel and Christian, Catholic and Protestant, Sectarian and Liberal alike. What superior rights hav the church corporations over other corporations? Do they contribute to the prosperity of the community? Do they promote the arts and sciences, to which alone the advancement of the civilization of the age is due? In so far as the churches and the Young Men's Christian Association promote morality and justice they are entitled to and should receive the meed of praise. But individuals may do that; newspapers are doing it daily, hourly, yet neither individuals nor newspapers demand that their property shall be exempt from taxation for that reason. Then for what reason can the Young Men's Christian Association demand such exclusivness? In so far as the Young Men's Christian Association is relieved of taxes, that far the corporation is supported by the commonwealth, by the state. And it is against the spirit and the letter of our independent, free, and enlightened republic and its Magna Charta to even thus indirectly unite church and state—to even thus remotely shift the burdens of the commonwealth from the shoulders of a religious sect or corporation to those of non-believers.

Suppose Colonel Ingersoll, the despised Infidel, should organize and incorporate his hosts of followers in the District of Columbia, erect a valuable and costly hall, or "church," if you please, and induce some brave Congressman to offer a bill providing that Colonel Ingersoll's Infidel church property should be exempt from public taxes. Such an uproar would be made about the ears of Congressmen that few would feel disposed to brave the odium of voting for such exemption.

Now, put the shoe on the other foot. What special exclusivness has the Young Men's Christian Association corporation over Colonel Ingersoll Infidelity? Doesn't the spirit of utter freedom and toleration in this country accord to Ingersollism the same consideration that the Young Men's Christian Association corporation is entitled to? All religious opinions are accorded equal toleration and expression, and the most clear-cut no-religious views hav equal rights with the others. This, and nothing less than this, is religious liberty. No respectable court of justice now insists, in this country, on demanding of witnesses a belief in any established system of religion—in a personal God or the Old or New Testament. The Swaim court-martial brought down upon its dwarfed head general execration for demanding it. Only in remote corners of the country where the laws are yet on the statute books which punish lying and other sins by branding the forehead with a red-hot iron, and by slitting the tongue (as in the District of Columbia), is the formality of kissing the Bible required, or even of having it in view when an "oath" is administered. And with progress and reform in these particulars that of exempting property of religious corporations like the Young Men's Christian Association must be brought to public attention. Right and equal justice to all citizens demand that there shall be no exemptions of property whatever. All property, public and private, should bear its equal burden of the public yoke. All property is equally protected by the law, by the municipal authority, by the fire and police departments, and the courts are ready to vindicate the rights of property alike in the Christian and pagan, believer and non-believer. In all legislativ bodies there is ever the selfish politician, ready to curry favor with the interested religious corporation by the introduction of the exemption bill. Let him and his little bill of injustice be suppressed by the advance guard of impartial religious liberty.

A Favor Asked.

Will the friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER in every state of the Union (and especially some friend in every place in which an institution is located) send us the latest report of the officers of the penal and reform institutions of their states? We wish to compare the religious proclivities of the inmates, and to giv the statistics as full as possible. No matter if reports are duplicated; it will serve our purpose much better to hav a dozen reports of one institution than no report. We ask every person able to get one of these reports to send it to this office.

The League Presidency.

In discussing League matters last summer, THE TRUTH SEEKER took the position that the League Congress to convene in the fall should frame a platform for Freethinkers, leaving it to be settled by each individual for himself whether he should aid the various political reforms or not. Most Freethinkers are reformers of one kind or another, and at previous congresses planks were put into the platform composed of timber of a great variety of kinds. The platform was, indeed, a regular mosaic. We strongly urged a return to first principles.

The Cassadaga Congress took this view, and officers were elected and a platform adopted on this basis. By the letter from Mr. Watts in the League department of this issue, it will be seen that Colonel Ingersoll is in perfect agreement with this policy. Though somewhat delayed, his acceptance of the office of president is a good thing for the League. It puts at the head of the organization the man who naturally belongs there. The League is the only national organization of Liberals. Its membership comprises the best and representativ men of the Secular movement, and it has the cordial and untiring support of the leading Freethought papers. The outside press and people generally speak of Colonel Ingersoll as the chief among ten thousand enemies of the church. He, therefore, by force of his own genius and the common consent of the American people, should be the head of the representativ Freethought organization of the country.

We hav heard that Colonel Ingersoll had grave doubts as to the advisability of accepting this position. We hav heard also that the enemies of the League hav done all they could, privately and publicly, to deter him from accepting it. Whatever scruples he may hav had, based upon whatever grounds they might hav been, we are unqualifiedly glad that he has cast them aside, and resolved to giv the League the benefit of his advice. Had not the last Congress consented to a return to first principles it may be doubted if he would hav done this. Our counsel to the League at that time in the light of the success attending the efforts of Messrs. Watts and Putnam, and the gain of such a valuable auxiliary as the new president, may be considered sound. That the present board of directors will continue the policy we hav no doubt.

Colonel Ingersoll's forthcoming statement of views will be read with great interest. He has a practical mind, and is interested in putting the movement for equal rights in religious matters on a triumphant basis. He knows what he wants, and knows how to go to work to obtain it. Whatever counsel he may giv will be well worth heeding.

We congratulate the League and the friends of the League. To other individuals we extend the assurance of our most distinguished consideration.

The Methods of Anarchy.

Interested, as every humanitarian must be, in any and all schemes to benefit mankind, and improve the social conditions of the people—which all see and admit are bad enough to make the very stones cry out—we make it a point to examin the various new social philosophies put forth by self-constituted social reformers. Among all these philosophies, none has a more brilliant advocate than Anarchy in the person of Benjamin R. Tucker, the editor of Liberty. Recently, in answer to a correspondent who asserted that under Anarchism mortgages would be worth no more than blank paper, Mr. Tucker said in the columns of his paper:

"When Anarchy prevails, all just titles will be valid and efficacious for one of two reasons: either people will hav improved in their morals sufficiently to respect them voluntarily, or else such persons as are indisposed to respect them will be forced to do so. 'The old state over again!' my undiscriminating friend will cry. Not at all, my friend! Simply a voluntary association for defense of person and property, to which no one need belong who does not choose, and which no one not belonging will be expected to support."

Thinking that Mr. Tucker hardly saw to the bottom of the Anarchistic well, we asked for more light, in these words:

"Will Mr. Tucker please explain further? Will his Anarchical society constrain the people outside his 'voluntary association for defense of person and property?' If yes, in what does the difference consist between Anarchical society and our present government? If no, where is the protection? Or shall persons belonging to the association hav dealings only with fellow-members; and, if a person in the association is constrained, how is his act voluntary? And will he continue to pay for being constrained? It strikes us that this constraining is precisely what our friend Tucker is now so eloquently kicking against.

"In Stephen Pearl Andrews's sociological scheme—the Pantarchy—nothing but moral force is used. It looks as though Mr. Tucker would hav to adopt that or let our present societarial government alone."

In answer to this Mr. Tucker responds:

"First, then, 'will his Anarchical society constrain the people outside his "voluntary association for defense of person and property?"' Yes, it will constrain, or rather restrain, precisely those and no others—restrain them from invasion of person and property. It will not restrain people inside the association, that being impossible in the nature of the case; for one of the conditions of membership will be voluntary submission to the decisions of tribunals mutually agreed upon, anyone refusing such submission placing himself thereby outside the association, and liable, therefore, to restraint if he invades.

"'If yes, in what does the difference consist between Anarchical society and our present government?' In this, that Anarchical society will be a voluntary association, wholly for defense of person and property, while our present government is a compulsory association principally for invasion of person and property, dependent for its very existence upon the bottom invasion, compulsory taxation. To the former no one will belong who does not choose; to the latter all must belong and giv support. The former will exist to protect people in their rights and insure their equality; the latter exists to rob people of their rights for the benefit of privilege. Quite vital differences, these seem to me, and very easily discernible.

"The answers to the remaining questions are included in the answers to the first two. I trust THE TRUTH SEEKER will see it has misapprehended the direction of my 'eloquent kicking.'

"It is interesting to know that Stephen Pearl Andrews in his Pantarchy now champions moral force exclusivly. The knowledge is also surprising. The doctrin is not in his works; he held no such when last I talked with him. He always steadfastly maintained that policy should be adapted to circumstance, and that, when necessary, we should meet physical force with physical force, deal inequitably with the inequitable, and be intolerant of the intolerant. In this I substantially agreed with him, my only quarrel being with his tendency to apply the rule loosely, instead of confining the cases of necessity within the narrow limits that I favored, he being in this less exclusivly in favor of moral force than myself. But it seems that the world moves, and Mr. Andrews with it. The Pantarch is now a rigorous non-resistant. Though still unable to entirely agree with him, I congratulate him on the change in the direction of his error. Better too little physical force than too much. But, I repeat, I am surprised. 'That is not law,' said severely a haughty judge on the Massachussetts supreme bench to the eminent, learned, and witty lawyer, Henry W. Paine, enunciating a certain proposition in arguing a case before him. 'Accept my apology, your honor,' answered Mr. Paine, in all humility; 'it always has been law until the present moment.' Until THE TRUTH SEEKER'S recent declaration Mr. Andrews was not a non-resistant."

This is not quite satisfactory. If Mr. Tucker will not get out of patience, we wish to ask him some more conundrums suggested by his reply. It occurs to us to inquire, in connection with the assertion that anarchism "will not restrain people inside the association," What if a flagrant offense has been committed by a member of the association who refuses to abide by the decision—has the injured person no redress besides seeing the oppressor placed "outside the association," and "liable to restraint if he" again "invades?" Unless the people all become angels the moment Anarchy prevails, we think the outsiders would soon be in the majority. But if the association proceeds to right the injured one's wrongs, is not that forcible constraint? And would not such a procedure on the part of the association lead right back to our present government? In short, is it not the "vicious circle" into which Mr. Tucker has got—a veritable treadmill in which the traveler is always going, but never getting there? If the association restrains anyone—whether a voluntary member or not—it is forcible government like the present. If it does not restrain both its own members and outsiders, the strong would certainly oppress the weak. Of course we admit that if every one in the world possessed the perfectness of the so-called angel, government, that is, society in its corporate capacity, would not need to exist. But we assume that the anarchists are advocating a scheme to replace our present organization of society, not formulating rules applicable only to the millennium. Absolute individualism could then prevail, for no one would be tempted to interfere with his neighbor.

We hope friend Tucker will forgiv us for bearing down so hard upon this point; but his answer is no answer at all to what we asked. Neither is the statement wholly accurate that "Anarchical society will be a voluntary association wholly for defense of person and property, while our present government is a compulsory association principally for invasion of person and property, dependent for its very existence upon the bottom invasion, compulsory taxation." Is our present government principally for invasion of person and property? We put it to the jury of Mr. Tucker's countrymen. Again: Let Mr. Tucker form in himself the Anarchical association. Let him be neither taxed nor protected by our government, either by public opinion or by policemen paid by public subscription. Let all the rest of the world be the outsiders. Then supposing Mr. Tucker were aggrieved by the outsiders. What would he do? Defend himself? Of course. But supposing he is too weak? Call to his aid another Anarchist. Together they would sit down upon the interloper; and to our way of thinking that would be just what they ought to do. But that would be society as it is to-day, and government as it is to-day. The two ends of his golden thread are tied together. Did not our present government start in just that way? Our savage ancestors, so far as we can learn, were individualistic to the furthest extreme. In the process of evolution they banded together for common defense. It became necessary also to defend themselvs against the members of their own association. A member had to be restrained. Every member of the association was interested in this. But supposing some stingy ones would not contribute to the erection of the necessary structure in which to restrain him? Taxes would then be levied, and is it not in this way that compulsory taxation came? This was fair enough, was it not?

And what different would be the Anarchical association? That would restrain as necessity arose, end would then become compulsory just so far as it restrained. How arbitrary it became would depend upon the depravity of the members. The great depravity of a proportion of our population at present necessitates a quite arbitrary government. Could the Anarchical society get along with less? Defense is what law, police, and armies are for. Wars of conquest are not now in fashion in the United States. We must, therefore, question the accuracy of the statement that our government "exists to rob people of their rights for the benefit of privilege." There is of course a vital difference between a robber and a protector. Government was formerly not only a protector but a robber. Our own state governments are ostensibly only protectors; they do, however, afford means, in a roundabout way, for the quick-witted to rob to slow-witted. But we fail to see in the Anarchical association any guarantee that this same robbery would not go on. Vigilance committees are voluntary associations, but they, as often as our legal courts, do injustice to the persons brought before their tribunals. But is not a frontier vigilance committee, in a new country, where the government has not crystallized to the extent of receiving taxes, a fair sample of an Anarchistic voluntary association? Is there not, however, a happy medium somewhere between the extremes of slavery and Anarchy?

It is fair to say that Mr. Tucker realizes the enormous difficulty to be encountered in substituting Anarchy for republicanism. In reply to our inquiry as to the detailed methods of Anarchy, he replies:

"Individual initiativ and voluntary co-operation. This is not likely to satisfy THE TRUTH SEEKER. It will probably insist that I shall dot the i's and cross the t's. This desire arises from its political superstition. If I were to paint a definit and detailed picture of the New Jerusalem and the road thereto, and label it, 'A Complete Representation of Universal Progress for the Balance of Eternity,' it is not improbable that Anarchy would gain a new adherent in THE TRUTH SEEKER. But it is only the quack who pretends to know it all, and only the devotee who believes in his pretensions. Not being a quack, but a pursuer of the scientific method, I affirm certain principles which I scientifically know to be indispensable to progress, and labor for their realization. The all-important principle at this junctnre is Liberty, which, as soon as sufficient co-operation offers, we Anarchists propose to make a reality by passiv resistance to its violation through suffrage, taxation, and monopoly. THE TRUTH SEEKER hangs off because I cannot tell it exactly how sewers, streets, railroads, and watercourses will be administered in the good time coming. I can only say that, liberty being a necessary condition of society, all social institutions will be founded upon it.

"Why not hav a little confidence in the power of truth? Is it not safer, at any rate, to follow a known truth in the face of obstacles and dangers than to follow its counter falsehood? Let us be men, not children; reasoning men, not victims of superstition; brave men, not cowards; truth seekers in fact as well as in name. Having accepted liberty, then, follow her faithfully to the end. Has not her message been sung to us by William Blake?

> "I giv you the end of a golden thread,
> Just wind it into a ball;
> It will lead you in at heaven's gate,
> Close by Jerusalem's wall.'"

Mr. Tucker is right about our wanting the i's dotted and the t's crossed. We do. In a matter so important as the reorganization of society, we think the people hav a right to request of the social doctors a plain prescription written in English. Mr. Tucker is a "pursuer of the scientific method." That method is, he assures us, "individual initiativ and voluntary co-operation." This is a "glittering generality." He seems to say, "I giv you the general principles; to limbo with the details." But it is just these details that are wanted. We admit that Liberty is a lovable goddess, in whose eyes shines a more or less high light, but we must beg to be excused from trusting her to the extent of being slain. For is not liberty, in its furthest development as Anarchy, despotism disguised, as a vigilance committee is lawlessness masquerading as law?

Mr. Tucker assures us that so "soon as sufficient co-operation offers, we Anarchists propose to make a reality by passiv resistance to its violation through suffrage, taxation, and monopoly." But is not co-operativ Anarchy a misnomer, a wedding together of two entirely different things? Must not a co-operator make his own wishes subordinate in a degree to the welfare of the others of the association? and would such co-operation be the fulfilment of individual sovereignty, which is the basic principle of Anarchy? Is not absolute Anarchy impossible because of the dependence, in some degree, of every person in the world upon others? We hav all the confidence in the world in the power of truth—but, What is truth? If we accept the old definition that it is an agreement of statement with fact, is Anarchy truth? Do the statements of the Anarchists agree with facts? One of Mr. Tucker's statements—it may almost be called his major premis—is that government now "exists principally for invasion of person and property." Surely, this is not truth, and the world may well hesitate before squaring its conduct by the necessities which such a condition would force upon it.

Mr. Tucker must also forgiv us if we do not allow his criticism of Mr. Andrews's position to stand. He has made a great error in identifying reliance upon moral force with non-resistance. Moral force—public opinion—is as powerful in controling the actions of men as an army. If it were not, Mr. Tucker could never hope to change the existing order of things. It may be organized, resistant, and even aggressiv, as well as non-resistant. The Pantarchy, if we understand it rightly, contemplates an organized government more potent (Mr. Andrews claims) than any dynamite or gun-cotton. This government would not only restrain, but it would resist when occasion demanded. Mr. Tucker, therefore, has jumped to a conclusion not warranted by the statement made. Mr. Tucker's Anarchy, or individual sovereignty, is one side of Mr. Andrews's Pantarchy. The other side is co-operation, even to communism, for those who choose. This second side is for the accomplishment of whatever purposes a voluntarily organized social agency can better attain, in the service of the individual, than can unorganized individual action. Such association, the Pantarch claims, is in behalf of individualism—not merely a voluntary association for the defense of person and property, but also for the better accommodation and more perfect service of those who consent and prefer that method for those ends. Mr. Tucker admits by his adoption of association in the constructiv phase of Anarchy that organization has immense advantages over individual exertion. Therefore, it would be as fair to say he is a Pantarchist as it is for him to dub the Pantarch a non-resistant. But there is a wide difference between Anarchism, as understood by Mr. Tucker, and Pantarchism. Both are based on individualism, and look exclusivly to moral forces within the specific range of their own direct purpose; both believe in resistance or constraint, mainly as restraint, in the relations of the interior organization with the outer world; both believe in voluntary organization for such defense and restraint; but, finally, the Pantarchy believes in addition (and here it goes beyond Anarchy) in voluntary organization for the further purpose of the better accommodation and service of individuals in all spheres of action where the individuals cannot so readily and successfully help themselvs.

We would not be understood as advocating Pantarchy or as opposing Anarchy. We are simply seeking truth, and contrasting two societarian schemes. Our prayer is for light.

Comstock's Newest Kink.

The "Arabian Nights" is a tolerably well-known book, and its position in classic literature has been thought to be properly assured. It will, therefore, occasion some surprise when it is known that Anthony Comstock has prohibited its sale in this city. The popular edition is freely translated and carefully expurgated; it is, therefore, not complete. The Villon Society of London has recently undertaken the publication of a complete edition for the especial benefit of literary connoisseurs. It has been reprinted in this country by a Philadelphia publishing house. The agent in this city is R. Worthington, who opened a limited subscription list for its sale, finding but little difficulty in obtaining the required number of subscribers among the lovers of good libraries in this city and throughout the United States. The first volume was issued from the Philadelphia press about Jan. 1st, and the second volome has just made its appearance and been forwarded to the subscribers.

On Wednesday afternoon Anthony Comstock walked into Mr. Worthington's establishment and, brandishing a copy of volume No. 2, informed Mr. Worthington that he would continue the sale of "this obscene book" at his peril. Mr. Worthington was taken completely by surprise. He recalled a former experience with Comstock several years ago, when that individual succeeded in depriving him of the sale in this city of a number of volumes of Boccaccio's "Decameron," which he had purchased without a suspicion that the classic work came within the scope of Comstock's peculiar license of suppression. He was amazed, and did not fail to show his amazement. Opening the volume, Comstock pointed out a number of marked paragraphs, and then said, in effect, that he was advised by the district-attorney that the sale of the book was criminal, and that if Mr. Worthington did not at once withdraw it from sale he would be arrested.

Mr. Worthington wilted under the bullying of Comstock, and promised not to sell any more. Mr. George W. Bouton, the well-known publisher, when informed of Comstock's action, said: "Goodness gracious, where will it end? Here is a book produced by an eminent literary society of London, which is a most valuable addition to our literary treasures. The American edition is a letter-perfect copy in every respect. If the 'Arabian Nights' is not a standard literary work, I do not know what is. Ah, well! the world wags." Mr. Bouton admitted that he had sold several sets of the English edition to prominent book-gatherers.

Few people hav the courage to face the mephitis Americana. That may or may not be the reason why Comstock so completely terrorizes the publishers of this city.

MR. WATTS will lecture before the Friendship Liberal League of Philadelphia on Sunday, April 5th.

A Chance for the Baptists.

There is little doubt that in the matter of converting heathen to Christianity the Baptists can giv any of the other denominations large odds. By recently published statistics it is shown that not only do the Baptists convert more heathen per year than are converted by the united efforts of the Congregationalists, Episcopalians, Methodists, and Presbyterians, but they effect this at a much cheaper rate per heathen. To make this clear, the following tabular statement of the great work is appended:

Denomination	Added During the Year	Average Cost per Convert
Congregationalists	2,371	$248 14
Christian (Campbellite)	365	72 88
Episcopalian	228	592 03
Methodist	2,781	117 91
Presbyterian	3,037	224 91
Total	8,782	203 91
Baptist	11,891	37 05

The Baptists may well point with pride to the above showing. Of course it was to their advantage to wait until returns from heathen districts worked by other denominations were all in, so they could "fix" their own figures to show in the best light. No doubt this charge will be preferred against them by Dr. Buckley, so we will not press it. Thirty-seven dollars and five cents seems a small sum indeed to be paid for an able-bodied heathen, whose muscular tissue has been built up on a persistent diet of roast missionary. But why Baptist money devoted to turning heathen into Christians should be so much more productiv of results than that of other sects is not easily explained. It will hardly be maintained that there is more in common between a heathen and a Baptist than between a heathen and a Methodist. Barring the physical resemblance that the heathen habit of bathing bears to the Baptist rite of immersion, heathenism and Baptistism are widely at variance.

To tell it just as it is, we do not believe that a heathen can be converted to Christianity for $37.05, and to afford them an opportunity of testing the matter, we will make the Baptists an offer. We hav in this office, bowing down to the wood of his case and the stone of the imposing-slab, a full-blooded royal Bengal Heathen. He is of high caste, ranks next to the Brahmans for style, and bears credentials to that effect. He is without religion, neither drinking intoxicants nor smoking or chewing tobacco. He does not swear by heaven above nor by the earth below. Jehovah and Jesus Christ rank in his mind along with the mythical Giascutis and the apocalyptic Boojum Snark. There is but one obstacle to his becoming a Christian, and that is the fact that he is well educated, and has probably in his comparativly brief existence forgotten more than the ordinary minister ever learns. We say this without meaning to impeach the retentivness of his memory. He is conversant with Greek and Latin, and with Sanskrit, Bengalee, and Telegoo, besides writing English of the purest kind. In disposition he has the mildness peculiar to his race, and buckles down to reprint copy or the Spencerian penmanship of Mr. Charles Watts with equal humility. Taken all in all, he is a rare heathen. We could scarcely conceive of a more desirable subject for the proselyting zeal of a missionary.

What we propose to do is to throw open the door of our composing-room and giv the Baptist missionaries a chance at this heathen. If he has a soul that is likely to be d——d, we would by all means prefer that it should be saved. It is a sad sight to see a young pagan of his mental caliber going down the dark valley unprepared and neglecting the means of grace.

The financial arrangements for the test are immaterial, perhaps, but it is well to hav everything done decently and in order. Let the Baptists deposit $37.05 with some responsible person; we will do the same. The heathen may be allowed $3 per day for his time; the missionary, 50 cents. Heathen and money to be found any day at 33 Clinton Place. If by the time the sum of $37.05 has been exhausted the heathen shall hav knocked under and consented to be baptized, the Baptists take the money. If, on the other hand, he still remains the heathen that he is, we take the cash.

We urge our brethren of the Baptist denomination to come forward and prove their claims to converting pagans at $37.05 per head. Our heathen, so to speak, is white unto the harvest, to say nothing of the other compositors who might casually experience a change of heart. Here is a soul for the ministers to save, and we presume, in the words of the immortal Webster Flannagan, that is what they are here for.

Letters from Friends.

ADRIAN, MICH., Jan. 15, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been in hopes that some one of D. M. Bennett's many friends would hav introduced the subject of that book that was talked of at the time the subject of the monument was being considered, containing a brief biography of Mr. Bennett's life and labors in the cause of Liberal thought and human progress, and also to contain some of his most choice sayings and writings, and to hav six or eight blank leaves near the middle of the book, with a border around each leaf, for a family record and other notes that we may want to leave in the book for our children and grandchildren to look at when our bodies lie moldering in the grave with Mr. Bennett's. The suggestion was then made by some of the friends that a book of this description, well gotten up with leather binding, would be a better and more lasting monument to the memory of Mr. Bennett and his labors than that of a stone over his grave, and this, too, was my judgment. While this thought was being considered, some friend made the remark that we could hav both, and to this we took no exception, and so sent on our donation for the monument, and now we hav its picture hanging by our side, with the life-size picture of Mr. Bennett in the same room. And now, as no one has introduced the subject of the book, Mr. Editor, if you can find room in THE TRUTH SEEKER for me, I will be glad to introduce the subject of the book to our friends, and see if we can't hav such a book. I feel that our duties to the cause we espouse, and to ourselvs and families, all demand such a book. I hav now passed my threescore and twelve years, and of course I can't expect to be here a great many years longer; but I want to see a book of this kind before I leave.

On Dec. 17, 1835, my wife and I mutually agreed, in the presence of a few of our friends, without a priest or magistrate of the law meddling with our business, that we, being of full age, and of mental and physical ability to attend to our own business, would now and henceforth assume to ourselvs the relation of husband and wife, from which relation has come to us seven children, all of whom grew up to be men and women, and from these we hav a lot of grandchildren, and now, on Dec. 17th next, will be our golden-wedding day, and possibly our children and grandchildren may nearly all be with us, and I don't want them to hav to open that old book of superstition, that is so full of obscene, vulgar, and immoral readings, in order to see our family record, and the formal marriage of their parents and grandparents, as executed between themselvs. No, Mr. Editor and TRUTH SEEKER friends, this subject of true marriage between the sexes is too sacred to be trifled with by third parties, before a gazing crowd of idle spectators, and then to hav a record made of it in that old book of transcripts, that is literally full of sensualism, blood, and human slaughter. Therefore you may put me down for six copies of this book, at the publisher's price; only hav it gotten up in nice style, with Mr. Bennett's picture in front.

S. D. MOORE.

NEW YORK, Jan. 24, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I ask again your indulgence, and to giv this a place in your paper for an answer to articles from Mr. Sidelinger and Mr. Hill in this date's issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

First, to Mr. Sidelinger. I hav no personal bickering with you or anyone else, but as you came before the public first in this paper to obtrude on its readers the so-called new calendar, a "hobby of the Hub," which counts wrong, a year behind—a fact evident and demonstrable to any having an open, willing mind for the truth—then any one of its readers, has not only a right, but a duty to controvert it. I can hav no personal spite against Mr. Sidelinger, and will not be personal, but persistence in an error or a wrong brings ridicule in order. Yes, Mr. Sidelinger, there is another person, "Antiquary," holding the same views as I, for you to convert. I do not want a personal correspondence. Whatsoever you may privately think and believe is of no concern to me; but when you try to teach and publish, then be sure to be right, or take the risks. I hav been a paying subscriber to the Investigator for twelve years, but as its editor refused articles in answer to Mr. Hill's, then I gave it up, as much as I liked it, for principle's sake. I prize and esteem a paper for its liberality. When in a fair controversy, the editor should allow both sides the same privileges, or none; but to giv to one, especially when manifestly wrong, the first and also the last word, is to my mind an injustice. As long as the press is free and open, I do not fear an error. It will surely be killed and laid open and bare. Now, Mr. Sidelinger, I do not admit that Sunday or any other day is different from a year in any way, than in the length of time. Then you are wrong where you say you agree with me. You do not quote me at all, or do not read correctly, that's all. Look it over again. Further, when you hav a son born in January, 1885, then—now—he is already in his first year. He commences his first year from his birth, and will be one year old at the end of the year, and right thereafter commences his second year. Is this confusing to understand?

We common people commence to count at or from 0, but not with 0, but with 1, and the first minute of the first hour of the first day is the starting-point of the first year, and the one hundredth year belongs to the first century, and not as your friend, Mr. Hill, has it, who claims the year 1600 to the seventeenth century, to the contrary of anybody else, he says, and so he has at the end of 1600 already a year made, when we commenced the year 1601. Can't you see it yet? About the epoch, July, '76, did I not write, "Who wants it? Who claims for it? No one." You write about the enemies it would hav, and prevent its adoption in general. Why, you make me laugh. You seem to me, also, "very young" when you think that we Infidels hav less enemies and more friends than the United States.

Friend Sidelinger, no, I did not know that the National Liberal League had adopted the new calendar from the first day of the year 1600, and wants to count now 285. If it did, it is wrong, all the same, and a year behind.

"To settle the matter," says Mr. Hill, "all that is necessary is for a person to subtract 1600 from to-day's date, 1885, and the result is 285." All very well and good, but between 1600 and 1885, inclusiv, we hav 286 years, and between 1601 and 1885 we hav, inclusiv, 285 years. That is the difference. The Christian era commenced with the year 1, like any other era, or any enumeration, for that matter.

If this does not satisfy Boston's mathematicians, nothing will.

FRED. KOEZLY.

SPOKANE FALLS, W. T., Jan. 12, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed $3, for which please renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for another year. I hav become greatly attached to the paper. I feel as though I could not get along well without it, as it furnishes a large amount of the best mental food I know of. It does me good to get the different opinions and ideas of the many writers whose articles are so often contained in its columns, and none more pleasing to my mind than those of the order of a good, healthy Materialism, like that of Mr. Thomas Winter, who is willing to know many things, but believes in few not demonstrated facts. I like to indulge in some belief, but I can't see that this, the only one universe, was designed by a God or anything in the form of intellect; for how can knowledge go back of no beginning? Intelligence, as I understand it, is with all animated nature, to follow out through one's life such a mode of action as best conforms to the laws of nature. To act otherwise is not wisdom, but wrong action. Good and evil must of necessity grow out of this, our relation to nature's ways.

Robert Ingersoll, when on his Western trip last summer, lectured here to good audiences. Then came the noted Joseph Cook, who pretended to answer some of his arguments; but such chaff, compared with Ingersoll's solid grains of thought! We also had the pleasure of two lectures from Dr. York, who is a good speaker, and far advanced in good, sound thought, yet doesn't take so well with an audience on account of his particular way of delivery. There is no Liberal society here, and a person of Freethought is seldom met—one that will come right out regardless of the jeers of others; in fact, but few hav any thought of their own outside of what they hav been taught by orthodox parents or communities. I wish we could hav Putnam and Watts to lecture here, if they should come this way during the campaign for Freethought, as it might be the means of organizing a League of Liberal workers to help hasten on the cause of humanity to man.

J. B. JOHNSON.

AUBURN, N. Y., Jan. 26, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Ingersoll has come and gone. His eloquence, oratory, and logic hav for the first time been presented to the people of this city.

Notwithstanding the very many unusual attractions offered in the same evening, among which was a united effort of nearly all the evangelical churches combined in carrying on a great exciting revival, using the largest roller-skating rink in the city, and which has been running for four weeks to an excessivly white heat, but not yet been very successful in bringing many lost souls to Jesus, and also regardless of the flying snow and hail, and piercing cold, hundreds of intelligent men and women flocked to hear the greatest living orator of this nineteenth century proclaim his honest and most sacred thoughts against a well organized and long established system of faith which two hundred and fifty millions of souls in Christendom either avowedly or ostensibly profess to believe to be the only true and revealed religion of divine origin given to man. Certainly it seems like sorrowing over the terrible devastations of a sweeping tornado to contemplate the fact that the son of an orthodox Presbyterian clergyman should make his advent into the very heart and fortress of old orthodox Presbyterianism, and in its midst for two hours and a half renounce, repudiate, and disclaim its doctrins and dogmas from top to bottom, from center to circumference. His lecture ("Orthodoxy") given last Wednesday evening, Jan. 21th, to a large audience, was the first one ever given in this city from a purely Materialistic standpoint. I hav long desired that Colonel Ingersoll should make his advent into this terribly priest-ridden community, and in several attempts to see what could be done towards bringing it about, met with, considerable encouragement, but mostly, however, from those who were Liberal only so far as they dared to be, and owing to social and business influences, did not venture to be identified in the movement, but were willing to subscribe generously, so long as their names were not mentioned and known.

This spirit of fearfulness on the part of many being paramount rendered it difficult to arrange for Freethought lectures under any such conditions.

Now, great credit must be given to the genial lessee and manager of the Academy of Music, Mr. E. J. Meatson, wholly under whose management Mr. Ingersoll came, and who, entirely independent of any side issues or influences, took upon himself individually all responsibilities; the result of which great undertaking, as already inferred, proved a grand success. Mr. Meatson well knows there can be no failure as to numbers and financial interests when the name of Robert G. Ingersoll is connected with them. The press of the city has never, to my knowledge, shown the spirit of aggressiv conservativness, notwithstanding the conservativ influence which has been, and still is, so very rampant here. In this regard the secular press of Auburn is really entitled to very much credit in showing perfect fairness to Ingersoll and his lecture, by giving much space in reporting it, and also speaking highly of the colonel editorially. Each paper gave respectivly two, four, and even six columns in reporting the lecture of the great Agnostic, the latter journal giving it almost entirely. Saying nothing of the feeling which may hav existed before the coming of Mr. Ingersoll, he certainly left this city leaving a remarkably good impression of a remarkable man. Mrs. Ingersoll, a pleasant, and cheerful, and commanding lady, accompanied the colonel here, to whom the writer had the honor of being introduced.

Mrs. Griswold and myself had the pleasure of calling on Mr. and Mrs. Ingersoll at the parlors of the Osborne House, kept by Mr. John E. Allen, who has attained a high notoriety as a hotel man.

The colonel at once entered into a very pleasant conversation of about ten minutes, upon matters of theology, of an interesting nature. His ways and conversation are very agreeable indeed, and it seems that even the most fastidious must be captivated by him. He must certainly leave a good impression with all who hav the honor and pleasure of acquainting themselvs with him.

As we were about to take our leave, he said, "Hold on, I'll giv you a pass to the lecture." Said I, "Mr. Ingersoll, we hav tickets for the lecture, bought several days ago." Answering back, he says, "Hav you not got some good friends to whom you could giv them?" And before I thought he could hav written them, he handed me passes for five reserved seats to his lecture; and not being able to use them ourselvs, I gave them to good, deserving friends, who hav since told me that they were really on a higher plane of thought.

Now this is one of the ways the great champion of rationalism is doing much good and causing a mighty revolution within the citadel of human intelligence. His name is immortal, and for all time henceforth it will shine brightly upon the historical pages of the world's advancement.

L. DEWITT GRISWOLD.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Jan. 25, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I noticed in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 17th a letter from C. L. Silverman, of East Portland, Oregon, which ran thus: "If we hav existed before we came to this existence, we will exist after death. If we were a new creation, we shall cease to liv."

In answer to the first, I will endeavor to show that we hav existed before we came to this existence.

The indestructibility of matter leads me to infer that "what is, always was;" or, in other words, the amount of matter constituting the universe has never increased or diminished a single grain. If it has diminished, then matter is destructible. On the other hand, if it has increased, or is increasing, I must attribute it to a supernatural power; for to be constantly receiving matter into our universe, it must come from some place outside of it, or else it is not an addition to the amount of matter already in existence. Therefore, the amount of matter that at present constitutes our universe has always existed; man being part of that matter, and matter once created cannot be destroyed.

The next proposition is, If we were a new creation, we shall cease to be.

Now, I think exactly the opposit, for if we are a new creation (an addition to that which has already been in existence), we must hav come from that unknown place outside of the universe, since the amount of matter could not be increased by the addition of man unless we did. And if such be the case, I can conceive of no other means by which we could come into this world unless by the will of a supernatural being; for natural causes do not extend beyond where matter ceases to exist, from the fact that natural causes, to act, must hav matter to act upon. Also, if we are a new creation, there must be an end to the universe, for the very same reason stated above, viz., that we came from ou side of it.

I am aware that I hav alluded solely to the body, and before going further with the subject, I would like to hear from Mr. Silverman, and from some other of your readers, through the columns of your sensible and valuable paper.

D. M. DEVINE.

MODESTO, CAL., Jan. 18, 285.

MR. EDITOR: From the last number of the THE TRUTH SEEKER, I see that Mr. Geo. Gray, of Lowell, Mass., has ordered his paper stopped, because in it you giv the Spiritualists and the Prohibitionists a fair hearing, just the same as you giv the Anti-Spiritualists and the Anti-Prohibitionists. Now, on both of these questions I happen to be, like him, an anti. Unlike him, however, I wish the Spiritualists and the Prohibitionists, many of whom stand high in the ranks of Liberalism, to enjoy every privilege that I ask for myself. Less than this would render me a non-Liberal; and that to which Mr. Gray objects is, in my eyes, one of the very things that render THE TRUTH SEEKER so eminently excellent I shall not rest, therefore, until I hav sent you at least two new subscribers in the place of the one you hav lost in him. Will not every other true Liberal try to do the same?

Yours truly, JOHN R. KELSO.

FABIUS, N. Y., Jan. 17, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Accept my thanks for your leniency in sending your valuable paper after our subscription expired. At that time I was in the far-off Southwest, Missouri, where the extremes of heat and cold are seldom experienced. In the beautiful city of Carthage I found some firm friends, who believe in and advocate the principles of Freethought.

During my stay at the so-called "godless town of Liberal," I found lots of Freethinkers, both Materialists and Spiritualists, who apparently liv together in peace and harmony. Their village is located in the heart of a beautiful and fertil region, which bids fair to become a central point of trade. I was very favorably impressed with both the country and its inhabitants—so much so, that if I can dispose of my farm at a reasonable price, I shall probably cast my future lot on earth with the good citizens of Liberal, Mo. In point of intellectual wealth and ability Liberal far surpasses any place of her size that I ever saw. Her efforts in the matter of schools and the promotion of a scientific secular education are truly commendable, and reflect much credit on the character of the people. Four or five years ago, an open prairie marked the place of the present site of Liberal, with her six hundred inhabitants. Her natural advantages are many and favorable, such as coal for fuel, and stone and brick for building purposes, and beautiful springs of clear, soft, cold water. With a rich agricultural region, and a railway thoroughfare with a nice depot, Liberal bids fair to soon become a noted business town.

Inclosed I send $5 on my wife's subscription to the faithful old TRUTH SEEKER, founded by my old friend, D. M. Bennett.

I correspond with several newspapers, and always manage to work in some Freethought sentiments, though I hav to frequently sugar-coat the pill, that they may the more readily take the dose. If I can get Freethought into conservativ papers, it reaches others who are not Radical. Carry the war into Africa (in the churches) is the motto of HOMER A. BILLINGS.

SOUTH BOSQUE, TEXAS, Jan. 10, 285.

MR. EDITOR: I feel somewhat ashamed for not sending you your due in this short letter, but I am financially embarrassed, and cannot do anything to help you before June or July. Our last cotton crop was very short in this part. We made good grain crops, but we find no demand for that. The best wheat is a drug on the market at fifty cents per bushel. My shortness was caused by buying more land last fall on installments, and it took all I made to spare, and even more, to pay up. As this is unimportant to you, I will say this: If you will send on THE TRUTH SEEKER until July without pay, I will pay then, upon the honor of a deserter from the ranks of Methodism to Agnosticism. I am talking Liberalism, and loaning my papers and tracts to my orthodox friends, and many are beginning to talk real sensible about faith and superstition, and are giving their more faithful friends trouble, and even some of the wayward are made especial subjects of prayer to God. Some hav got so affected with Infidelity that they actually refuse to talk and tell their religious experiences in the monthly class-meetings. I feel called to preach, and am trying in my humble way to prepare myself to obey that call. The third Sunday in last month I delivered my maiden lecture on the subject of "How I Came to Doubt Christianity and Become an Infidel." I had a very nice little audience, who gave good attention, and I must say I feel flattered at the success I made, as I was requested to giv them another at an early date.

D. F. MARRS.

BURR OAK, MICH., Jan. 26, 285.

MR. EDITOR: In the latter part of December I received a letter from J. E. Remsburg, stating that if a hall could be procured, he would deliver a lecture at Burr Oak on Sat. evening, Jan. 17, '85. As the place has always slumbered in the embrace of orthodoxy and apathy, I was desirous that the inhabitants should, for once, hav an opportunity to hear the truth. I immediately notified Liberals, and the decision was soon reached to hav a lecture. A miserly old chap owns a hall here, which he lets for all sorts of purposes, and as he is said to be a Universalist, it was thought that the hall could be obtained without difficulty. But, when approached, the old fellow said, "No! no Bob Ingersoll men in my hall!" "Nigger minstrels," and such-like, are freely admitted, but the line is drawn at "Ingersollism," as simpletons call everything pertaining to Freethought. There is a rumor about a man who is so stingy that he catches flies in the summer and examins the cracks in their feet to see if they hav been stealing his sugar. Some people hav a suspicion that the old curmudgeon who owns the hall is the guilty party, but as the charge is not fully substantiated by direct testimony, he is entitled to the benefit of the doubt. But the matter was not abandoned at the first rebuff; further effort was made, and soon a better hall was secured, the lecture was advertised, and all arrangements duly made. Then Jehovah got mad and came to the assistance of old Gradgrind and the good Christians of the town. He sent a raging, mighty snowstorm, followed by a bitterly cold wind, which lasted two or three days. Trains were delayed, and all travel suspended on the country roads. The lecture was postponed indefinitly and the wicked Infidels were much disappointed. Let us pray. After prayer Bro. Hookfingers will pass the hat, while we sing, "A charge to keep I hav," etc. The Lord loveth a cheerful giver. Freethought and free speech must be stifled at all hazards. N. G. W.

MILFORD, MASS., Jan. 26, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I was in Boston last week, and called at the office of the Woman's Journal. Lucy Stone asked me if I took the Woman's Journal. No. She wanted to hav me take it, and be in favor of the rights of woman. I had a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 31, 1884, in my pocket, containing an article of mine, "Equal Rights for Woman as Well as Man." I took it out and showed her my name at the end of it. She did not look at the contents, but asked what paper it was in. THE TRUTH SEEKER. She said, "That is a very wicked paper." I said, "That is putting it coolly on me, but it is a seasonably cold day." She then said, "I don't know much about the paper." I said, "That is the way of many people—talking more of what they do not know than of what can be demonstrated. When you find out for a certainty as to its wickedness, let me know, so that I can govern myself accordingly. I took the Woman's Journal, then discarded it. It always taught the lie that the Bible was in favor of woman's rights, yet its devil, or some other 'feller,' always came out ahead." I went from there to a leather store kept by a friend of mine, who depends upon himself for his "daily bread," and told him of the entertainment with Lucy. He wanted to see the article, looked it over, and wanted to buy the paper, or another like it. I told him to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER, which he did. I took the train for Brockton, Mass., a noted shoe city. Such hard times had never been known before. The factories are not doing half their usual amount. As a result, large numbers are out of work. What is the remedy? Holding protracted meetings every night, praying God to rescue the perishing. The daily paper has a heading, "God Help the Poor," and starts a subscription with ten dollars. The scripture says, "Take no thought for the morrow," the tendency being to propagate the poor. Then the scripture has this consolation for them, "Blessed be ye poor." That never appeases hunger. Poverty is the greatest of all curses. When I reached the house of a relativ, his wife was sweltering over the stove cooking griddle-cakes. They had three children, the oldest eight, the youngest four years, sick with lung fever. At supper the husband asked what is called a blessing—"O God, we thank thee for the food provided for us. Supply those that are destitute, for Christ's sake." I would hav said, "Am sorry that the food provided for us was the cause of so much trouble, yet, Annie, I thank you for it." The next day at dinner the girl, eight years old, asked the blessing—"Bless the food provided for us, for Christ's sake." It didn't make beefsteak tender. I told the mother it would hav been better for the child to hav the small-pox, as it would hav had its run, and left her in better health, while this disease always left its victims worse. She said, "I was brought up in that way."

By education we are most misled;
We so believe because we were so bred;
The priest takes up that which the nurse began,
And thus the child imposes on the man.

I stayed a day with her husband's father and mother-in-law, both Methodists, no blessings asked. Dressmaking was the leading industry of the house, and from the number of callers was the one thing needful. That always brings blessings on the table. Read THE TRUTH SEEKER again. She wanted the paper. Could not part with it. Took her money for subscription. Inclosed find address of the two subscribers. In one pocket I had THE TRUTH SEEKER, as useful as any Bible that we ever carried; in another pocket was a passport from the secretary of state, giving me protection abroad, and with it was an "Open Letter to Jesus Christ," whom I heard of, but did not see. That makes a trinity that can be depended on, as they carried me around in safety, as much as God ever does to anyone, and to them be all the praise.

CHARLES C. JOHNSON.

CEDAR DALE, Jan. 19, 285.

MR. EDITOR: On Tuesday evening, January 13th, after a short illness, Brother Richard McKinder, in the fifty-third year of his age, passed away. He was a member of the Secular Society in Sheffield, England, when quite a young man. His faith in Freethought was firm and unshaken while life lasted. "This brave and tender brother in every storm of life was oak and rock, but in the sunshine he was vine and flower. He climbed the hights, and left all superstition far below. He was a worshiper of liberty, a friend of the oppressed. He believed that happiness was the only good, reason the only torch, justice the only worship, humanity the only religion, and love the only priest." He leaves an only daughter to mourn and weep, his wife having passed away two years ago, in the same faith. It can be truly said of them, they were a noble, honest, true-hearted, charitable couple when in life, always and ever ready to assist suffering humanity in time of need. A. M. B.

TURNER'S FALLS, MASS., JAN. 24, 285.

MR. EDITOR: We had Mr. Samuel P. Putnam here for two lectures on a recent Sunday. The first, "Coming Religious Demands," was extremely well received, and his remark that he would turn the costly churches into bread and feed the hungry poor has occasioned a lot of lively discussion. It was the first Infidel lecture ever delivered here, and has helped us very much. Mr. Putnam's genial style has left a good impression of the Infidel. This community is anxious to hear Col. Ingersoll, and I hope we can hav the pleasure and profit of listening to him. I hav a strong desire to go to Altoona, Pa., and will do so if I can arrange business so as to leave.

I wish to say to T. Winter that I am on the same level, solid platform with him, and want to join heart and hand with every Liberal to free and improve the human race.

GEORGE E. HARTLEY.

BABYLON, L. I., Jan. 25, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Standing as I do, your sworn friend and well-wisher, do not understand me to find fault with you, but what I hav to say I wish you to take as a kind suggestion. It is simply this: You are printing a fine, large, expensiv paper. Many of the articles you admit in your columns are too long, too philosophical for the common mind. They are certainly never read but by few. It seems to me that short, commonplace articles, written for the many, can be understood by all; and in order to strengthen our side of the house, we must take the guns of our common enemy and turn them against them. A daily, pictorial sheet, based upon Infidelity, should be sold in New York. It should be tempered so as not to be repulsiv, but highly attractiv. It might be headed, "Among the Stars." But, my dear sir, I am anxious to see progress made by Infidels as the improvements of the age are progressing. If we stand too long, we may hav our fetters tightened instead of loosened. Yours truly, P. H. FOSTER,
(An Infidel of nearly 50 years' standing).

ROCHELLE, ILL., Jan. 26, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: In addition to the arguments presented in my reply to Brother Watson, permit me to say to Brothers Hough and Van Denburgh that they must concede that each physical body as such is virtually in the same condition a hundred years before birth as a hundred years after death. Also that all science postulates the fact that all forms, from man to sun and system, had a beginning, and at some time will end. But the material these forms are composed of never began and never will end, neither did it come from outside of the universe (because there is no such place), but in its infinit aggregation fills and is all the universe, and always will be. It is like a vast kaleidoscope, always assuming countless other forms, old forms vanishing, new forms building up, yet always remaining the same in its grand totality; or like the human family, of which always new members are born, others growing to maturity, while others decline, die, and vanish, yet repeating this process as long as conditions, favorable to human life, exist upon our globe, when it also will die, resolve itself again into nebulæ or cloud-dust, and again, perhaps, mingle with another globe, or, perchance, after a few millions of years, undergo a new evolution into a world again favorable to a human race. But while our earth may thus evolute back and die, other worlds, in countless numbers, are cooling off, and upon them, finally, other races, perhaps more perfect than we, shall enjoy existence perhaps in a higher degree than we do now. And suns and systems are subject to this same eternal law. And this rise and decline of worlds, and suns, and systems, has gone on forever and ever in the beginningless past, and will continue to go on and on forever. And while this change is going on here in the small circle of space we now monopolize, it goes on and on precisely the same in the infinit expanse of space radiating in infinit number of infinitly extended imaginary lines from our world as a center on and on, up and down, to the right and left, east and west, north and south, on and on forever and ever. No beginning to space—no end. No beginning to the number of worlds, suns, and systems filling it. No outside, no center, no circumference—all is but an infinit repetition of the phenomenon as we behold it within our range of telescopes, and around us here and now!

Therefore, Brother Hough, you see I do not believe in the annihilation of matter; no, indeed! not of one particle; but I do insist that the perpetuity of nature is dependent upon the continuous annihilation of every form or being, because, if the formation of special forms—immortal and indestructible—had been going on during all the beginningless eternity of the past, without the materials of which they were composed going back to the great reservoir of nature from which they were originally taken, to enable the formation process to continue forever, all would long—even an eternity—ago already hav assumed these special forms, and all now be these special forms and—no universe!

The fact is self-evident, then, that change being the order of nature now, change always has been and always will be; and the more vital fact that this eternal change implies, yes, necessitates—death!

Again, you class matter, life, and mind alike, but which is a great mistake. While all matter—each particle—has, no doubt, "always been in some form," and is eternal, yet each individual mind and life exists but once. The latter hav no existence per se and are only functions of individual living, but mortal, organism, which, when this organism has vanished, must vanish also.

If you desire to fortify your position you should not illustrate by any product of nature, such as the root, stem, and leaf of the flower, as all alike prove emphatically that all forms must end. Pluck the flower and it withers as the body decays when laid in its coffin; and while the seed of this flower may produce another flower after its death, so our children may liv after us.

Some day I intend to write a letter for our good paper entitled, "Strange Things That Are Not Strange," to illustrate that the strange experiences of your life are not so strange as you assume, but more especially to further illustrate what I so emphatically insist upon, and that is that the strangest thing in the universe, the strangest thing conceivable, is not one-ten-thousand-millionth part as strange as the very startling assumption that when a man is dead he still livs!

OTTO WETTSTEIN.

MONTEZUMA, N. Y., Feb. 1, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, which please mail as directed. This subscriber remarks in a jocular way that if God prospers him, in the future he will remit more for truth. Friday morning about one o'clock my residence and contents were wholly consumed by fire. Thus the loss of my darling babe is so soon followed by that of my home. Christians say the calamity is a special dispensation of providence—a just, merciful, loving, heavenly father—all because my reason, honestly followed, compels me to condemn a book the teaching of which, if practiced to the letter, would consign us all to infamy. These Christians forget that this imaginary fiend, this incubus of the clouds, struck over the shoulder of one of his cringing worshipers. Thus his usual course of procedure is fully manifested. Remsburg and Reynolds will remember (as well as your readers) that the day they arrived here (January 8th) the adjoining residence took fire, and by energetic efforts of citizens the flames was extinguished, and mainly by the assistance of the "hideous" Remsburg. Three weeks from that day (January 28th) exactly, the same residence, at eight P.M.—and while the wife of the owner was at prayer-meeting—again took fire, and the flames were again subdued; and at 12:30, the same night, the flames for the third time leaped furiously into the air with such persistence that nothing could stay them. The husband of the wife also was, a few years ago, a fervent worshiper and exhorter, and on the night of the fire was heard to remark, "that he had canned his religion and stowed it in the house." This, no doubt, accounts for the fire. The religion being of such a "red-hot" kind, the cans melted and it consmed all before it. The Baptist church also took fire, and some of the Christian bystanders remarked that "it was because the trustees permitted the funeral services, by the Infidel Reynolds, to be conducted there, and it was an exhibition of God's consuming anger;" while another was heard to say, "God won't suffer his church to burn. He will take good care of it"—but if the flames had not been extinguished by a free "sprinkling" and "outpouring" of water, that, too, would hav been a heap of ruins. The house where the fire originated was mortgaged, and I presume that God so loved his friend of "canned religion" fame, he would (though having no bank account of his own) pay off the mortgage by causing the insurance company to draw its checks for the amount and he would giv them credit in his defunct and collapsed banking-house. Thus we discover the manifold dispensations of this much-worshiped vagary in the skies. The Sabbath before the fire a Christian (?) called at my house and requested the privilege of holding a prayer-meeting on the following Sabbath for the purpose of converting me. Now, my humanity would and could only say yes, but suddenly up starts their God, and before the Sabbath day arrives pours out his vials of wrath and fire, and, as with Sodom and Gomorrah, utterly destroys my habitation, and frustrates the object of one who was laboring for the salvation of souls. Away with such nonsense for me. Oh, if men and women would only break the shackles of superstition that bind them, how free and happy they would be!

I inclose you twenty-five cents for your ALMANAC, which please mail to me. EDWARD ROSS.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Says He.

"Whatever the weather may be," says he—
"Whatever the weather may be—
It's plaze if ye will, an' I'll say me say,
Supposin' to-day was the wintriest day,
Wud the weather be changin' because ye cried,
Or the snow be grass were ye crucified?
The best is to make your own summer," says he,
"Whatever the weather may be," says he,
"Whatever the weather may be!

"Whatever the weather may be," says he—
"Whatever the weather may be,
It's the songs ye sing an' the smiles ye wear
That's a-makin the sun shine everywhere;
An' the world of gloom is a world of glee,
Wid the bird in the bush an' the bud in the tree,
Whatever the weather may be," says he—
"Whatever the weather may be!

"Whatever the weather may be," says he—
"Whatever the weather may be,
Ye can bring the spring, wid it's green an' gold,
An' the grass in the grove where the snow lies cold
An' ye'll warm your back, with a smilin' face,
As ye sit at your heart like an old fireplace,
Whatever the weather may be," says he—
"Whatever the weather may be!"

Mother's Birthday.

Our mother's forty-six years old!
You'd never think it, would you?
With eyes so bright, and hair so brown,
And step so light, how could you?

Her hands, that look so small and frail—
Such skilful hands are seldom seen—
Such brave, unfaltering, loving hands;
No dearer hands in the world, I ween.

Eyes so soft, so brown, so bright—
Eyes where softest shadows bide.
Laughter-lit, or soft, or sad,
Our mother's eyes are our secret pride,

Lips, whose rose-tint does not fade—
Lips we love more than she knows—
Lips whose bursts of heart-felt song,
Music make where'er she goes.

Heart so loving, brave, and true—
Best heart ever mother had—
Heart that loves her children well,
Though oft they've made that kind heart sad.

Mother, what offering shall we bring,
As a birthday gift to thee?
Methinks thy heart would say, "Thy love,
Much as thy heart can hold, for me."

We are wayward, wilful, fretful,
To the one we most do love.
Yet, mother, know thy children prize
Thy love all other things above.

So, as a birthday gift we bring—
Though it always was, and will be, thine—
Thy children's deepest, truest love—
This rhyme a token and a sign.

Irwin, Ia. M. LOUISE BAKER.

Absent-Mindedness.

To prove that the human mind is dual in character, we hav only to observe the way in which some persons with large concentrativness of thought will act at times.

I had a case at law upon a time, where a man tried to compel me to do work not in the contract, and, having engaged an attorney, he requested me to call at his office on the following morning at precisely nine o'clock to consult as to best method of attack. Promptly to time I entered his ofice, and found him in what appeared a deep train of thought. I bade him good-morning and took a seat near the stove, receiving no reply or recognition whatever. I waited and watched him for some time. At last he mechanically pulled out his watch and looked at it, his lips moving all the while as if making a speech. He replaced his watch, put on his overcoat, took up his hat, and started out of the office toward the courthouse, leaving the door open as if I was to follow. As he got upon the pavement he began to use his hands quite freely, and I made up my mind to follow him. I fancied I was insulted by his indifference, and I said, "My man, if you think I am going to dance attendance to you again, you are mistaken; you can keep the fee, but you shall hear from me in a way you will not like, when I get to my pen and inkstand;" and I was beginning to hurl some pretty hard thoughts after him as he strode along before me. All of a sudden he turned abruptly about, and came dashing along toward his office, and, meeting me, he extended his hand and enquired, "Hav you been to my office? I was just now so absorbed in an argument I hav to make in a case to-day that I actually walked away from one of my clients, and left the office door wide open. I saw some one enter, but I could not stop. I was just in the essence of the case, and I had to finish it. I hav it all planned out now, and I hav it all clear as day." "Well," said I, "I hav just been there, and I wondered very much to see myself treated with so much indifference. I was at a loss what to make of it." At this he set up a good-natured laugh, and said, "Come back, and I'll tell you something." After we got back to the office and were cosily seated, he told me the following story."

"I went to the city of Washington, some years ago, to attend to a very perplexing case, which involved some very delicate questions and exceptions. After I was ready to start home, while awaiting the evening train in a hotel sitting-room near the depot, I was going over the points and arguments in a sort of retrospectiv way, and at last while at one of the most interesting points, a news-boy came, and, poking his paper almost into my face, he said, 'Buy a paper!' At this I almost lost the thread of my subject, but by great effort I caught it up, and went on. When I got fairly under way again, and was intensely engaged, the little fellow made another effort, and this time, by pushing his paper under my nose, he actually broke the spell and scattered my subject to the four winds. It annoyed me so that I impulsivly brushed his paper aside and exclaimed, somewhat in anger, 'Oh! Go away!'

"But as I did so I caught sight of his bare feet and scant clothing, and the fact that he had but a single paper to dispose of. This discovery set me to thinking of him, and I was ashamed of my conduct toward the lad, he looked so crestfallen; but, while I was trying to invent some excuse to aid me in apologizing for my abrupt treatment, there entered a little band of musicians, two small boys and a beautiful girl about ten years old. They began to play and then sang, and did it extremely well. The little newsboy stood in a corner, and looked upon the neat little singer in a sorrowful way. After singing two songs she passed around the tambourine and collected some coins from several, to which I also contributed. When I did so my little newsboy looked so hard at me, and was so affected by the music, and probably his own poor success and bare feet, that I saw the tears trickling down his chubby cheeks, and the picture altogether was a sad thing to behold. The boy seemed to be so astonished at his disappointment in reading my face which he no doubt took to be much better. I could hold out no longer, and beckoning him to approach me, I said, 'Come here my little man, I want to talk to you.' My kind words assured him, and he came to me in a timid sort of way. I said, 'I suppose you think me a hard-hearted man to treat you in so rough a manner, but I was annoyed because you scattered all my thoughts, but, since I find you are such a nice little fellow, I must ask your pardon. What do you sell your paper for?'

"'Fi-i-ive cents,' said he.

"'How many do you sell in a day?'

"'I could sell a good many if I had the money to buy them, but I only can buy about twenty-five, and I make one-half, but sometimes I can't sell them, and then I make only a little, and the wind blowed two of my papers away and tore them. I just made ten cents for all day.'

"'Well, that is too bad, and as I see you are an honest lad, I wan't to make you feel as good as I can for the way I treated you. So now I will buy your paper, and here is a silver dollar. Take this and buy all you think you can sell, and lay aside one half the money each day until you can get a good pair of shoes. The weather will soon be too cold, and you will want some warm clothing besides.'"

"He took the dollar and looked it over and over, and pinched it as tightly as he could. The bell soon sounded the train, and we had to part. The little fellow ran to his home, and I took the train. I never enjoyed reading a paper as I did the one which cost me a dollar. This is my apology to you, so now to business." J. R. P.

MORAL.—Our greatest disappointments in life often turn out to be our greatest successes. This is the moral to be drawn to interest beginners in life, and we must feel our disappointments keenly to get their full benefit. P.

Correspondence.

BERHAMPUR, BENGAL, INDIA, Jan. 4, 1885.

MY DEAR FRIEND SUSAN H. WIXON: I am very happy in reading your "Apples of Gold." It is a very instructiv and interesting book.

We reside at Berhampur. Here is a collegiate school in which I am a student of the third class. I am aged fifteen years.

We do not believe in spirits, ghosts, and witches, as most of the people do in this country, nor do we worship idols. But all of them are ignorant and superstitious.

The people of this country are divided into different castes, but we do not care for caste distinctions.

I shall be glad if you will write to me occasionally.

It is all right with us. Hoping that this will find you in good health and vigor, I remain

Truly and sincerely yours,

NARENDRANATH BASU.

[We welcome our oriental friend to the Corner, and we think he is a bright scholar to be so far advanced at fifteen. We shall always be pleased to hear from him.—ED. C. C.]

A Wonderful Dog.

Mr. A. C. Collins, of Hartford, is the owner of a dog which for intelligence has no superior. The animal is a thoroughbred pointer, and answers to the name of Fritz. Mr. Collins received him when he was still a little puppy, and at a time when a series of "Training and Breaking" were being published in the Forest and Stream. Following out the instructions embodied in the articles, Mr. Collins has by patient work so far perfected his dog in tricks that the animal seems to be endowed with human intelligence. At the word of command Fritz will leap over his owner's arm, stretch himself, yawn, sneeze, walk on three legs, hunt for fleas in a handkerchief, kiss his owner's hand, remove his hat, put his two forward paws in the seat of a chair and pretend to pray, get into the chair and assume the same attitude, get down out of the chair backward, beg for meat, stop chewing suddenly, lie on his left or right side, pretend to be dead, tell his age by means of cards and in the same way add and subtract, pick up the king of spades, diamonds, hearts, and clubs, and the jack, queen, and aces of the same suits, and do numerous other tricks to the number of forty-five. In the three years he has had him Mr. Collins has never struck Fritz a blow to make him do any of his tricks. In the field the animal is equally intelligent, retrieving birds at dictation with surprising celerity.—Hartford Post.

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR

Parallels in Other Religions

Being a Comparison of the Old and New estament Myths and Miracles with those of heathen nations of Antiquity, Considering also their Origin and Meaning. With numerous illustrations.

The object of the work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning.

"It has long been acknowledged by the most eminent biblical students that the Hebrew scripture contain a large mythical element; but, so far as we know, the present is the first complete and scholarly atttempt to trace these myths to their source, and ascertain their original signification."—Boston Courier.

"Never before has there been given a volume to the reading world that shows the research for the origin of these myths as does this one just published by J. W. Bouton, of New York."—Boston Times.

"It is unquestionably true that the results of a rationalistic study of the Christian scriptures are nowhere else so accessible as they are now made in the work before us.—N. Y. Sun.

Poetry.

Growing Old.

I saw a sweet, cherubic child,
All mirthful, full of glee;
How wistfully it pleasant smiled,
And raised its hands to me!
I took it from its mother's arms,
Within my own to fold;
I sighed to think, with all its charms,
This child is growing old!

The years rolled on; the child it grew
To be a maiden fair;
From nature inspiration drew,
And fragrance from the air.
Her mind expanded with "the love
Of riches" yet untold:
Beloved as few had been before;
But—she was growing old!

We're children of the yesterdays.
This boon of life—why given?
Unless it be to shape our ways,
To make this life a heaven?
To free this life from envious strife
Is better far than gold.
If we liv thus here, we need not fear,
Though we are growing old.

Yes, age is coming on apace,
O'ertakes us helpless creatures,
Imparts to us the careworn face,
The furrowed brow and features.
But those who make a heaven of life,
Who love truth more than gold,
Strangers to discord, greed, and strife,
Rejoice while growing old.

No "dread hereafter" makes them sad,
They dwell in sunshine pleasant;
Such hav their heaven, hence are glad—
Their time and heaven are present.
But those who aim for greed and gain.
And barter truth for gold,
Who lucre gain with toil and pain,
Despair when growing old.

Thus toil and strife make human life
A wilderness of sorrow.
Men toil for greed, more than they need,
Then watch for more to-morrow.
But the grand and wise will duly prize
What nature doth unfold,
And their last days are filled with praise,
While they are growing old.

Who can perceive what to believe,
To dissipate this sorrow,
Or be without a single doubt
Pertaining to to-morrow?
Alas, 'tis so!—we seldom know
The truth by what we're told.
Forced to believe, some sigh and grieve,
While they are growing old.

We're born to liv—to liv for what?
Who knows? Is there a man, sir,
That knows about our future lot?
If not, will Reason answer?
"We liv to love, and to progress,
Our faculties unfold,
Make evil less, and mankind bless,
Then drop to sleep when old."

Pompey, N. Y. HOMER A. BILLINGS.

Stray Scraps.

"Roller-skating, like many another craze, has begun the career of decline and fall."

No wonder; the ministers are down on it.

"The Toronto Presbytery has voted, 27 to 12, that a man may lawfully marry his deceased wife's sister."

May a woman lawfully marry her deceased husband's brother?

"A rich old lady who went to hear Moody in Washington has provided in her will that $10,000 shall be given him upon her death."

Hope Evangelist Moody will die before the old lady goes up where the woodbine twineth!

"Henry George lately has given expression to the following selfish creed: 'Charity is all very well in its way, but God has not brought men into the world so that they might be charitable.'"

God has not "brought men into the world;" all men were brought into the world by women.

"The rector of a certain London parish has not been seen within the limits of the parish within seven years. His income from the parish is $5,325 a year, while his duties are delegated to a curate at a salary of $700 a year."

Quite a monopoly on soul-saving! The poor curate ought to rebel. Well, suppose he did, there are others who would perform the duties at a still lower price; and yet God calls all these fellows into the ministry, because he has no better methods of soul-saving.

As bona fide answers to questions set in recent examinations, the English Journal of Education prints the following:

"Zacharias and Elizabeth had a son named John. When he grew older he had his head cut off to please a young lady."

False; it was to please the young lady's mother that John the Baptist was beheaded (see Matt. xiv). Why will teachers be so careless in expounding God's holy word to the young?

"A lady sends us the following: 'A beautiful thought came from my little boy of eight years this evening. We were watching our lovely sunset, and afterward the stars made their appearance, one by one, until there were a myriad of bright, twinkling orbs. He said, "Mamma, don't you suppose that God has bored lots of holes in the sky so that we can just see how beautiful heaven is on the other side; and don't you guess that it is the angels floating by them that makes them look as though they were winking?"'"

"Beautiful thought," indeed! How could the lady call it a beautiful thought when she knew it was utterly false? And yet the lady would report it, a popular daily would publish it, and every "mamma" who read it would strive to make her little boy just as piously smart by teaching him lies which would culminate in making him ask heavenly questions about holes in the sky and angels winking through them, in defiance of all known laws of astronomy. Religious bigots call such trash "beautiful," and will not permit Infidels to such lies to testify in earthly courts of justice.

THE HORRIBLE RESULT OF A SUPERSTITION.
From the Dublin Times.

At the Clonmel Petty Sessions on Saturday, two women, named Rourke and Cummins, were prosecuted for having on the 22d of April burnt a child three years old, named John Dillon, by placing him naked on a hot shovel. The act was the result of gross superstition on their part, the two women alleging that he was an old man left by the fairies as a substitute for a real child they had taken from its mother. The charge was proved against Rourke, and she was sentenced to a week's imprisonment, the mayor being of opinion that as she had been in custody since the occurrence, the addition of a week's imprisonment would satisfy the demands of justice.

They ought not to hav imprisoned her at all, but dubbed her "Faithful Rourke," in accordance with God's "Faithful Abraham," since she was true to her superstition, as Faithful Abraham was to his. Such things will always occur while children and adults are taught fairy tales, giant stories, witchcraft, and legends inside of the Bible or outside. But had an Infidel, Materialist, or Spiritualist sacrificed a child in a similar manner, no one week's imprisonment would hav sufficed, but a verdict—the result of a denial of God and blasphemous perversion of his holy word—rendered, and imprisonment for life as a warning against heresy, Infidelity, sorcery, etc, etc.

CHRISTIANITY A REWARD FOR CRIME. By O. B. Whitford, M.D. Price, 10 cents; $1.00 per dozen. Published by THE TRUTH SEEKER.

One more good, eye-opening little book is ready to do good work for Liberalism and happiness.

"Christianity a Reward for Crime" is a neat little pamphlet, and is full of interesting and instructiv matter. It fully proves that "Heaven is a Christian bait for crime, and hell a scarecrow for idiots."

It shows that where there is the most real Christian religion, there is the most guilt, crime, and misery. It proves Christianity to be the world's greatest enemy—that it is a plea for every wrong, evil, or crime, in the calendar.

Mr. Whitford tells many very interesting anecdotes showing the utter worthlessness of religion or of gods in the hour of trouble, trial, and affliction.

As I see the M.D. appended to his name, and then think of the long list of names upon my file of correspondents' addresses, I wonder if all our best physicians are skeptics and radicals. Can it be that, having dissected human beings and found no soul, having stood by the death-beds of human beings and seen no evidence that the dead live again, they naturally take up the idea that "death ends all?"

Be this as it may, I know I should hav more confidence in a doctor who did his best to cure me of disease, than in one who believed life and death were in the hands of some great fetich.

I hope friend Whitford's book will meet with a ready sale, and find a widespread circulation, thereby doing good work for truth and humanity.—ELMINA D. SLENKER.

Of the same pamphlet the Maquoketa Record says: "This is a well-gotten up, thirty-page pamphlet. The argument is that the great sinners of the world hav been Christians, that Christianity has a kind of bulldozing plan of compelling respect from the people who hav no confidence whatever in its virtues. The pamphlet thoroughly hauls the Bible over the coals. It says:

"'There are at the present time 81,717 clergymen and 17,267.878 church communicants in the United States. Added, we find 17,349,595 people belonging to the various Christian churches. The population of the United States is 55,000,000, one-half of whom (27,500,000) we must confess are adults, from which we subtract the number of clergymen and communicants, and we find a majority of 10,150,405 non-communicants, or Liberals. Now, what do we mean, allowing such a minority of Bible-bangers and their dupes to control our schools, politics, and suppress our thoughts? We hav the brains, but a very few the courage, to tell the Christians their death-bed forgivness of sins in the twinkling of an eye is a reward for crime, and their theory of hell, food for insanity. I hav witnessed the hanging of fifty men in Montana since 1864, for murder and other heinous crimes, who were, without an exception, Christians, who died with the priest or minister (when available) on the scaffold by their side, praying them into heaven, while their victims were writhing in the orthodox hell because their murderers gave them no time for prayers. At present there are in the Montana asylum 84, all Christians, and as many in the penitentiary, all Christians. So it is all over the land. In view of these facts, and considering there are a majority of over 10,000,000 Liberals or non-believers in the Christian religion in the United States, and scarcely one to be found expiating a crime upon the gallows, serving a term in the penitentiary, or wearing the chain of the insane cell, we claim that the Christian faith is the nucleus of crimes.'"

WAIFS AND WANDERINGS. A novel. By Samuel P. Putnam. The Truth Seeker Company, Publishers. Pages 192. Price, cloth, $1.00; paper, 50 cents.

Mr. Putnam is getting to be one of the most popular writers in the Freethought ranks, and this last novel of his is one of his best. In the space we hav to spare we think we can giv the reader the best idea of the book by giving the titles to each of the thirty-three chapters. They are as follows: Cupples, The Rev. George Adolphus Hapgood, Mrs. Hiram Binney, Dr. Dobson, Billy Stubbs, The Poorhouse, Pater Familias, Baby Bye, Sheriff M'Guffum, The Mystery Darkens, Change of Base, Getting Ready, Over the River, The Enemy's Country, The Devil Himself, Harry, Columbus, A Night's Journey, Off, The First Shot, A New Turn, The Law and not the Gospel, To the Front, The Boy and the Man, Father and Son, Masks and Faces, A Big Haul, Fairyland, Andersonville, Golden Silence, Pride and Love, The Court Room, The Law and the Gospel. The following quotation will giv the reader some idea of Mr. Putnam's graphic style: "Suddenly, on the broad brow of a precipitous hill, where rocks towering hundreds of feet high seemed mingled in abysmal conflict, the vast scene opened before them like a panorama, glittering with the awful magnificence of war. For miles and miles the landscape stretched before the eyes; how beautiful when summer's face was over it, shining with wood, and stream, and fair fields, stretching away to the luminous horizon like a dream of glory!—but now it was lurid with the flames of a mighty conflict. Hundreds of thousands of soldiers were meeting in strife. Forth from the wooded hills belched volumes of smoke, rolling, and mingling, and enshrouding the armies in gloom. Amid the great rifts were seen the wild dash of cavalry, the steady advance and tumultuous meeting of bayonets; troops plunging forward and then receding; flames bursting in one long line or flashing from a thousand quivering points, as if the very earth itself was opening and pouring forth its fires. The ghastly sun seemed amazed at the indescribable confusion, while mists gathered here and there, and poured a tender baptism upon the bloody fields."—Freethinkers' Magazine.

BIBLE MORALS. Twenty Crimes and Vices Sanctioned by Scripture. By John E. Remsburg. Published by The Truth Seeker Company. Price 25 cents.

Like all of Mr. Remsburg's writings and lectures, this pamphlet is full of facts and statistics worthy of consideration. When John E. Remsburg undertakes to prove any position he assumes, he does it most thoroughly. If he had been a lawyer he would not hav rested his case until all the evidence bearing on the case was presented. Take for instance his lecture on the "Sabbath," it is the most thorough discussion of the subject we hav ever read also; the same may be said of his "False Claims of the Church." We find that he has been equally as industrious in presenting proofs in this work to show that the Bible is an immoral work. We will quote only the last verse of "Bible Morals:" "Accepting the Bible, not for what it has been claimed to be, the word of God, but for what it is, the work of man, I can excuse in a degree the crude ideas of right and wrong, and the laxity of morals that prevailed among the people whose history it records. The age in which they lived, the circumstances that surrounded them, must palliate, to some extent, their deeds and theories. But it is humiliating to think in these better times, illuminated by the light of a glorious civilization, there are those who spurn the robes of virtue that Reason in the loom of grave Experience has woven, and who from the dark and musty closets of the past drag forth for use the soiled and blood-stained garments that barbarians wore."—Freethinkers' Magazine.

THE STORY HOUR. New York. Published by The Truth Seeker Company, 33 Clinton Place. For Children and Youth. By Susan H. Wixon, author of "Apples of Gold," "All in a Lifetime," etc. With nearly one hundred illustrations.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the children's hour."
—Longfellow.

Such is the title-page of a charming volume that has recently fallen into our hands to notice. It is an octavo, of two hundred and twenty-two pages, bound with a beautifully illuminated cover. The following is the table of contents:

Lazy Dick, or, the Life of a Dog; An Angel Unawares; May; Ten Little Waiting-Maids; The Doctor's Horse; True Politeness; A Bumble-Bee's Thanksgiving; Grandfather's Pocket-book; Meddlesome Molly; A Sad Mistake; Inside an Engin House; Our Children; Cressbrook Cottage; Ezekiel's Silver Spoon; Odds and Ends; A New Year's Story; Miss Brown's Valentine; What Stephen's Owl was Stuffed With; John; Neighbor Brightside; Miss Marie Gold's Party; Cousin John's Philosophy, or, It Might Have Been Worse; Jenny's Question; Katy's Answer; Alone in an Unfurnished House; Blackey; Breaking the Meeting; Our Susie; A Funny Fellow, or, How He Was Cured of Practical Joking; What the Ferns Said; Dot; A Wedge of Gold; Her Birthday; Post-Office Jack; Aunt Avis; I Can, Because I Will.

Every story is replete with good suggestions and moral teaching; entirely free from any shadow of superstition, and calculated not only to amuse and entertain, but to instruct. Our little boy feels as though a fortune had fallen into his hands. He is enthusiastic over the stories, and the illustrations afford him a ceaseless fund of enjoyment.—Maquoketa Record.

"The Story Hour," by Miss Susan H. Wixon, is a timely and valuable addition to Liberal literature for children and youth. It is elaborately illustrated, and reflects great credit upon The Truth Seeker Company as publishers. We need this class of literature, and hail with delight this excellent contribution. It is bound in illuminated covers, and is worthy of morocco and gilt. 224 pp. Price, $1.25.—Light for Thinkers.

THE STORY HOUR.—Gladly and gratefully we welcome the first pictured story-book written for the young from a Liberal standpoint. Susie Wixon's "Story Hour" fills a long-felt want in youthful literature, and I trust it will find a home in every family that believes in good, healthful, rational reading for the children. It is not only an interesting, moral, and instructiv volume, but it is a beautifully beautiful book.

The old bears on the cover are perfect pictures of happy contentment. Even the claws do not look one bit savage, and the little cubs are so playful that one longs to cuddle them up in one's arms as they would a pet kitten.

The cats, dogs, birds, and even frogs look cute and cunning, while the children, with their plays and playthings, are perfectly charming. Every child or young person who comes here seizes the book at once and longs to appropriate it as personal property, and my little grandchild will listen for hours to our rendition of its pretty and enticing engravings. If dear little Susie were alive how she would appreciate the book! What a delightful story one can tell about the little boy who is filling papa's hat with water so as to sail his toy boat in it!

It is one of the most perfect books of the kind I ever saw. Old and young will appreciate it; and every story in it will convey a good moral, and imprint upon the heart happy and healthful impulses.

I hope everyone who has children will buy it, and those who are not thus blest will secure it for some neighbor's child, or keep it on the center-table for the amusement of young people who visit them. I predict for "The Story Hour" a ready sale and a wide-spread circulation. ELMINA.

CONSULTING ROOMS,

Something for Invalids to read and study over.—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treament. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

Ah! but now is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would not submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we hav treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all form of chronic invalidism.

ALL in a LIFETIME,

A ROMANCE.

BY MISS SUSAN H. WIXON.

"The great charm of this novel is its absolute fidelity to nature. Its personages are those one meets with in common life, and are portrayed with a vividness and perspicuity I was scarcely prepared to expect to find, in such a marked degree, even from so gifted a pen as that of Miss Wixon, whose brilliant and lucid style is familiar to most readers in the Freethought ranks. . . . But what pleased me most in this charming story was the unflinching honesty with which its author holds up to the derision of the world the rottenness of average ministerial character, particularly that of revivalist type. I hav not space here to treat, in detail, of the characters of this truly absorbing novel. Suffice it to say that it is safe to predict that anyone who reads its first chapters will be loth to lay it down till the denouement is reached. Miss Wixon has long been doing a noble work in educating our children into the ranks of true Liberalism, thereby robbing the church of hundreds of those who, in after years, might hav become its willing dupes and servil tools, and she certainly deserves the generous and substantial recognition of all Freethinkers. Let everyone send for a copy of 'All in a Lifetime.' It will yield a liberal reward for the outlay.

STATUETTE OF THOMAS PAINE.

This Statuette of the author-hero is a fac simile of the model of Prof. Richards for the monument proposed to be erected in Lincoln Park. It is admitted to be a fine work of art, and is the only correct outline of Thomas Paine's head and face in existence, being executed from a mask taken at the time of his death, and sent, with other effects, to a friend in France, from whence Prof. Richards procured it for his design.

Size 20x16 inches, weight 35 lbs.; finished in the same style as Rogers's groups.

Price reduced from $14.00 to $10.00. Sole agent, E. A. STEVENS, 480 W. Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS

is a regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful as his practice will prove. He has for twenty years treated exclusivly all diseases of the Sexual Organs, in the cures of which he stands preeminent. SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in maturer years, causing night emissions by dreams, loss of sexual power, rendering marriage improper and unhappy, etc., are cured permanently by an outside application in sixty days. NO STOMACH MEDICIN USED. It is one of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries, which is entirely unknown to the medical profession. Send five 2-cent stamps for his "Private Counselor," giving full information. Address Dr. R. P. Fellows, Vineland, N. J., and say where you saw this advertisment.

From the Ironclad Age.

"Dr. Fellows is an outspoken Infidel, therefore no cheat or humbug. The Freethinkers of the land should giv the doctor their patronage." 1y8

Gems of Thought.

THE condition of the world is changed by each individual changing a little. If each person living would place a single stone on a pyramid or monument a vast pile would be raised. So if every person will add but a little to the monument of good deeds, a great accession will be made—a pyramid of immense size.—D. M. Bennett.

CONSEQUENCES determin the quality of an action. If consequences are good, so is the action. If actions had no consequences, they would be neither good nor bad. Man did not get his knowledge of the consequences of actions from God, but from experience and reason. If man can, by actual experiment, discover the right and wrong of actions, is it not utterly illogical to declare that they who do not believe in God can hav no standard of right and wrong? Consequences are the standard by which actions are judged. They are the children that testify as to the real character of their parents. God or no God, larceny is the enemy of industry—industry is the mother of prosperity—prosperity is a good, and, therefore, larceny is an evil. God or no God, murder is a crime. There has always been a law against larceny, because the laborer wishes to enjoy the fruit of his toil. As long as men object to being killed, murder will be illegal.—R. G. Ingersoll in the Christian Religion.

AN old farm-house, with pastures wide,
Sweet with flowers on every side;
A restless lad who looks from out
The porch, with woodbine twined about,
Wishes a thought from in his heart:
Oh, if I only could depart
From this dull place the world to see,
Ah me! how happy I would be!

Amid the city's ceaseless din,
A man who round the world has been,
Who, mid the tumult and the throng,
Is thinking, wishing all day long:
Oh, could I only tread once more
The field path to the farm-house door;
The old green meadows could I see,
Ah me! how happy would I be.—Anon.

YOU know perfectly well that if the world were not governed by the laws of cause and effect, there would be no possibility of study, there would be no possibility of organizing sciences. You could never know anything. Suppose that I could not count on the properties of iron remaining what they are, what would be the use of building an iron bridge? Next week, it might become wood or some brittle metal and utterly fail to meet the calls I should make upon it. So in every department. The world would be insane; it would be one wild chaos of chance and disorder, unless the law of cause and effect held everywhere. I believe it holds good in human nature as well as everywhere else. This is the scientific doctrin of necessity.—M. J. Savage.

MEN are accustomed to say that there is no use arguing about free will, for it is a doctrin of common sense; every man knows he is free. But we know also that common sense has been a great many times mistaken in the history of this world. Common sense—what does it mean? It means simply that stock of intelligence which has become portable in the crowd and which can be passed from hand to hand like current coin. It means the stock of common opinions that are are held by the majority. And many a time, as Huxley has said, common sense is only another name for common ignorance. It needs to be supplemented, now and again, by a little sense that is not so common. Common sense teaches us, even to-day, that the world is flat. It taught that for thousands of years, and it took a great while to argue into the common sense of the crowd the belief which is now established beyond question.—Ibid.

THE author of a great reformation is almost always unpopular in his own age. He generally passes his life in disquiet and danger. It is, therefore, for the interest of the human race that the memory of such men should be held in reverence, and that they should be supported against the scorn and hatred of their contemporaries by the hope of leaving a great and imperishable name. To go on the forlorn hope of truth is a service of peril. Who will undertake it, if it be not also a service of honor? It is easy enough, after the ramparts are carried, to find men to plant the flag on the highest tower. The difficulty is to find men who are ready to go first into the breach; and it would be bad policy, indeed, to insult their remains because they fell in the breach, and did not liv to penetrate to the citadel.—Macaulay.

CONVICTION, were it never so excellent, is worthless till it converts itself into conduct. Nay, properly, conviction is not possible till then; inasmuch as all speculation is by nature endless, formless, a vortex amid vortices; only by a felt indubitable certainty of experience does it find any center to revolve round, and so fashion itself into a system. Most true is it, as a wise man teaches us, that "Doubt of any sort cannot be removed except by action." On which ground, too, let him who gropes painfully in darkness or uncertain light, and prays vehemently that the dawn may ripen into day, lay this other precept well to heart which, to me, was of invaluable service: "Do the duty which lies nearest thee," which thou knowest to be a duty! Thy second duty will already hav become clearer.—Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.

IF we be sure we are in the right and do not hold the truth guiltily which becomes not, if we ourselvs condemn not our own weak and frivolous teaching, and the people for an untaught and irreligious gadding rout; what can be more fair than when a man judicious, learned, and of a conscience, for aught we know, as good as theirs that taught us what we know, shall, not privily, from house to house, which is more dangerous, by expressly writing, publish to the world what his opinion is, what his reasons and wherefore that which is now thought cannot be sound? Christ urged it as wherewith to justify himself that he preached in public; yet writing is more public than preaching; and more easy to refutation if need be, there being so many whose business and profession merely it is to be the champions of truth; which if they neglect, what can be imputed but their sloth and unability.—Milton's Areopagitica.

Odds and Ends.

CHINESE servants are becoming unpopular in California. The wages of Ah Sin are too high.

"ANNA, what must you do, before everything else, to hav your sins forgiven?" "Commit the sins."

EVANGELIST MOODY'S work in Washington was not altogether in vain. There are strong hopes entertained of the early redemption of the trade dollar.

AN Oshkosh prayer-meeting was disturbed recently by a man arising and pulling off his coat, as if preparing to slug somebody. As soon as he spoke, however, it was seen that he was insane, as he asked in a loud voice, "Is there any any grace here?"

"WHY did Noah take into the ark only a pair of each kind?" asked a Sunday-school teacher of her class. "'Cause it was all he needed," said a bright-eyed boy. "Why was a pair of each kind all he needed?" "'Cause t'other feller only had a bob-tail flush."

"WHAT is repentance?" queried the Sunday-school teacher. "To be sorry for doing wrong," said the good boy. "Were you ever sorry for anything you did?" "Yes'm," said the bad boy. "What made you sorry?" "Great Jehosophat! Wasn't you ever spanked?"

IN a Sunday-school the teacher had been explaining the text: "Let your loins be girded." Wishing to see if they understood the explanation, he said to a boy; "Well, tell me how and why we are commanded to gird up our loins?" "To keep up our breeches, sir," replied the youth.

PARSON WHANGDOODLE BAXTER distinguished himself once more at the funeral of an aged colored man: "Our deceased brudder was married foah times during his life, but only one ob de widows am so fortunate as to be able to survive him long enough to be present on dis heah solemnious occashun."

A FOND father presented his four-year-old boy with a trumpet, with which he was greatly infatuated. All day the boy tooted away delightedly, and at bedtime, when his grandmother told him to put his trumpet down and say his prayers, the little fellow said: "Oh, no; I'll tell you what let's do, grandma; you pray and I'll keep on blowing."

"O MR. SMITH," said a young lady at a church fair, "I want your help for a moment." "Certainly," replied Mr. Smith; what can I do for you?" "I hav just sold a tidy for fifteen dollars that cost fifteen cents, and I want you to tell me what percentage that is." "A transaction of that kind, my dear Miss B.," said Smith, who is a lawyer, "gets out of percentage and into larceny."

ON board a transatlantic liner first day out: Captain at dinner (looking round for a parson, and at last seeing a man next him with a white tie on): "Will you say grace?" [No answer] "Will you say grace?" [No answer] Very loudly: "Will you say grace?" Passenger (at last turning round): "Would you mind repeating the question? I'm so damned deaf!"

WIFE: "John, what is this 'faith cure' I read of so much?" Husband: "Marriage, my dear, marriage." Wife: "I don't understand how marriage can hav anything to do with it. Please explain yourself" Husband: "Well, before I married you, my faith led me to believe that you were a perfect angel; since I married you I hav been entirely cured of that faith. That is what is called a faith cure."

"FATHER," he said, as he looked up from the boot he was pegging at, "what is an anomaly?" "Anomaly? Well, what is it?" "Why, down in southern Illinois corn is selling at fifteen cents a bushel, while in Chicago it is worth thirty-two." "Well, why don't the tarnal fules ship it?" "Because the railroad freight is two cents a bushel more than the corn sells at." "And that is an anomaly?" "Yes." "Looks more like an infernal swindle on the farmers."

"I TELL you it required lots of pluck for me to get up and start a fire this morning," said Black. "My wife starts the fires and lets me sleep until breakfast," replied White. "How do you manage to get her up?" "Easy enough. I giv a flounce and shout, 'House is on fire,' and she jumps right out of bed. Try it on your wife." "I did try it once, but it wouldn't work." "Why, what did she do when you shouted fire?" "Jumped up and poured a bucketful of cold water on me, and then asked if I thought she had put the fire out."

INTO the glowing grate he gazed
In silent meditation,
Until her eyes the maiden raised
And said, "What's osculation?"

The lover slowly bent his head,
And with some trepidation
He kissed her on the lips and said,
"Sweet love, that's osculation."

Then, while her heart went pit-a-pat,
Till she could almost hear it,
She said, "I thought it must be that,
Or something pretty near it."

CAPEL'S VALENTINE,

Look here, Mr. Capel, if you would convert
Our people, you're not over-keen;
Put away all the logic of reason and truth,
And purchase a tambourine.
Your methods are gentle and quite medieval,
Inclined to be anciently tactical.
Adopt the bold course of the flesh and the devil,
The Salvation Army is practical.

TALMAGE'S.

Cavorting genius, take a friend's advice,
Put skates on like a rover,
Then you will be prepared to slide
When hades freezes over.

Go on—there's something in the thought
Your actions make us think,
That virtue is a tennis court,
And heaven itself a rink.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 12. No. 9. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY. | New York, Saturday, February 2, 1885. | 33 CLINTON PLACE. | $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

HARRISON TWEED, of Taunton, Mass., dropped dead in church January 18th. Moral: Don't go to church.

IT really surprises us that Mr. Anthony Comstock has not yet undertaken to expurgate or suppress the Bible.—New York Star.

THE Brooklyn Eagle thinks the Rev. Mr. Newton feels like the ground-hog that came out of its hole too early in the season.

MONCURE D. CONWAY, the radical preacher, who is now on the Continent, will return to America where he proposes to settle down to literary work.

MR. TALMAGE wants Ingersoll sent to jail for blasphemy. Would it not be a better plan to sentence him to a prolonged course of Mr. Talmage's sermons?—Tribune.

PARSON NEWMAN, who was recently discharged from the pulpit of the Madison Avenue church of this city, has started a church in San Francisco, Cal., to be run independent of ecclesiastical control.

THE wife of the Rev. M. G. McCaslin of Gustavus, Ohio, has gone back to her father's house in Erie, Pa. She exhibits a wound upon her scalp made by her husband striking her over the head with a book of sermons.

A PENNSYLVANIA editor was fatally stricken with paralysis while at prayer not long ago. An irreligious editor remarks that it is not likely that such a thing would occur again in a thousand years—in Pennsylvania.

MGR. CAPEL says: "It devolves on the Catholic church to lead democracy in the world." This may be so, but the way in which it leads reminds one very much of the attempt of a man to lead an angry bull by the tail.—Texas Siftings.

Two young girls, Annie and Ella Miller, were struck by an express train at Hazelton, Pa. Ella was instantly killed, and Annie was seriously injured. The sisters were returning from prayer-meeting. Moral: Don't go to prayer-meetings.

IT is reported that the college for girls at Vassar, N. Y., is declining in prosperity. A professor connected with the institution says that he would not be surprised to see the doors of the college closed within five years. Newspaper ridicule, he claims, will hav done it.

"TWELVE terms of court I hav now held," says Chief Justice Greene, of Washington Territory, "in which women hav served as grand and petit jurors, and it is certainly a fact beyond dispute that no other twelve terms so salutatory for restraint of crime hav ever been known in this territory."

THE Sacred Congregation of Propaganda at Rome has issued a circular, stating that the unanimous protest of the bishops of the Catholic world against the liquidation by the Italian authorities of the property of the Congregation has not prevented the actual execution of that measure, and the Sacred Congregation protests anew.

IN Syracuse, N. Y., recently at a meeting of ladies "representing the religious spirit and philanthropy of the city," the Unitarians were ignominiously expelled because, as one lady put it, the meeting "was to be a Christian meeting, and it would be a blunder to do anything to discredit its character"—such as the admission of Unitarians. The ostensible object of this gathering was to form a charitable association.

IN his lecture, Sunday before last, George Chainey told a story. The last time he was in the company of Colonel Ingersoll some one said, "Now, colonel, suppose there really is a future abode, where everything is as pleasant as you can imagin—that would be all right, wouldn't it?" "No," said the colonel, "we should get tired of it. It would, by and by, get to be the same old story—just like washing dishes. Heaven is the child of hope. But did you ever think that hope is the only fellow who never loses his reputation for veracity? and yet he is the biggest liar of them all." Mr. Chainey publishes his Independent Pulpit regularly, which can be had by addressing him at 310 Shawmut ave., Boston. Price, 5 cents per copy.

A COLORED preacher in Brooklyn made some remarks in his sermon reflecting on the integrity and reliability of Job, and carrying the idea that the number of subcutaneous tumors with which he was afflicted was much exaggerated, whereupon a colored sister arose and controverted the statements of the preacher, adding that it was not fair to take advantage of Job's absence to attack him. She was placed under bond of one hundred dollars to keep the peace.

DR. TANNER, the faster, is said to be in Dona Ana county, New Mexico, where he is devoting himself to the propagation of the new religion founded on the inspiration of Dr. Newbrough, of New York. The Bible of the New Dispensation is known as the "Oahspe." Dr. Tanner claims only to be an apostle of the revelator, Newbrough, but as he has discounted Christ's chief miracle by fasting over forty days, he deserves to be considered as little less than a prophet.

INDIANS do not often act as temperance missionaries among the pale faces, but the Independence (Cal.) Independent relates this as something overheard there recently: Said an Indian to a white man: "You go to party at Independence?" "No," said the white man; "I am broke and can't go" "What for you talk so?" said the Indian; "you work all time, earn money; what for you no keep him? Some time I broke too; buy whisky, drink him up, money all gone. Now no drink long time, work, plenty money, no broke; you do all same, no broke too."

HENRY STROTMAN, of Vincennes, Ind., who has four children sick with typhoid fever, has been very religiously inclined lately. On the evening of the 6th, as he was praying over his sick children, his wife told him that if he would build a fire he would do them more real service than by praying. This enraged Strotman, and, seizing a heavy spade handle, he beat his wife over the head and body, and clubbed his father-in-law, Christopher Ottesmyer, sixty-three years old, until he was dead. Strotman was overpowered by the police, but not until City Marshal Romer had been badly beaten. Mrs. Strotman is fatally injured. The murderer was imprisoned. He is thought to be insane.

THE Woman's Suffrage Association of Massachusetts has discussed the proposition that the dogma incorporated in the religious creeds derived from Judaism, teaching that woman was an afterthought in creation, her sex a misfortune, marriage a subordination, and maternity a curse, are contrary to the law of God as revealed in nature and the precepts of Christ. One debater exculpated Judaism from responsibility for the degradation of women. A minister followed suit, and also defended early Christianity, and an Episcopalian layman declared that until the church, Catholic, Episcopal, or Methodist, recognized the right of woman to be made bishops, and to ordain others to the ministry, the work of equality can never be accomplished. This last speaker had found the pulpit a center of opposition to woman suffrage, and later it was arraigned as a stumbling-block in the way of temperance; but finally Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton declared that "every form of religion that has breathed upon the earth has degraded women."

THE Methodist organ, just to break the monotony of its course, makes some really sensible remarks on the "Freedom of Worship" bill. After observing that "the name of the bill is deceptiv, naturally so because of its Jesuitical origin," the Advocate says: "No state in this republican nation intrusts the training of its infant wards to any sect or church, with their 'services, rules, and disciplin,' and New York in this era of civilization will certainly not take the initiativ in pronouncing the banns of the 'union of church and state,' as this measure covertly proposes. It would be a dangerous marriage that not even law could make sacred. We are learning in this country the lesson, long since learned in the Old World, to distinguish between Jesuitism and general Roman Catholicism. We wage no war on the equal rights of Roman Catholics with all other denominations to freedom of worship and religious liberty, nor deny those rights, but the rather would vigorously defend those rights under the state constitution, to the 'free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship.' But we will war against any attempt to invade with sectarian teaching the absolutely unsectarian beneficiary institutions of the state, whether they be the public schools or the penal and reformatory institutions."

"No more preaching for me," said a young circuit-rider, who had started out with bright prospects and two pairs of home knit socks, to an Arkansaw Traveler man. "I don't mind persuading people to lead better lives, but the fact is the walls were too thin where I boarded. I could lie in my room and hear everything that was said in the adjoining room. I didn't like this; I didn't like to be an eavesdropper. The other night I was lying in my room, not trying to listen, but I couldn't help but hear. 'That's a fine preacher,' said the old man; 'got a mouth like a stove-door. Got a devilish sight more appetite than religion. Did you see him make a pass at that shoat? Wonder the hogs don't squeal when he's around.' 'You oughtn't to talk about him in that way,' said the old lady, 'fur he's doin' the best he kin. I didn't like it, though, the way he dove into that butter. Now, he ought to know how scarce butter is. I do believe he could eat two pounds at one sittin'. Did you notice to-night when he got down to prayer? Had his eye on that basket of aigs all the time. My stars! if that's the kind of preachers they are going to send out, we'd as well open the smoke-house and be done with it. That feller is hungry all the time, and besides that he can't preach. Talk's like his mouth's full of mush. He'll never be a success in callin' mourners. Make a better hand at callin' hogs.' Every night I was compelled to hear such remarks, until I decided that my appetite was a trifle too strong for one following a meek and lowly train."—Maurepas Gazette.

A YOUNG woman who has been converted by Mrs. Woodward, the Indiana revivalist, is laboring under the delusion that she is in heaven a portion of the time. She was found sitting up in bed one night, cold and apparently stiff, with wide staring eyes, her pulse barely perceptible, and not able to speak. When, two or three hours later, she came out of the so-called trance, she seemed greatly worried, and when rested told that with one exception the scenes she had witnessed were glorious. The exception was that of a body of angels marching down to hell with lost souls. She says: "I know as well as anything when the trance is coming on, for I hav been in one now five times. My hands get cold as ice, and I feel my arms stiffening. My eyes get hard, and the inside of the church or room gets smaller. The darkness begins at the outer edges of the room, and comes toward me from all sides. I get more icy and stiff, and then the sight is gone. I can't talk, and don't want to talk. I am in both worlds—in this, because I can hear everything that is said around me, and in the other because I can see the great white throne." Some one asked her how it looks, and she replied: "I hardly know how to tell you. It is something like a chair, only a great deal larger than I ever saw." Besides this, the loon alleges she saw "golden streets, with angels passing around through them. There are habitations, or paradises, you would call them. They rise up on each side, glorious and magnificent. The light is not white, but radiant and bright—oh, so bright and glorious. I go there by two ways; one with nothing on my mind, and all is happiness. The other is to hav a sinner to save; and then I am praying and pleading for him. That is hard work, and I suffer. My coming back is the same as my going. There is no time of total unconsciousness between. I am always very much worried afterward."
